Prop. 112. gr. 27. 1. Many of the most remarkable prophecies relating to the person, state, and condition of the Messiah, had a remarkable accomplishment in him; for it appears from the history of the Evangelists, that he was born of a virgin descended from Abraham, in the decline of the Jewish state, a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, and the second temple, by the Romans; that he was a most wise, holy, and excellent person, going about to the kindest purposes, of instructing men's minds, and healing their bodies, till at last he was put to death by the Jews as a malefactor; nevertheless, that he was on the third day raised from the dead, and ascended into Heaven; from whence he poured forth an extraordinary Spirit upon his followers, whereby they were enabled to perform many surprising works, and to propagate the worship of the one God and the practice of true religion, even among many of the remotest nations.—That such things were fact concerning Jesus of Nazareth, appears from the whole tenor of the evangelical story, which we before proved to be credible, Prop. 108.

Prop. 113. 2. The Jewish prophets intermingled with their predictions such encomiums on the person in whom they should be accomplished, and such attestations of his divine mission, as must recommend him to the highest regard and humblest obedience: particularly speaking of him, as God's servant, whom he anointed to publish glad tidings, whom all men should be obliged to hear, as a king, who should finally triumph over all opposition, and should bring a secure and lasting blessing to all his faithful servants. Vid. Prop. 112. gr. 3, 6, 8, 12, 14—16, 22, 23.

3. To the former head we may properly add the testimony of Angels, and of persons of the most eminent sanctity about the time of his appearing, who are said expressly to have the spirit of prophecy; particularly of Gabriel, in his message to Mary, Luke i. 32. at. and in that to Joseph, Matt. i. 20, 21. compare ver. 23. Elizabeth, Luke i. 43. Mary, ib. ver. 47. &c. Zacharias, ib. ver. 68. &c. the Angel to the shepherds, Luke ii. 10, 11. Simeon, ver. 29. &c. Anna, ver. 38. and John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 11. John i. 29. iii. 27—36.

4. The Jewish religion was constituted in such a manner, that there were many institutions in it which bore so remarkable a resemblance to circumstances relating to Christ in the New Testament, that they could not but in some degree confirm his claim, and show, on the one hand, the harmony between the Old Testament and the New; and, on the other, how much Christ was the end of both. On this head, the abode of God in the Jewish temple, the sacrifices there presented, the purifications appointed, and the intercession made by the high priest, were remarkable circumstances, worthy of regard, as some other more particular ceremonies also were, especially those relating to the paschal lamb.

5. The New Testament assures us that Christ was perfectly innocent and good. Vid. 1 Pet. i. 19; ii. 22; iii. 18. 1 John ii. 1; iii. 5. 2 Cor. v. 21. Heb. iv. 15; vii. 26, 27. which he also publicly asserted of himself, John viii. 29, 46. The imputations thrown on his character appear to have been false and malicious; nor did any of the most inveterate enemies of Christianity, particularly Celsus and Porphyry, deny the innocence of his life: and the silence of Judas as to any accusation against him, nay, the express testimony he bore to his innocence, though he so intimately knew his circumstances, and had so strong an interest to have aspersed and ruined him if possible, is an important illustration of this, which is set in a most just and beautiful light by Bonar on the character and conduct of Judas.*

Yet our Lord declared himself to be such a person as the proposition describes, and solemnly attests the absolute necessity of regarding him as such. John iii. 18. viii. 12, 24. Luke xix. 27. Mark xvi. 16.

Bonar's Sermons are very scarce, and this is a remarkable one. Dr. Dixon, in the communication with which he favoured me, observes, "The sentiments and doctrine of Bonar's Sermon are those of the Reformers, and of the Church of England, as appears from the Homilies, and from the Articles of Religion, which were drawn up by Archbishop Cranmer, and Bishop Ridley, and Bishop Latimer, and others of the Reformers, and which were subscribed by Bonar, and by all the Clergy of the Church of England, at their Ordination, and at their Induction to Livings, &c. &c. &c. &c."

Celsus, (Orig. against Cels. lib. vii. p. 339.) and Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xxiii. *sub. init. apud Dod. 11. The proposition is further illustrated by the new star which appeared at his birth, the angels which brought the tidings of it, the prodigies attending his death; among which, the darkness said to be mentioned by Phlegon, and the rending the rock, (the marks of which are still said to remain,) are particularly worthy of consideration.

phecies, and represented under its types, as a person worthy of the highest regard; seeing prophetic persons renewed this testimony at the time of his appearance; seeing he whose character was perfectly innocent and holy declared himself to be so, and God bore witness to it by the prophetic gifts he gave him, and other miraculous powers wherewith he endued both Christ and his disciples, as well as by a voice from Heaven, and by so many extraordinary interpositions to attest his mission; considering also that miracles have been already proved to be an evidence of divine revelation (vid. Prop. 91. I.), we have just reason to believe that the revelation which Christ made was divine, and that he is without reserve to be credited in all he has asserted, and obeyed in all he has commanded. *Q. E. LECTURE CXXXIV.

COROLLARY 1.

Considering how much the evidence of Christianity depends upon the Old Testament, there is great reason to admire the wisdom and goodness of Divine Providence in preserving the Jews as a distinct people, dispersed almost all over the Christian world; and thereby adding force to the arguments taken from those sacred books, beyond what they could otherwise have had. COROLLARY 2.

Considering how much the argument drawn from Christ's predictions of the destruction of Jerusalem is illustrated by the writings of Josephus, it is also to be acknowledged as an extraordinary providence, that this author was preserved in such a variety of extreme dangers, and that his excellent writings are come down to us so entire; in which we have a more particular account of the desolation of his country than of any other war of which we read in ancient history.

COROLLARY 3.

The time in which Christ appeared was peculiarly proper on many accounts; considering that it was marked out by some of the prophecies quoted above; that the vanity of other attempts for reforming the world had been sufficiently tried; that the world was in a peaceful state, and the cessation of the extraordinary gifts of prophecies and miracles in the Jewish church, for some preceding ages, would make the appearance of a person so eminently endowed with them the more honourable and the more remarkable.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To say that the miracles referred to in the proposition were performed by magic, is very unreasonable; since, on the one hand, there is no reason to believe that men of such an excellent character as Christ and his apostles appear to have been, would have acted in confederacy with wicked spirits, or that these would have lent their aid to advance a cause which had so direct a tendency to destroy their own kingdom: nor can we, on the other hand, believe that God would have permitted such things to have been done in consequence of such a confederacy, without interposing with miraculous evidence on the contrary side of the question, seeing these doctrines were far from being so evidently absurd as to be incapable of being confirmed by miracles.

If we should grant (as many have maintained, though they have not been able to prove it) that the case of those who are called Demoniacs in the New Testament, was nothing more than common madness or epileptic disorders, the cure of these, merely by speaking a word, would be as true a miracle as casting out devils; but how far this would be reconcilable with the honour of the authors of the New Testament, in the report they have made of these miracles, will be considered at large hereafter. Prop. 161. Schol. 1.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The cessation of oracles among the Heathens, might have been justly added under the eleventh step, could it be proved to satisfaction (as perhaps it may) on the one hand, that there was any thing supernatural in them; and, on the other, that they did cease at the time of Christ's appearance. But as this is matter of controversy, it seemed sufficient to have touched upon it here, referring it to further examination in a more proper place. But if granted, it is not a consideration proper to show the suitableness of the time of Christ's appearance,—since it might as well have followed upon it, had that appearance been sooner or later.—Cor. 3. Prop. 161. Schol. 2. *Atterb. LECTURE CXXXV.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Several Heathen writers, and especially Hierocles, whose book Eusebius has answered, and Philostratus, endeavour to bring the miracles of Christ into disgrace, by comparing with them, and preferring to them, those of Apollonius Tyanæus, of whom it may be proper here to give a short account:—He is said to have been a Pythagorean philosopher, contemporary with Christ, remarkable for his temperance and many other virtues. It is said he claimed and exercised an extraordinary power of speaking all languages, and performing all miracles, equal to those which are ascribed to Christ, not excepting even raising the dead. He is also said to have transported himself into the air from one place to another, and at last to have ascended into Heaven; and afterwards to have appeared to the emperor Alexander.—To this story it may be objected,

1. That according to the account which Philostratus gives of the manner in which he was furnished with the materials of his history, the facts must be very uncertain; for he tells us that Apollonius had been dead or translated a hundred years before he wrote, and that his history was compiled partly from the commentaries of one Damis, which were never published, but given to Philostratus by the empress Julia as secret memoirs, without any evidence of their being genuine; and partly from the writings of Maximus Egiensis and Meragoras, the former of whom only wrote a few particulars; the latter was, according to the character Philostratus himself gives of him, a very fabulous and romantic writer. He does indeed add, that there were some monuments of some of these facts; but places them in distant countries, as India and Ethiopia, where no writers pretend to have found them; and as for the letters of Apollonius himself, he owns they related not to his miracles, but to the curiosities of the countries through which he had travelled; so that had Philostratus himself been ever so honest, and his design in writing ever so good, it is difficult to see what satisfaction he could have had himself, or have given his readers, as to any of those facts.

2. The manner in which Philostratus has written his history, gives us but an ill idea of his own character, and lays a foundation for great suspicion; for it is very affected, extravagant, and most unlike the beautiful simplicity of style which is observable in the New Testament, full of an ostentation of learning, and discovers a disposition to aggravate all facts to the utmost which might tend to the reputation of his hero.

3. Many of the miracles which Philostratus ascribes to Apollonius, were, according to him, done in secret, or before very few witnesses, or were self-contradictory, and others were vain and foolish; not a few appear to have been borrowed from the History of the Evangelists, and applied to Apollonius, with the change of a few circumstances.

4. The occasion of writing his book, seems to have been the author's desire to ingratiate himself with Julia the wife of Severus, and with Caracalla the succeeding emperor, by detracting from Christianity; to which they had both a great aversion.

5. The story so soon died, and the disciples of Apollonius were so few, that there is little reason to believe he was so extraordinary a person as Philostratus represents, especially since none of his followers pretend to have received from him a power of working miracles.

6. It has also been answered, That should the truth of this most incredible story be allowed, no certain argument could be brought from thence against the credibility of the Gospel,—since Apollonius did not profess to work his miracles in confirmation of any doctrine contrary to and inconsistent with it. Yet, after all, the truth of the story would so far derogate from the honour of Christianity, though it does not directly oppose it, that it is most reasonable to rest the stress of the answer on the remarks under the preceding heads.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Some of the same remarks may be made on most of the miracles which Heathen writers mention as performed by Pythagoras, Adrian, Vespasian, and others. The pretended number of them was small, the evidence very uncertain, most of them being reported by distant hearsay, and some circumstances of them connected with circumstances which would render it a dangerous thing to examine into them; so that, upon the whole, the wisest of the Heathens themselves did not appear to believe them. Or if it should be granted they were facts, since they were not wrought in confirmation of any proposition, the evidence of Christianity would not be impaired by them. On the contrary, as some of the most credible among them were signally subservient to the intended vengeance of God upon the Jews, taking them in all their circumstances, they give additional evidence to Christianity rather than detract from it. As for any extraordinary facts ascribed to the Philosophers in Eunapius, the distance of time in which he wrote, and the uncertainty of his information, sufficiently obviates any argument to be drawn from them; they probably were the effect of the same enmity to Christianity which engaged Zosimus to throw so many slanders on those great men who professed it.

How extremely difficult it was for the most artful and bold impostor to secure to himself the reputation of a prophet, and any supposed regard to pretences of working miracles, may also further appear from the story of Alexander, in the Pseudomantis of Lucian; which is an admirable contrast to that of Christ and his apostles; and, as such, is comprehensively represented with great force in LECTURE CXXXVI.

DOCTRINES DELIVERED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The system of doctrines delivered to the world in the New Testament, is in the main worthy of being received as true and divine.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 108. 1. 1. Many important doctrines contained in the New Testament, were taught by Christ in his own person, and reported by the apostles as spoken by him; now we have already proved that he was worthy of universal credit, and that their testimony of facts deserves great regard.

2. The apostles received from Christ the promise of extraordinary divine assistance in the discharge of their office and ministry; which must at least extend to the furnishing them with the knowledge of all necessary truth, and preserving them from gross and dangerous mistakes:—John xiv. 16, 17, 26; xv. 26, 27; xvi. 13; xx. 21–23. Matt. x. 19, 20. Luke xii. 11, 12; xxiv. 49. Acts i. 4, 5.

3. The Holy Spirit was in a visible manner poured out upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost, in consequence of this promise; and they professed to have received such assistance from him, as empowered them to declare the mind and will of Christ as authorized interpreters of it, and to challenge a regard to what they said as to a message from Heaven:—Acts ii. pass. 1 Cor. ii. 9, 10, 12, 13, 16; vii. 40; xiv. 37. 2 Cor. ii. 10; iii. 5, 6. 1 Thess. iv. 8. Gal. i. 11, 12, 15–17. Compare 1 Cor. xi. 23, &c. Eph. iii. 3. 1 Pet. i. 12. 2 Pet. iii. 2, 15, 16. 1 John iv. 6. To which we may add all the passages in which the gospel taught by the apostles is called the Gospel of God, 2 Cor. xi. 7. 1 Tim. i. 11. et pass. as also Eph. iii. 7—11. Gal. ii. 8, 9. and all those passages in which the Gospel-dispensation is declared in the discourses and writings of the apostles, is represented as vastly superior to the Mosaic law, of whose divine authority, nevertheless, the apostles speak (as we shall afterwards see at large) in such strong terms.—Vid. Prop. 118. gr. 12. Chapm. ag. Morg. vol. i. p. 289.

4. There is a great deal of reason to believe that this was not merely an empty boast, or a mistaken conclusion of their own; considering, not only the general probability of the thing, that, after Christ had taught a doctrine introduced by such extraordinary circumstances, some extraordinary care should be taken in transmitting it; but also the excellent character of the persons themselves, and the miracles which were performed, and the prophecies which were delivered by them,—some of which have already had a remarkable accomplishment, especially those relating to the apostasy of the latter days, and the arising of the man of sin, i. e. the papal kingdom; not to mention the whole book of the Revelations. Vid. 1 Tim. iv. 1—3. 2 Thess. ii. pass.

5. The primitive Christians, who professed to have received their religion from the apostles, and who expressed the highest regard for the authority of their writings, (as will be more fully shown in the following proposition,) were attended with a remarkable power of working miracles, which continued in the church for more than a hundred years after the apostles' time.

6. God appears to have borne witness to the truth of Christianity, by the extraordinary success which attended it, and by the support which was given to those who endured martyrdom for it. This success of the Gospel appears wonderful indeed, if we consider, on the one hand, how speedy and extensive its progress was, and, on the other, what opposition was made to it from the prejudices of education, from the corrupt affections of men, which would render them exceedingly averse to so humbling a scheme, and so strict a system of morality. To this may also be added, the candour with which the whole scheme was laid open at once, not excepting those parts which might give the greatest disgust, the want of the advantage of human literature, and other recommendations of a secular nature on the side of the persons by whom it was preached, the wit and eloquence which were engaged against it in so polite an age and country, and the terrors of persecutions which were so early armed for its utter extirpation: that such exquisite torments as were often inflicted on Christians in these times, should be supported by the youngest and weakest with such patience and joy, and that the Christian cause should be promoted by them, seems evidently to prove, not only that the sufferers had convincing evidence of the truth of the Gospel, but likewise that God was present with them in so remarkable a manner as to acknowledge their cause for his own.

1—6. 7. Since so much of the systematical doctrines delivered in the New Testament came from Christ's own mouth, and the apostles were so well furnished for acquainting us both with them and other particulars, since such a testimony was borne to them, both by the effusion of the Spirit upon them, and the miracles wrought by them and succeeding Christians, and by the extraordinary success of that doctrine they taught,—there is great reason to believe and admit it as a system of divine truth. Q. E. D.

COROLLARY.

When it is considered how very large a part of the argument is derived from the testimony of Paul and his writings, it will appear that his extraordinary conversion was a circumstance most wisely adjusted by Providence; as, on the other hand, what relates to him contains a compendious demonstration of the truth of Christianity; as is largely and excellently proved in Lyttl. on Conv. of Paul, pass. Mor. Works, vol. ii. p. 3, &c. Duchal's pres. Evid. Serm. 5 and 6.

SCHOLIUM I.

Though it must be acknowledged that traditional testimony is in some degree weakened by passing through a succession of hands, and on that account the evidence of Christianity must in some degree diminish with time,—yet that may be balanced by the accomplishment of prophecies referred to, gr.

* The question concerning the extraordinary success of the Gospel occasionally occurs in the writings of Mr. Godwin's two disputants, to which others we have before referred. We now add the late Mr. Henry Taylor's further Thoughts on the Gospel Narrative

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is most evident, that the extraordinary progress of the Mahometan religion in the world, is a fact by no means comparable to the propagation of Christianity, considering the different genius of it, and the different methods by which it was effected.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is urged that martyrdom is no argument of a person's being in the right, since there have been martyrs of all religions; and enthusiasts have died for notorious errors with the greatest readiness and zeal.

Ans. It shows at least that people are persuaded of what they die for; and the thing for which the primitive Christians suffered was not a point of speculation, but a plain matter of fact, in which (had it been false) they could not have been mistaken.

Burn. Hist. 8vo. vol. ii. p. 888. Jort. Rem. vol. ii. p. 137.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The power of working miracles in the Christian church was pretty universally ceased before Chrysostom's time. As for what Augustine says of those wrought at the tombs of the martyrs in his time, and some other places, the evidence is not always so convincing as might be desired in facts of such importance: but we are not to wonder that miracles are generally ceased; seeing if they were to be frequently repeated for many succeeding ages, they would lose much of their convincing power, and so would be less capable of answering the end proposed by them.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Though we ought not to be over-credulous in believing stories of miracles wrought in our own days, yet it would be a very groundless presumption to say that God never does, nor will work them. We are not judges of what is fit for him to do: and where facts appear with such evidence as would be admitted in other cases, it seems very unreasonable to reject it here.

LECTURE CXXXVII.

DEFINITION LXXI.

Any supernatural influence of God upon the mind of a rational creature, whereby he is formed to any degree of intellectual improvements, to which he could not or would not in fact have attained in present circumstances in a natural way, is called in general DIVINE INSPIRATION.

DEFINITION LXXII.

That is called in general AN INSTRUCTION OF SUPERINTENDENCY, in which God does so influence and direct the mind of any person, as to keep him more secure from error in some various and com-

* In 1747, Dr. Middleton published an Introductory Discourse to a larger work, containing the Miraculous Powers which are supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church, from the earliest ages, through several successive centuries, inferring, by plain Consequence, as well as Direct Proofs, the reason to believe, upon the authority of the genuineness of those facts, and such powers were continued to the Church, after the days of the Apostles. This performance was immediately attacked by Dr. Sandby. Though without his name, in Observations on a Book, entitled An Introductory Discourse to a larger Work; and by Dr. Chapman, in a Letter to the Author of a late Introductory Discourse. Dr. Middleton replied to the latter, in One Letter; and Dr. Middleton rejoined to Dr. Sandby, in Remarks on two Pamphlets, which appeared against Dr. Middleton's Introductory Discourse. Some time, Dec. 1748, appeared One Dissertation on these works, in three parts. A Letter from the Miraculous Powers which are supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church, from the Earliest Ages through several successive Ages. plex discourse, than he would have been merely by the use of his natural faculties.

COROLLARY 1.

A book may be written without any error at all, where yet there is no superintendent inspiration, if the nature of the subject and the genius of the man be such, as to be capable of such a composition.

COROLLARY 2.

A book may be written by assistance of such an inspiration, in which there are some errors, provided they be fewer than in a course of nature must have been expected.

DEFINITION LXXIV.

PLENARY SUPERINTENDENT INSPIRATION is such a degree of inspiration, as excludes any mixture of error at all from the performance so superintended.

COROLLARY 1.

A book, the contents of which are entirely true, may be said to be written by a plenary superintendent inspiration, even though there are many things contained in it, the truth of which might have been known and recorded without such extraordinary assistance, if there are others which could not; or if, on the whole, a freedom from all error would not otherwise have been found there.

COROLLARY 2.

A book may be written by such a superintendent inspiration, in which there are many imperfections of style and method, provided the whole contents of it be true, and the subject of it so important, as would make it consistent with the Divine Wisdom thus to interpose, to preserve that entire credibility.

DEFINITION LXXV.

AN INSPIRATION OF ELEVATION is said to take place, where the faculties act in a regular and (as it seems) a common manner, yet are raised to an extraordinary degree; so that the composure shall, upon the whole, have more of the true sublime, or pathetic, than natural genius could have given.

COROLLARY 1.

In many cases it may be impossible to judge how far this inspiration may take place, since it is so difficult to know how far natural genius may extend, or how far corporeal causes may work upon the animal frame, so as to produce a performance greatly above the common standard.

COROLLARY 2.

There may be such an inspiration as this, where there is none of superintendency, and much less any that is plenary.

DEFINITION LXXVI.

INSPIRATION OF SUGGESTION takes place when the use of the faculties is superseded, and God does, as it were, speak directly to the mind, making such discoveries to it as it could not otherwise have obtained, and dictating the very words in which such discoveries are to be communicated, if they are meant as a message to others.

COROLLARY 1.

There may be a plenary superintendency, where there is neither the inspiration of elevation nor that of suggestion.

COROLLARY 2.

Where there is an inspiration of suggestion, we may depend upon the certain truth of what is so suggested; for it is not to be imagined that God would dictate or declare a falsehood to any of his creatures, considering the veracity of his own nature: and we may also conclude there will be a plenary superintendency of direction in reporting it, if such superintendency be necessary to the exactness of that report; for it seems inconsistent with the divine wisdom, to suppose that God would suffer an inspired person to err through natural infirmity, in delivering a message with which he has been pleased so expressly to charge him.

Doddr. Fam. Exp. v. iii. App. No. iii. p. 38.

SCHOLIUM 1.

All the kinds of inspiration which have been described above, are possible to the almighty power of God, since there is nothing in any of them contradictory to itself, or which appears contradictory to any of the divine perfections.

SCHOLIUM 2.

There may be various ways whereby God communicates himself to his servants in the inspiration of suggestion: he may sometimes do it by immediate impressions on the mind, or by dreams and visions represented to the imagination: at other times by sounds formed in the air, or by visible appearances, in which the volition of some created spirit may or may not intervene.

Essay on Insp. p. 29. Tillots. Ser. vol. ii. No. ii. p. 16. Chand. on Joel, Diss. p. 108.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have thought it improper to distinguish between divine and diabolical inspiration, seeing, on the one hand, an evil spirit can suggest nothing without a divine agency to render its volitions effectual, Prop. 32. and, on the other hand, God's raising a thought immediately in the mind is no argument that it is true, unless he appears to interpose so as to give testimony to it, but we answer, That allowing both these, an important distinction is to be kept up between what God does as his own act, and what he does merely in the general course of his operations, in giving efficacy to the volitions of his creatures. A regard to the common usage of speech, and likewise to the language of Scripture, as far as that is to be considered, will require us to maintain this distinction, even while we acknowledge a dependence of all inferior agents upon God.

and his constant interposition to carry on the designs of his providence, amidst the greatest opposition which evil spirits are making to them. Prop. 32. Schol. 3.

LECTURE CXXXVIII.

PROPOSITION CX.

To collect some testimonies of the primitive fathers, expressing their sentiments concerning the inspiration of the New Testament.

SOLUTION.

1. Clemens Romanus says, "That the apostles preached the Gospel, being filled with the Holy Spirit; that the Scriptures are the true word of the Spirit, and that Paul wrote to the Corinthians things that were true by the aid of the Spirit."

2. Polycarp tells the Philippians, "That none could attain the wisdom of Paul, by which he wrote to them."

3. Justin Martyr says, "That the Gospels were written by men full of the Holy Ghost; and that the sacred writers spoke by inspiration."

4. Irenæus says, "That all the apostles received the Gospel by divine revelation, as well as Paul; and that, by the will of God they delivered it to us as the foundation and pillar of our faith; that the Scriptures were dictated by the Spirit of God, and therefore it is wickedness to contradict them, and sacrilege to make any alteration in them."

5. Clemens Alexandrinus says, "That we that have the Scriptures are taught of God; that the Scriptures are established by the authority of God; that the whole Scripture is the law of God, and that they are all divine."

6. Origen says, "That the Scriptures proceeded from the Holy Spirit; that there is not one tittle in them but what expresses a divine wisdom; that there is nothing in the law, or the prophets, or the Gospels or the Epistles, which did not proceed from the fulness of the Spirit: that we ought with all the faithful to say, that the Scriptures are divinely inspired; that the Gospels are admitted as divine in all the churches of God; that the Scriptures are no other than the oracles of God."

7. Tertullian testifies, "That Scripture is the basis of faith; that all Christians prove their doctrines out of the Old and New Testament; and that the Majesty of God suggested what Paul wrote."

8. An ancient writer in Eusebius says, "That they who corrupt the sacred Scriptures abolish the standard of the ancient faith, neglecting the words of the divine writings, out of regard to their own reasonings; and afterwards, that they either do not believe that the Holy Spirit uttered the Divine Scriptures, and then they are infidels, or think themselves wiser than the Spirit, and so seem to be possessed."

9. Theophilus Antiochenus says (as Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus also do) "That the evangelists and apostles wrote by the same Spirit that inspired the prophets."

10. The succeeding fathers of the church speak so expressly and copiously on this head, that it seems not necessary to pursue the catalogue any further.

Whit. Con. vol. i. Pref. p. 12. La Mothe on Insp. lib. i. c. iii.—vi. Dupin's Canon. part i. lib. ii. p. 49.

COROLLARY 1.

It seems to have been the judgment of many of these persons, that the New Testament was written by a plenary superintendent inspiration at least, gr. 1, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9. Lowth on Inspiration, p. 3.

COROLLARY 2.

It is evident that, in many of these passages, they declare not only their own private sentiments, but those of the whole church; and it is certain that their allowing any book to be, as they expressed it, canonical, was in effect owning its plenary inspiration; since that word imported a rule of faith and manners, whence there was no human appeal. gr. 6, 7, 8.

Fam. Expos. vol. iii. Append. p. 43, note.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Some passages have been brought on the other side of the question from Jerom, who seems indeed to allow that the apostles were subject to some slips of memory.

SCHOLIUM 2.

A celebrated fable, related by Pappus in his Synodicon, of a separation made in the grand Council of Nice, between the canonical books of the Scriptures, and others concerning which there was a doubt, may be seen in

New Trans. of New Test. vol. ii. p. 874.

PROPOSITION CXI.

The New Testament was written by a superintendent inspiration.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 114. Dem. gr. 2. Prop. 113. 1. The apostles were, according to Christ's promise, furnished with all necessary powers for the discharge of their office, by an extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit upon them at the day of Pentecost. Acts ii. 1, &c., and a second time, Acts iv. 31.

1. 2. We may assure ourselves, that they were hereby competently furnished for all those services which were of great importance for the spread and edification of the church, and of so great difficulty as to need supernatural assistance.

3. Considering how uncertain a thing oral tradition is, and how soon the most public and notorious facts are corrupted by it, it was impossible that the Christian religion could be preserved in any tolerable degree of purity, without a written account of the facts and doctrines preached by the apostles; and yet, on the other hand, we can hardly suppose that God would suffer a doctrine introduced in so extraordinary a manner to be corrupted and lost.

4. The discourses of Christ were several of them so long, and some likewise of so curious and delicate a nature, that it is not to be imagined the apostles should have been able exactly to record them, especially so many years after they were delivered, and amidst such a variety of cares and dangers, without such extraordinary divine assistance, or, in the language of Def. 73. without an inspiration of superintendency. For the time when the Gospels were written see, by the way,

Fam. Exp. vol. iii. Append. No. iv.*

5. Many of the doctrines which the apostles delivered in their writings were so sublime, and so new, that as they could not have been known at first otherwise than by an inspiration of suggestion, so they would need an inspiration of superintendency in delivering an accurate account of them.

2, 3, 4, 5. 6. There is reason to believe, from the promise of Christ, that such parts of the New Testament as were written by the apostles, were written by an inspiration of superintendency.

Prop. 114. gr. 3, 4. 7. It is not to be thought that persons, so eminent for humility, piety, humanity, and other virtues, as the apostles were, would have spoken of their writings as the words and the commands of the Lord, as the test of truth and falsehood, and gloried so much in being under the direction of the Spirit, if they had not certainly known themselves to be so in their writings, as well as in their preaching; and the force of this argument is greatly illustrated, by recollecting the extraordinary miraculous powers with which they were honoured, while making exhortations and pretensions of this kind, as was hinted above.

8. There was an ancient tradition, that Mark and Luke were in the number of the seventy disciples who were furnished with extraordinary powers from Christ, and received from him promises of assistance much resembling those made to the apostles (compare Luke x. 9, 16, 19.); and if it were so, as the arguments used to prove both the understanding and integrity of the apostles may be in great measure applied to them, we may, on the principles laid down, conclude that they also had some inspiration of superintendency. But considering Col. iv. 10, 14. Acts xx. 5, 6; xxi. 1—17, et sem. Acts xii. 25; xv. 37—30. Phil. ver. 24. 1 Pet. v. 13. there is much more reason to regard that received and ancient tradition in the Christian church, that Mark wrote his Gospel, instructed by Peter; and Luke his by Paul's assistance; which, if it be allowed, their writings will stand nearly on the same footing with those of Peter and Paul. Vid. Prop. 101. gr. 20.

Whitb. Pref. to Luke. Mills's Gr. Test. Prol. ad Marc. et Luc. James ag. Whist. p. 46. Benson on Prop. of Chris. App. part i. § 1, 2.

9. It may not be improper here just to mention the internal marks of a divine original, the particulars of which must be submitted to further examination. We shall endeavour to shew, in the progress of this work, what must be evident to all who are well acquainted with the New Testament in the general, though capable of further illustration, that the excellency of its doctrines, and the spirituality and elevation of its design, the majesty and simplicity of its style, the agreement of its parts, and its efficacy upon the hearts and consciences of men, concur to give us a high idea of it, and to corroborate the external arguments for its being written by a superintendent inspiration at least.

Prop. 115. 10. There has been in the Christian church, from its earliest ages, a constant tradition, that these books were written by the extraordinary assistance of the Spirit, which must at least amount to superintendent inspiration.

COROLLARY.

Hence we may certainly infer, That the apostles were not left in their writings to misrepresent any important facts on which the evidence of Christianity was founded, or any important doctrine upon which the salvation or edification of their converts depended.† *Fam. LECTURE CXXXIX

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is a controversy of considerable difficulty and importance, Whether the inspiration and superintendency under which the apostles were, extended to every minute circumstance in their writings, so as to be in the most absolute sense plenary? Vid. Def. 74. Jerom, Grotius, Erasmus and Episcopius, thought it was not; and Lowth himself allows that, in matters of no consequence, "as he expresses it," they might be liable to slips of memory: but, on the contrary, it seems evident that the emphatical manner in which our Lord speaks of the agency of the Spirit upon them, and in which they themselves speak of their own writings, will justify us in believing that their inspiration was plenary, unless there be very convincing evidence brought on the other side to prove that it was not; and it is to be remembered, that if we allow there were some errors in the New Testament as it came from the hands of the apostles, there may be great danger of subverting the main purpose and design of it; since there will be endless room to debate the importance both of facts and doctrines.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Against such a plenary inspiration of the New Testament it is objected, That there is no circumstance in which more extraordinary assistances were promised to the apostles, than when they appeared before magistrates; yet some mistakes in their conduct then show, that even this promise was to be taken with some limitations, and consequently that in other circumstances they might also be liable to mistakes. Compare Matt. x. 19, 20. Mark xiii. 11. with Acts xxiii. 1—6. To this we answer,

1. That much is to be said in vindication of the apostles' conduct in the instance to which the objection refers.—Vid. Fam. Expos. in Loc.

2. That the apostles might be preserved from mistakes in their apologies, and yet might be left to some human infirmities as to other circumstances in their behaviour before magistrates.

Five Lett. on Insp. p. 41. Lowth on Ins. p. 80.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is further objected, That the apostles did not seem to apprehend each other to be inspired; as appears by their debating with each other in the council at Jerusalem, (Acts xv.) and by Paul's blaming Peter (Gal. ii. 11.); neither, it is urged, did the Christians in those early days apprehend them to be infallible, since their conduct was, in some instances, questioned and arraigned. Acts xi. 2, 3; xxi. 20—24.

But to this we answer, (besides what was observed before, that some mistakes in conduct might be consistent with an inspiration of superintendency in their writings,) That in both instances in question the apostles were in the right; and the passages urged will only prove that there were some Christians even then, who did not pay a due regard to those grand ministers in the Messiah's kingdom; to which we may add, That Christ's promise to them did not import that their first views of things should always be right in the whole administration of their office; but that, on the whole, he would make proper provision for their information; and if we consider how strong a temptation they would have been under to think too highly of themselves, if they had been under a constant plenary inspiration, it may appear a beauty in the divine conduct to have left them, in some instances, to the natural weakness of their own minds (compare 2 Cor. xii. 7, 9, 10.); and sometimes to interrupt those extraordinary gifts in particular cases, as he did those of healing, (compare 2 Tim. iv. 20. Phil. ii. 27.) still providing by other hands a remedy for those ill consequences, which might have arisen from an uncorrected mistake; for, as to Dr. Morgan's pretence, That the apostles, after all, went on each in his different opinion, it is entirely a false assertion, and admirably well confuted by Dr. Leland in the passage referred to below.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is further objected, That Paul, who asserts himself to have been inferior to none of the rest of the apostles, (2 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11.) speaks of himself in such a manner, as plainly to show that he did not apprehend himself under such a plenary inspiration; (vid. 1 Cor. vii. 10, 12, 25, 40. 2 Cor. xi. 17.); nor do we find that any of the apostles introduce their discourses with such causes as the prophets used, to declare that they spoke as the oracles of God.

We answer, This will indeed prove that they did not imagine themselves to have been always under an inspiration of suggestion; nevertheless, if what they said was proper, and what they determined was just, their inspiration of superintendency might still be plenary; and indeed their distinguishing in this point seems strongly to imply (especially when compared with the passage quoted before, Prop. 113. gr. 3.) that their decisions in other points of doctrine and duty were by immediate revelation from Christ.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It is also objected, That there are several passages in the history of the Evangelists, which are directly contrary to each other, so that it is impossible they should both be true: particularly in the genealogy of Christ, and the story of his last passover, sufferings, and resurrection. To this we answer,

1. That there are many seeming contradictions which may be reconciled in a satisfactory manner, without doing violence to the text, as appears from our notes* on many of the passages in question.

2. There are many other difficulties, which may be removed by various readings, or at least by altering a few words in the text. Now, forasmuch as it is evident, from the many various readings, that the transcribers were not under a superintendent inspiration, it seems upon the whole more reasonable to suppose an error in some of the first copies, which may have extended itself to all the rest, than to suppose the original erroneous, for the reason given before, Schol. 1.†

3. If any cases do occur, in which neither of the former solutions can take place, it seems reasonable to conclude (cæt. par.) that where the writers of the New Testament differ from each other in their accounts, those of them who were apostles, rather than the others, have given us the exact truth, and were under a plenary superintendency, considering the peculiar dignity of the apostolic office; and accordingly some have observed that there is little apparent difference, if any, between Matthew and John: but there seems no necessity for having recourse to this expedient; and as to placing stories in a different order, it is certain that the best historians do not always confine themselves to that of time; and the hasty manner in which the Evangelists must write, in the midst of their labours and dangers, may be an abundant excuse for setting things down as they came into mind.

And it deserves to be seriously considered, whether what of difficulty remains from the agreement of Mark and Luke in the order of their stories, where they both differ from Matthew, may not easily be accounted for by supposing that Luke took Mark for the ground-work of his Gospel, and contented himself with changing his language into purer Greek, and adding a great number of important particulars, which had not been recounted by him, but which Luke collected from credible witnesses. (Compare Luke i. 1—4. where it is possible ἀνωθεν may refer to early facts omitted by Mark.) This seems rather more probable, than that Mark was an abridgment of Luke; which might be another hypothesis for solving the objection.

LECTURE CXL.

SCHOLIUM 6.

An objection, nearly akin to the former, is taken from the difference there is between the quotations from the Old Testament, as they stand in the New, and the original; which must at least have argued some failure in the memory of the apostles.—This Mr. Whiston answers, by supposing that wherever there is a variation, the Jews have corrupted the present copies of the Old Testament, on purpose to disparage the New: but we wave this, for reasons given in Prop. 107. nor will it be sufficient to say the apostles quoted from the Seventy, since all their quotations do not exactly agree with that, nor indeed perfectly with each other. Compare Matt. xiii. 14, 15. Mark iv. 12. Luke viii. 10. John xii. 40. Acts xxviii. 26. Rom. xi. 8. in which Isa. vi. 9, 10. is quoted or referred to with some variety. We, therefore, choose rather to allow that this is indeed an objection against their being under a plenary inspiration of suggestion; but forasmuch as they nowhere assert that their quotations were literally exact, they might be under a superintendent inspiration, if the sense were as they represent it, wherever they argue from the quotation; and as for other passages, which are only introduced by way of allusion, (as many evidently are,) it was much less requisite the quotations should be exact there. We may also observe, That the variety with which the Fathers quote the same texts both from the Old Testament and New, is a further argument against Mr. Whiston's hypothesis; and indeed it appears that the most accurate writers among the ancient Classics vary in many places from the originals they quote, which, considering the form of their books, is no wonder.

It has been urged as the strongest objection of all, That the apostles often argue from passages in the Old Testament, where not only the words, but the original sense, appears so different from the purpose to which it is produced, that it were unreasonable to imagine the argument conclusive, and consequently the superintendency of their inspiration plenary; since they assert it as a fact, that the things to which they apply such and such passages were referred to in them, of which the following quotations, among many others, are a specimen: Matt. i. 23; ii. 15, 18, 23; viii. 17; xxvii. 9, 10. Gal. iii. 16.—To this it is answered,

1. That in several of these passages the reasoning of the apostles appears to be well founded, as we have endeavoured to show in our notes upon them, and as will frequently appear upon the justest principles of analogy, even where the direct reference is not so apparent. To which it is to be added, That where the original meaning of a passage on the whole appears dubious, the sense given by an apostle is certainly to be preferred to another, which, from examining the text alone, might appear equally probable, especially considering how indeterminate many forms in speaking used in the Hebrew language are, and how great an obscurity lies upon many passages in the Old Testament, and may well be expected in prophetic writings. See Prop. 112. Cor. 2.

2. The phrase, This was fulfilled, or this was done that it might be fulfilled, (though Mr. Peirce makes a great distinction between these two,) does not always imply that the passage referred to was a prediction of the event; but only that the event recorded was attended with such circumstances, as that the prophecy quoted upon the occasion might, with great propriety of expression, be accommodated to it; and in this solution we choose to acquiesce, rather than to say that the misapplication of prophecies might be consistent with plenary inspiration as to the truth of facts; for, as we shall afterwards more particularly observe, the understanding the prophecies of the Old Testament was a miraculous gift, imparted not only to the apostles, but to other Christians inferior to them; and many have thought it to be the word of knowledge spoken of in 1 Cor. xii. 8.

SCHOLIUM 8.

There is a great deal of reason to believe that many things contained in the New Testament were written by an inspiration of suggestion; since the apostles sometimes expressly assert that they received what they wrote by revelation from Christ; and this is peculiarly applicable to the prophetic part of their writings.—Compare Eph. iii. 3, 5. Gal. i. 12. 1 Cor. ii. 10, &c.; xi. 23. It is also exceedingly probable that they were frequently instructed in an extraordinary manner, not only as to the matter about which they wrote, but likewise as to the language they should use, 1 Cor. ii. 13. and whoever peruses their writings attentively, will find they frequently express themselves, even when they wrote upon particular occasions, in phrases of such latitude and extent, as would make their writings abundantly more useful to Christians in all succeeding ages, than they could have been, had they confined themselves closely to the particular occasion, as some who have paraphrased their writings have done: a circumstance in which it is probable they had a particular divine direction, and upon observing which, the just interpretation of their writings will greatly depend; but it does not seem reasonable to believe that every word which the apostles wrote was dictated to them by an immediate revelation; for (as was before observed) there are not only many things which they might have written without such a revelation, but, moreover, on such an hypothesis there could have been no room at all for such a distinction as the apostle makes, 1 Cor. vii. 10, 12, 25. between what he and what the Lord says; nor could we suppose that, if this had been the case, they would ever have quoted the words of the Old Testament otherwise than exactly as they were written, or that they could ever have spoken with that uncertainty, with which they sometimes express themselves as to some future events, 1 Cor. xvi. 5, 6. compared with 2 Cor. i. 15—17. Rom. xv. 24, 28. compare also 1 Cor. i. 14, 16; iv. 19; xvi. 7. Phil. ii. 19, 23, 24. 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15. 2 John ver. 12. 3 John ver. 14. It must also be acknowledged that there are some imperfections, and some peculiarities of style, which probably there would not have been, had the apostles always written by an inspiration of suggestion: yet this is upon the whole no dishonour to the sacred Scriptures; since by this means they are more adapted to answer their general end, as containing surer marks of their genuineness, and laying open the heart and character of the persons by whom they were written more effectually than they could have done, had these writers been

LECTURE CXLI.

DEFINITION LXXVII.

Where supernatural GIFTS and POWERS are spoken of as distinct, the former may express some inward illumination, and the latter some extraordinary effect produced by God, in consequence of some word or action of that person, to whom the power is said to belong.

PROPOSITION CXVII.

To take a more particular survey of the gifts and powers of the apostles, according to that account of them which is given in the New Testament.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

SECT. I. The chief of their spiritual GIFTS (perhaps so called in allusion to Psal. lxviii. 18. compared with Eph. iv. 7. 8.) are most particularly enumerated 1 Cor. xii. 8—10. and seem most probable to have been thus distinguished.—There was,

1. THE WORD OF WISDOM, or a full and clear understanding of the whole scheme of Christian doctrines, whereby they were able to make men wise to salvation, 1 Cor. ii. 6. 7. Eph. iii. 10. compare 2 Pet. iii. 15. This fitted them to make the most perfect declaration of the Gospel; on account of which the apostles are represented as under Christ the foundation of the Christian Church, Eph. ii. 20. Rev. xxi. 14. comp. Matt. xvi. 18.

Bens. Prop. of Chris. vol. i. p. 10. Chand. on Joel, p. 133. Barrington's Misc. Sacra. Ess. i. p. 39. Warb. Ser. vol. i. p. 211.

2. THE WORD OF KNOWLEDGE, which Lord Barrington and Dr. Benson think to have consisted in an extraordinary ability to understand and explain the sense and design of the Old Testament, and especially its reference to Christ and his gospel; compare Rom. xvi. 25, 26. 1 Pet. i. 11, 12. Rom. ii. 20. 1 Tim. vi. 20. By this gift they were freed from those prejudices which they had imbibed, relating to the perpetuity of the Mosaic law, and the temporal grandeur of the Messiah's kingdom; by this their want of skill in the original Hebrew, or of acquaintance with the Greek version, was supplied; and they were enabled to remove scruples arising in the minds of the Jews, and to clear up and set in the strongest light that part of the evidence of Christianity which depended upon their Scriptures. Barring. Ess. p. 42. Bens. ib. p. 46.

That this was given to the apostles and primitive Christians is certain; but that it was called the word of knowledge, seems not fully proved by the quotations above. Dr. Chandler supposes that the word of knowledge was but a lower degree of the word of wisdom; i. e. a capacity of discovering the Christian scheme with a convincing evidence to the minds of others; and quotes Rom. xv. 14. 1 Cor. i. 5, 6. 2 Cor. ii. 14; viii. 7. Eph. i. 17, 18. with some other Scriptures for that purpose.

Chand. on Joel, p. 150, &c. Warb. ubi supra.

3. They had the gift of DISCERNING SPIRITS, i. e. of knowing by what spirit a man spoke who pretended to inspiration, of knowing the secrets of men's hearts in some instances, and judging of the fitness of a person's genius and character for any particular office and station in the church; but Dr. Chandler explains it only of the former, referring the latter effects to prophecy.

Bens. ib. p. 48. Stebbing ag. Fost. Let. 2. p. 40. Fost. 2d Lett. to Stebb. Chand. on Joel, p. 142.

4. They had also the gift of PROPHECY, in that superior degree which related to foretelling future, or discovering secret, events; and in that inferior sense of the word in which it is often used to express officiating in public worship, by preaching, prayer, or singing.—1 Cor. xiv. pass. præs. ver. 24, 25.

Bens. ib. p. 70. Chand. on Joel, p. 138.

5. They had also the gift of TONGUES, or an ability of readily and intelligibly speaking a variety of languages which they had never learnt; which (though infamously represented by Morgan) was a most glorious and important attestation of the Gospel, as well as a suitable, and indeed, in their circumstances, a necessary, furniture for the mission for which the apostles and their assistants were designed. Nor is there any reason with Dr. Middleton to understand it as merely an occasional gift, so that a person might speak a language most fluently one hour, and be entirely ignorant of it the next; which neither agrees with what is said of the abuse of it, nor would have been sufficient to answer the end proposed.

* The style of the New Testament has been a great object of examination and debate. Mr. Anthony Blackwall in his celebrated work, entitled, The Sacred Classics defended and illustrated, has endeavoured to support the purity, propriety, and elegance of the language used by the apostolical and evangelical writers. Dr. Campbell is of a different opinion, and has made some particular strictures on Mr. Blackwall's positions. The Doctor has likewise, concerned himself in the nature of the style of the New Testament, and its peculiar dialect. See the Preliminary Dissertations to his Translation of the Four Gospels, Vol. i. p. 1. ib. p. 32. The language of the New Testament is otherwise treated of very copiously, and in a critical view, by Michaelis, Introd. vol. i. p. 97. For Mr. Marsh's notes, see ib. p. 88.

6. They had also the gift of interpreting tongues; so that in a mixed assembly, consisting of persons of different nations, if one spoke in a language understood by one part, another could repeat and translate what he said into different languages understood by others.—Whether these versions were made of the whole discourse when ended, or sentence by sentence, we cannot certainly say; but if the latter method were used, it would not seem so strange to them as to us, if we may credit the account given of the method of interpreting the Scripture in the Jewish synagogues.—Vid. 1 Cor. xiv. 5, 6, 13.

Jones's Jew. Ant. § 318, and 334. MS. Benson, ib. p. 60. Chand. on Jud. p. 146.

Some have supposed that Paul had a gift peculiar to himself, i. e. of knowing in some cases what passed in his absence, as well as if he had been present, 1 Cor. v. 3, 4. Col. ii. 5. compare 2 Kings v. 25, 26; vi. 8—12. but it is certain this did not habitually reside in him; as indeed it is uncertain, whether many of the most wonderful of these gifts and powers did without interruption dwell in any mere man whatsoever. Compare John iii. 34.

SECT. II. The most considerable miraculous POWERS of the apostles were these:—

1. The power of inflicting supernatural punishments, and even death itself, by a word speaking, on bold and daring offenders.—Vid. Acts v. 1—11. xiii. 10, 11. 2 Cor. x. 6, 8, 9, xiii. 2, 3, 10. and as evil angels might sometimes be the instruments of inflicting these temporal judgments, it is probable these may be referred to when persons are said to be by the apostles delivered to Satan.—1 Cor. v. 4, 5. 1 Tim. i. 20.

Benson, ib. vol. i. p. 52. Bar. Ess. ii. p. 51.

2. The apostles seem to have been endowed with an extraordinary degree of fortitude, far beyond what they naturally had; but necessary for the scenes of extraordinary difficulty and suffering through which they were to pass.—Acts ii. 36; iv. 5—13, 19, 33; v. 28, &c. viii. 1.

Benson, ib. p. 61. Gentlemen's Ex. Reason, p. 35.

Their extraordinary degree of sincerity, diligence, and activity, patience, love to men's souls, and other uncommon virtues and graces, might also be mentioned as further illustrating this head.

Barrington, ib. p. 47.

3. The apostles had also a power of performing the most extraordinary cures, and even of raising the dead; and some of these kinds of miracles which were not peculiar to them, were wrought by them in a superior manner.—Vid. Acts v. 15; ix. 36—42. xix. 11, 12. xx. 12. Barrington, ib. p. 53.

4. The apostles had also a power (which, as it seems, was peculiar to themselves) of giving the miraculous gifts of the Spirit to others by laying on their hands; and there were very few who received it otherwise than by that means.—Acts viii. 14—19. John xiv. 12. Rom. i. 11, 12. 2 Tim. i. 6. Gal. iii. 2, 3, 5. 1 Thess. i. 5; v. 19, 20. 1 Cor. i. 4—7. 2 Cor. xii. 12, 13. Acts xix. 1—7. For the further illustration of this, Dr. Benson has asserted that the Holy Ghost never fell immediately on any but our Lord after his baptism, and the apostles, first on the day of Pentecost, and a second time mentioned Acts iv. 31. on the Eunuch, Acts viii. 39. (according to the Alexandrian reading,) on Saul after his baptism, on the first-fruits of the devout Gentiles before baptism, Acts x. 44. and on the first-fruits of the idolatrous Gentiles of Antioch in Pisidia, Acts xiii. 52.—but the instance of the Eunuch, with that of the devout Gentiles, is precarious; and indeed the case of the Gentiles at Antioch seems to be far from so extraordinary a one as Dr. Benson would make it; and the foundation for supposing it so, i. e. the different periods for preaching the Gospel to the devout, and then to the idolatrous, Gentiles, is a mere unsupported hypothesis. That the phrase of being filled with the Holy Ghost does not signify any thing so singular as he supposes, appears from comparing Eph. v. 18. and many other places where the phrase is used.—See Fam. Expos. vol. iii. on the places cited above.

LECTURE CXLII

COROLLARY 1.

It does not seem reasonable to mention the power which the apostles had of binding and loosing, of remitting or retaining sins, as a gift or power distinct from the preceding (compare Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18. John xx. 23.); for if this be understood of declaring in an authentic manner what was lawful under the Christian dispensation, they were furnished with that by the word of wisdom, with which therefore this gift or power taken in this sense would coincide:—if it be taken for inflicting or removing calamities sent as miraculous punishments of sin, it will coincide with that power mentioned § 2. gr. 1, 3.; and if it should be explained of declaring to particular persons that their sins were forgiven, they could only do it by virtue of their extraordinary gift of discerning spirits, § 1. gr.

3. whereby they would be able to judge of the sincere faith and repentance of the person concerned. Bens. ib. p. 50, &c.

COROLLARY 2.

This particular survey of the extraordinary furniture of the apostles for their work, confirms the arguments advanced above to prove the inspiration of their writings, which appear in fact to have been intended for the service and guidance of the church in all future ages. To this Dr. Morgan has objected, That as these gifts were plainly capable of abuse, (compare 1 Cor. xiv.) no argument could from thence be drawn as to the divine inspiration of those who were possessed of them; but, in answer to this, we must distinguish with respect to these gifts and powers. The word of wisdom and of knowledge, as explained above, could not be abused as occasion of error, the truth of the things taught being essential to the exercise of the gifts themselves, and false pretences to them being discovered by that of discerning spirits. The gift of healing was not a permanent thing (compare Prop. 116. Schol. 3. sub fin.); and as for the gift of speaking with tongues, the miracle of that lay in conferring it by imposition of hands, not in using it after it was conferred. So that, on the whole, there is no foundation to believe that any miraculous gifts or powers were used in confirmation of falsehood in any case, though they might be used in confirmation of truth by very bad men; which is all that is insinuated, Matt. vii. 22. Compare for further illustration, Gal. iii. 2, 5. Rom. xvi. 18. 1 Cor. iv. 18—20. 2 Cor. xii. 12. et sim. Col. ii. 4. Jude ver. 16. which passages, when compared together, further show, or intimate, that miraculous works or powers were peculiar to the teachers of truth.

Morg. Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 80. Chapm. ag. Morg. vol. i. p. 300. Lel. ag. Morg. vol. i. c. xiii. p. 374. Bens. on Epist. vol. i. App. to 1 Tim.

As for 2 Thess. ii. 9. it seems the words in question might be rendered lying signs, wonders, and miracles, i. e. fictitious and pretended miracles, such as the Romish church has apparently dealt in; and Matt. xxiv. 24. evidently relates to false teachers in the early ages of Christianity, when there was a superior miraculous power in the church; such perhaps as Elymas and Simon Magus; so that, by the way, there is no proof from Scripture of any miracles having been wrought to confirm falsehood, which have not been opposed by superior miracles; nor can any one prove that this shall ever be the case, as was in part intimated above, Prop. 94. Schol. 2. Bens. ubi supra, 142.

COROLLARY 3.

If it could be certainly made out, which I apprehend it cannot, that there is an irreconcilable difference between any circumstances in the history, and that there was so in the original, it would (cæt. par.) on those principles seem most reasonable to adjust the testimony of those who were not apostles by that of those who were, according to Sir Isaac Newton's scheme of the harmony; for it is not so certain that Peter reviewed Mark's Gospel, and Paul Luke's, as that Matthew and John were the authors of those published under their name (vid. Prop. 116. gr. 8.); and the concurrence of Mark and Luke in their order, can be no just objection to this, especially if the conjecture ib. Sch. 5. sub finem be admitted.

Dodd. Diss. on Newt. Harm. ap. Pam. Lxpos. vol. iii. App. No. iii. Sir I. Newt. on Proph. lib. i. c. xi.

COROLLARY 4.

As the endowments of the apostles were so extraordinary and peculiar, there is no reason to believe they had any proper successors in the Christian church, unless it can be proved there are some who succeeded to their gifts and powers, by which they were furnished for their extraordinary work.

Boyse's Works, vol. ii. p. 274. Barr. Misc. Sac. vol. ii. Ess. ii. pass.

COROLLARY 5.

The whole foundation of Popery, as a distinct religion, is therefore overthrown; since that not only supposes the contrary to the preceding corollary, but also adds a great many other suppositions still more extravagant: for, (as we shall elsewhere more largely show,) there is no evidence that Peter had any superiority over the rest of the apostles: or if he had, that he had any who were his successors in that extraordinary power; or that those successors were Roman bishops; or that the present bishop of Rome is legally by succession possessed of it; yet all these things, some of which are notoriously false, and others of such a nature that they can never be proved to be true on their own principles, must be taken for granted, before that authority of declaring the sense of Scripture can be vindicated, which the church of Rome has arrogated to herself, and upon which her other most extravagant claims and most absurd doctrines are founded.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Several of the gifts and powers mentioned in the proposition, appear to have been imparted to Christians of inferior order, not only to prophets, evangelists, elders, or bishops, and other teachers, but also to those who made up the congregations under their care; particularly the gift of prophecy, that of speaking with and interpreting tongues, and discerning spirits: with regard to the former of which Dr. Benson thinks some are called Helps; and, with regard to the latter, Governments, as they were called, to assist both in instructing and guiding of the church. 1 Cor. xii. 8—10, 28. though Dr. Chandler is of opinion, that the helps were persons of extraordinary liberality, raised up by God to be helpful to others by their own generous contributions; and that the governments were deacons, whose business it was to preside over the distribution of charities;—Acts vi. 3. Rom. xvi. 2. which may considerably illustrate Rom. xii. 8. Dr. Benson thinks it probable that there were few, if any, in the primitive church, who did not receive these gifts, though perhaps they might all of them meet in none but the apostles, to whom the word of wisdom seems to have been peculiar.

Bens. on Proph. vol. i. p. 66. Barr. Ess. vol. i. p. 118; ibid. p. 74. Chandler on Joel, p. 131.

SCHOLIUM 2.

There is a difficulty attending the gift of the interpretation of tongues, which has not been observed by those who have written upon the subject, and may here deserve our notice; viz. how a person speaking with tongues should need to pray that he might interpret, (1 Cor. xiv. 13.) without supposing that he spoke by such a miraculous impulse as rendered him merely the organ of the Spirit of God, which would be inconsistent with our answer to Morgan, under the second corollary. It is obvious to answer, That there might be persons in an audience of various nations, and consequently the person speaking (supposing to both Romans and Persians, himself being a Greek speaking Latin) might not be able to interpret to them all, as in the given instance into Persian; but then it may be answered, this was for want of another tongue, which is not here supposed to be the case; and, therefore, perhaps it will be impossible fully to remove the difficulty, without supposing there were some who, though they could speak no tongue but their own, were yet miraculously enabled to interpret into it what should be spoken in any other tongue, which would make this office, though it were only bearing a secondary part, very excellent, and the gift itself very extraordinary. Chandler on Joel, ubi sup.

LECTURE CXLIII

PROPOSITION CXVIII.

The Old Testament was written by a superintendent inspiration.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 110. 1. Moses was a person raised up by God for eminent service, favoured with miraculous powers and frequent divine revelations, on the authority with which his whole law was introduced and received. Hurt on Mos. vol. ii. p. 88.

2. The work which Moses undertook of writing the history, not only of his own acts and institutions, but also the dispensations of God to mankind in preceding ages, was a work of great importance, and of such difficulty, that without extraordinary divine assistance he would not have been able to perform it in such a manner as might have been depended upon, and consequently might have answered the design.

1, 2, 3. There is reason to believe that Moses wrote by a superintendent inspiration.

4. Joshua, Samuel, David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonas, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, were all prophets, if the historical part of the Old Testament is to be believed (which we proved above, Prop. 110.); and, therefore, we have reason to believe that their minds were so superintended in writing not only those historical facts which they mention, but likewise those messages which many of them declare they received from God, as that they should be preserved at least from all material mistakes, which would have brought a disgrace upon those messages which in the name of God they delivered, and so have frustrated the design of them; which in many cases could not have been answered, without an exact transmission of them to posterity, as several of those predictions referred to distant, and some of them to very complicated, events, and contain particular circumstances, which, if not exactly authentic, must have been very hazardous.

5. Many discourses recorded in the historical parts of these writings, as delivered by others, or given to them in charge by God, were so long and so circumstantial, that they could not be exactly recorded without some extraordinary divine assistance; and some of the most important of them, i. e. those relating to the Messiah, were not understood by the prophets themselves who delivered them, (1 Pet. i. 10—12.) and consequently were less likely to be remembered with such exactness as, according to gr. b. was necessary.

6. Ezra and Nehemiah were persons of such eminent stations and piety, and so intimately conversant with the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, that we may reasonably believe that proper assistances, either ordinary or extraordinary, as the case required, would be given them in their writings.

7. Though the authors of the books of Judges, Ruth, and Kings, Chronicles, Esther, and Job, should be allowed to be unknown, there is great reason to believe they were some of those holy and prophetic men with which the nation of the Jews did so much abound; and that what was said under the preceding steps may with considerable probability be applied to them, at least in some degree.

Prop. 110. 8. The provision that was made for conducting the Jewish people by divine oracles, given (though we know not particularly how) by the Urim and Thummim, and by prophets raised up in almost every age, makes it highly probable, that those who were providentially employed in transmitting to us the history of that nation, would have some peculiar assistance, greater than could (cæt. par.) be expected in other writers.

3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. 9. So far as we are able to judge, from surveying the particular characters and circumstances of the authors of the various books of the Old Testament, in comparison with the genius of that dispensation under which they lived and wrote, there is reason to believe they were under a superintendent inspiration.

10. Though it be extremely difficult to conclude from any excellency in the style and manner of writing, that a book is divinely inspired, and especially that there is that superintendency over the whole of it,—yet we must acknowledge, that in the books of the Old Testament, as well as the New, there are such important truths, such sublime figures, and such majestic and pathetic expressions, as can hardly be equalled any where else, and which appear so worthy of God, as to give some degree of additional weight to the other arguments brought upon this head.—Compare Prop. 110. gr. 3.

Nichols's Conf. vol. iv. p. 139. Boyle's Style of Script. p. 7.

11. The ancient Jews had a tradition among them, that these books were written by divine inspiration; and therefore received them as canonical, i. e. as a rule of faith and manners.

Joseph. contr. App. lib. i. p. 1036, Col. 1333, Huds.

12. The grand argument of all is, that Christ and his apostles were so far from accusing the Jews of superstition, in the regard which they paid to the writings of the Old Testament, (vid. gr. 11.) or from charging the Scribes and Pharisees (whom Christ, on all proper occasions, censured so freely) with having introduced into the sacred volume mere human compositions, that, on the contrary, they not only recommend the diligent and constant perusal of them, as of the greatest importance to men's eternal happiness, but speak of them as divine oracles, and as written by an extraordinary influence of the Divine Spirit upon the minds of the authors. Vid. John v. 39; x. 35. Mark xii. 24. Matt. iv. 4, 7, 10; v. 17, 18; xxi. 42; xxii. 29, 31, 43; xxiv. 15; xxvi. 54, 56. Luke i. 67, 69, 70; x. 26, 27. xxi. 31. Acts iv. 25; xvii. 11; xviii. 24—28. Rom. iii. 2; xv. 4; xvi. 26. Gal. iii. 8. 1 Tim. v. 17, 18. 2 Tim. iii. 14—17. James ii. 8; iv. 5. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. 2 Pet. i. 19—21. To this list may be added many other places, on the whole more than five hundred, in which the sacred writers of the New Testament quote and argue from those of the Old, in such a manner as they would not surely have done, if they had apprehended there were room to allege that it contained at least a mixture of what was spurious and of no authority. Lowth on Insp. p. 183.

9, 10, 11, 12. 13. There is reason to believe that books written by such persons, under such a dispensation, and in such a manner as has been described, received with such unanimous regard by the Jewish church, and recommended in such a manner by Christ and his apostles, were written by a superintendent inspiration. Q. E. D.

Jenk. on Chris. vol. i. p. 226. part ii. c. ii. p. 228. Fam. Expos. vol. iii. App. No. iii. Posth. p. 61.

COROLLARY 1.

Comparing this with Prop. 116. it appears that the whole Scripture received by the reformed is divinely inspired.

COROLLARY 2.

Hence it will further follow, that in all our inquiries into the nature and will of God, and the genius and design of the Christian dispensation, the Scripture will be our surest rule, and no merely human composures are to be received with an equal degree of regard.

Chillingw. Safe Way. Middl. Intr. Disc. p. 67.

COROLLARY 3.

From comparing the demonstration of this proposition with that given Prop. 116. it will appear that the proof we have of the inspiration of the New Testament is, on the whole, considerably greater than that which we have of the inspiration of the Old, if from thence we subtract that grand argument which arises from the testimony of Christ and his apostles; but setting that aside, there will be the strongest evidence of the inspiration of those books on which the proof of Christianity most immediately depends; since that generally follows from the truth of the historical part of those books, and of their genuineness, which was before confirmed; for the prophets assert it as a matter of fact, that God gave them such and such revelations.

COROLLARY 4.

From gr. 12. we may certainly infer, that for any to pretend to exalt the character of Christ and of Paul as divine teachers, while at the same time they pour contempt upon the Jewish institutions as a foolish and impious forgery, is a notorious contradiction and absurdity; and common sense will teach us, that such authors, whatever they may profess, do equally intend the subversion of the Old Testament and the New.

Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. v. ad fin. Lel. ag. Marg vol. i. c. iii. p. 80.

SCHOLIUM 1.

We do readily allow, that there was a great variety in the degrees of inspiration in the different books and passages of the Old Testament: there is great reason to believe that the prophecies were written by an inspiration of suggestion; for many of them were so circumstantial, and the particular expressions of them so important, that we cannot imagine that God revealed only to his servants some general thoughts, v. g. that Babylon should be destroyed, Jerusalem rebuilt, and the like, leaving them to enlarge upon it as they thought fit, for then they might easily have fallen into certain expressions, which, not being exactly answered, might have brought a reflection upon the truth of the whole. Nevertheless, it is highly probable that in these suggestions, God might sometimes, and in less critical and important circumstances, leave them to follow their own way of conception and expression, to such a degree as might occasion such a variety of style as critics justly remark in different books. Five Let. on Insp. p. 13.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The arguments used Prop. 116. Schol. 1. to prove the inspiration of the New Testament to be a plenary superintendency, may in a great measure be applied to the Old, as we before observed: and it is hard to imagine that Christ and his apostles would have spoken of it in such high strains, if there had been a mixture of error and falsehood with the great and important truths it contained: nevertheless, there are so many arguments brought against the plenary inspiration of these books, from the supposed absurdities, immoralities, and contradictions, to be found in them, that it will be necessary to give some of them a more particular consideration in the following propositions.

LECTURE CXLIV

PROPOSITION CXIX.

To enumerate and vindicate some of the principal of those passages in the Old Testament, which are objected against as absurd.

SOLUTION.

SECT. 1. Many absurdities are charged upon the Mosaic account of the Creation, v. g. the making light before the sun; the dividing the water above and below the firmament by an imaginary solid partition, and the making the sun, moon, and stars, in one day; not here to mention the objection which is brought against the descent of the whole human race from one pair.

To this Dr. Thomas Burnet answers, in his Theory, by cutting the knot; and maintains that this account was merely a fable, though according to his own representation of it, a fable too absurd for a wise man, and much more for an inspired person, to have thrown together; and Dr. Middleton, in his controversy with the bishop of London, has declared himself strongly in the same sentiments: but there can surely be no reason to believe this, since Moses never tells us where his fable ends, and where his true history begins,—especially considering that Christ and his apostles refer to the story of the Creation, and that of the Fall, (which is inseparably connected with it, and treated by Burnet as a tale equally absurd,) not as an allegory, but a true history, 2 Cor. iv. 6; xi. 3. 1 Cor. xv. 45. Matt. xix. 4, 5. 1 Tim. ii. 13, 14. 1 Cor. xi. 8, 9. and it is very harsh to suppose that God would so solemnly from Mount Sinai make the circumstance of a fable the foundation of the fourth commandment.—Ex. xx. 11. Heb. iv. 3, 4.

Burn. Archæol. l. ii. c. viii. ix. p. 403.

Dr. David Jennings, in a very ingenious discourse on this subject, supposes that the sun and the stars were created before the earth, and that the production of light, mentioned as the work of the first day, was only giving the earth its diurnal motion, expressed, as he understands it, by "the Spirit of God moving," not "upon the face of the water," but "moving the face of the deep," i. e. the surface of the unenlightened hemisphere; which might be called deep, either as remote from the sun, or in a more fluid state than that hemisphere which might have been turned towards it, and thereby dried and crusted (which last, by the way, seems ill to agree with Gen. i. 9, 10. Psal. civ. 6—9). He supposes that on the fourth day God gave the earth its annual motion, and thereby appointed those luminaries of Heaven, before created and before visible, to be for signs and seasons, and days and years; so that as the sun did, in another manner than before, rule over the day, making it unequal in different seasons, &c. the moon did with correspondent variety rule over the night and the stars. but it may be objected to the scheme,

1. That such an interpretation offers great violence to several phrases in the history, v. g. God's moving on the face of the water, his saying "Let there be light," his making two lights, and setting them in the firmament of Heaven, and appointing them to have dominion over the day, and over the night. To which we may add, that the moon could not with any tolerable propriety be said to begin to have dominion over the stars, when that little alteration was made in her course, which the annual motion added to the diurnal occasions.

2. That the diurnal and annual motion of the earth being each, if not both together, impressed in a moment, would hardly be described as each of them the work of a distinct day, as the latter especially must be on this hypothesis; for it would be very unreasonable to suppose that, when it is said God made the sun and moon, that clause should import the creation and formation of the moon, and only the alteration of the earth's motion with regard to the sun;—not to insist upon it,

3. That if the laws of gravity took place, a projectile force must always have been necessary, to prevent the centripetal from prevailing so far as to draw the earth into the sun.

Jenn. Append. to Astron.

Mr. Whiston supposes the Mosaic story to have been a kind of journal of what would have appeared to the eye of a spectator upon the surface of the earth; and interprets the making of the sun, moon, and stars, to have been only the gradual clearing of the atmosphere of that comet, of which, according to his hypothesis, the earth was made; this defecation beginning the first day, produced some light, and increasing to the fourth, the sun, moon, and stars, then became visible and distinct; but this seems to be connected with that very absurd part of his theory, which supposes that the earth had at first no diurnal motion, but that it was impressed by the comet which occasioned the Deluge; otherwise we can never imagine that the sun, moon, and stars, bodies of such different degrees of magnitude and light, would have become visible the same natural day.

Whiston's Theory, pras. p. 3. Edw. Everett No. i. p. 1.

It seems, therefore, that the most probable hypothesis is that of Dr. Nichols, who supposes, first, a chaotic state of the whole solar system; then, a separation of the grosser particles of matter, of which the primary and secondary planets were to consist; whence it would follow, that the luminous particles before blended and entangled with these, would acquire a greater lustre, which he supposes the creation of light in its most imperfect state. By the waters above the firmament, he understands the atmospheres or seas of the planets, though they may mean no more than vapours floating in the expanse of the air, as the original word רקיע signifies. On the fourth day, he supposes the luminous particles, before more equally dispersed, were gathered in one central body; whereby the little planet near us became, by the reflection of its rays, a moon: which, being the most considerable of the nocturnal luminaries, might, by a beautiful figure, be said to rule over the night and the stars, allowing it very probable that the fixed stars, and planetary systems which may possibly attend them, were created before. It may possibly be objected against this hypothesis, that at this rate there would be no distinction between day and night before the fourth day; since this imperfect luminous matter, equally diffused on every side, would give the whole terrestrial globe a kind of equable and universal twilight. It would, therefore, be an improvement upon the hypothesis, to suppose that the luminous particles were from the first gradually turning towards the centre, though not united in it; the consequence of which would be, that the hemisphere nearest the centre would then be lighter than the other. Bishop Patrick thinks a luminous mass distinct from the sun, and nearer the earth, was first formed, which, on the fourth day, was, perhaps, with some alteration to us unknown, changed into the sun.

Patrick on Gen. i. 3.

The chief objection against this scheme is, that it does not naturally offer itself to the mind from reading the Mosaic account; but it may be replied, It is sufficient, if by any interpretation it can be shown that it might possibly have been true: and it would appear an argument of great wisdom in Moses, or indeed of extraordinary divine direction, for him, prepossessed as he probably was, in favour of the vulgar hypothesis, to give such an account of the creation as should neither directly assert it, nor yet so much shock it, as to throw the minds of ignorant and unlearned men into speculations, which might have been detrimental to his grand design, of confirming them in the belief of one Almighty Creator of Heaven and Earth, and so preserving them from idolatry.

On the whole, supposing that none of these hypotheses should be satisfactory, the objection pretends to no more than this, That God did not observe such a proportion as we should have expected in some of his works; but it ill becomes us to limit him in such a circumstance, especially as we know not certainly what great ends either in the natural or moral world might be answered by a deviation from it.

LECTURE CXLV.

Sect. II. It is said that the Mosaic account of the Fall is absurd: not only as it represents God as suspending the happiness of mankind on so trifling a circumstance as his eating the fruit, but also supposes a brute to speak, and yet Eve to have taken no alarm at it, and out of regard to what such a creature said, to have violated the divine command, and to have been guilty of a weakness which in the perfection of human nature, of which few of her descendants in the present degeneracy of it would be capable.

Ans. As for the offence in question, it may be shown elsewhere, that how light soever it might be in itself, there were circumstances of most enormous aggravation attending it, which might abundantly justify God in the punishment inflicted on account of it. To the latter part of the objection, which is indeed the chief difficulty, some (with Abarbinel) have replied, that the serpent only spoke by his actions, eating the fruit in the presence of Eve, and seemed rather refreshed and animated than injured by it; but we wave this: nor do we choose to say, with Mr. Joseph Mede, that she took the serpent for a wise though fallen angel, who might know more of the nature of this new-formed world than she, and could have no principle of enmity against her, to lead him to wish her destruction. Neither do we say, with Dr. Thomas Burnet, at Boyle's Lectures, (after Tennison,) that she took him for some attendant spirit, sent from God to revoke the prohibition before given. It seems more probable that the fact might be, as it is beautifully represented by Milton, i. e. that the serpent, being actuated by an evil spirit, might pretend to have gained reason and speech by that fruit, and thence might infer, with some plausible appearance of argument, that if it was capable of producing so wonderful a change in him, it might exalt the human nature even to divinity. Sect. III. Others have objected against the sentence pronounced on Eve and the serpent as absurd—seeing the woman could not but with pain bring forth, nor the serpent go otherwise than upon his breast, nor indeed be justly punished at all for a crime of which he was only the innocent instrument.

As to what relates to the woman's bringing forth, we answer,

1. That it is not absolutely impossible that some alteration might be made in the structure of the womb on that occasion; perhaps a small alteration might suffice, considering with how little difficulty most women in hot countries go through their labour; or,

2. God, knowing that the Fall would happen, might constitute things in such a manner as to suit a fallen state, when the event was not to take place till after sin was committed; which seems to have been the case as to other instances, v. g. the damage done by poisonous and voracious animals, thunder, lightning, and tempests, &c.

As to that part of the objection which relates to the serpent, it is probable his form might be considerably changed, perhaps from that of a winged animal; and as this would be the means of confirming the faith of the penitents in their expected victory over the great enemy, (of which it was indeed a kind of miraculous attestation,) and of mortifying that evil spirit whose organ the serpent had been, there could be no injustice in this, nor indeed any cruelty; for beasts being designed for the use of men, we may as well grant that one species might be debased to a lower kind of life for his instruction and comfort, as that such multitudes of individuals should be daily sacrificed to his support.

Sect. IV. It is objected, That the Deluge could not possibly have been universal, because no stock of water could be found sufficient to overflow the earth to such a degree as Moses has represented.

To this we choose not to answer by denying the universality of the Deluge, as many have done, the words of Moses being so express, Gen. vi. 12, 13, 17, vii. 4, 19—23. and indeed if it were not universal, there would have been no need of an ark to preserve a race of men and beasts. To which we may add, that the animal and vegetable fossils, dug up in all parts of the world, are demonstrative proofs that the Deluge extended over the whole earth, and there is little room to doubt but the number of mankind, considering their longevity, would by that time have been abundantly sufficient to people the earth. We therefore rather reply by observing, That though the quantity of water which could naturally be furnished by rain should indeed be allowed insufficient for that purpose, yet it is possible, according to Dr. Burnet's scheme, that part of the outward crusts of the earth might be broken, and fall into the abyss, which might by that means be thrown up and dashed abroad to such a degree as to overthrow the highest mountains, which he thinks then first raised. Others, as Mr. Whiston, suppose that a comet (which his antagonist, Dr. Keil, was compelled by his arguments to acknowledge, did probably pass near the earth at that time) might overwhelm it by its atmosphere. Others endeavour to account for it, by supposing the centre of gravity was changed, or that the waters of the abyss were in an extraordinary manner drawn up on this occasion; but if none of these hypotheses be admitted, there is no absurdity in supposing a miraculous production of water, or a miraculous removal of it; since it is most certain, if the History of the Old Testament be credible, (as we have before proved,) miracles have been often wrought upon much less important occasions.

LECTURE CXLVI.

Sect. V. It is further objected, That an ark of such dimensions as Noah's could not hold creatures of all species, and the stock of provision for a whole year, which yet the history asserts. To this it is answered,

1. That we do not certainly know the exact length of the cubit by which the dimensions of the ark are computed; but,

2. Many critics have shown that, on the common computation of the cubit, the ark being 150 yards long, 251 broad, and 15 high, was at least about as large as one of our first rate men of war; nay, some say, as large as five of them; and they have endeavoured to prove, if it were so, that it might contain both the animals and their provision. The controversy is too large and nice to be represented here; but may be seen in a good abstract in

Sect. VI. Seeing the rainbow appears a phenomenon necessarily resulting from the nature of light, and the form and situation of drops of falling rain, it is represented as an absurdity, that Moses speaks of it as created after the flood, and as the sign of a covenant then made.

To this Dr. Burnet answers, by supposing that no rain fell before the flood; Mr. Whiston, by saying there were no such heavy showers as are requisite to the producing this phenomenon; but it seems more reasonable to believe, that God took a phenomenon before appearing, and appropriated it to a particular use, directing that it should be considered as his bow; and that when men saw it, they should recollect and rejoice in the assurance which he had given them, that the flood should never be repeated; and accordingly, the original of Gen. ix. 14. may be rendered "And when I bring a cloud over the earth, and the bow is seen in the cloud, I will also remember my covenant."

Sect. VII. It is further objected, That as the Mosaic History supposes all mankind descended from Noah, it will be impossible to account for the original of the blacks, admitting Noah and his wife to have been white.

Mr. Whiston answers this, by supposing that Ham was turned black upon his father's curse, as, according to him, Cain had before been; but if Gen. vi. 2. is to be understood (as it probably is) of the descendants of Seth and the daughters of Cain, that supposition is directly contrary to Moses's account:—at best it is a very precarious conjecture; and it seems more probable that the heat of the climate should have produced that change, or strength of imagination in some pregnant woman, which might as well blacken the whole skin of a child, for any thing we can perceive, as stain some particular part of its body, in the manner which it is plain in fact it often does.

† Lord Kames, in his ingenious discourse on the Supposed Antiquity of the Human Race, has contended for the original diversity of mankind

Sect. VIII. The peopling of America, and several islands, in which mischievous terrestrial animals are found, though many of the more useful were entirely wanting when they were first discovered by the Europeans, is urged as a strong argument against the universality of the Deluge, and therefore the credibility of the Mosaic History.

The supposition of a north-east passage for men might possibly be allowed; but how those wild creatures should be brought thither, which men could not transport, and which cannot subsist in a cold country, must remain a difficulty which we cannot undertake to solve, if the universality of the Deluge be allowed; for that there should have been so vast a tract of land in or near the Torrid Zone, as must have been necessary for the joining Africa to America, and that it is now sunk in the sea, is a mere hypothesis, which has not the least foundation in history; but it may deserve inquiry, how far it is an apparent fact that voracious animals, not amphibious, and living only in hot countries, are to be found in America. It is certain that some, to whose constitution a hot climate is most suited, will live in a colder, and sometimes propagate there; and that there are great degrees of heat in the summer months to a great height of northern latitude; which, when we consider the velocity with which these creatures run, may account for their travelling to some places where there might be a passage by water, or perhaps a passage by land, though since fallen into the sea, the straits of which are well known to be very narrow, where North America comes nearest to Tartary.

Sect. IX. The confusion of languages at the tower of Babel is represented by some as unnecessary, seeing a diversity of tongues must naturally have arisen in process of time; but it may be answered,

1. That so vast a diversity as there is in the names of the most common things, can hardly be accounted for in a natural way, there not being the least trace of any one common original language.

2. If it might in time naturally have happened, it cannot thence be inferred that a miracle, whereby it should instantaneously have been brought about at first, was therefore unworthy of God, and consequently incredible.

Others have replied, That all that passed at the building at Babel, referred to in this objection, was only a division of counsels and sentiments, or some discord in affection, represented by dividing their speech, whereas they were before unanimous; or at most, some disorder miraculously produced in their organs of speech, in consequence of which, their language would be unintelligible to each other: both which opinions the learned Vitringa has illustrated at large, though there does not seem any great necessity for having recourse to them.

Sect. X. Others have objected the impossibility of raising such an empire as the Assyrian is said to have been, within 150 years after Noah.

To this Sir Isaac Newton answers, by fixing the date of the Assyrian empire 1300 years later; and Dr. Winder has taken great pains to prove that the account we have of the series of the ancient Assyrian monarchs is very precarious. Sir Isaac's arguments are largely considered by Dr. Shuckford; who, by the way, supposes Noah to have been the Fohi of the Chinese, in which Mr. Whiston also agrees with him. Others make the distance between Noah and Nimrod to have been much greater than our copies of the Bible represent it. It is, perhaps, on the whole, most reasonable to conclude, that though the Assyrian empire was very ancient, yet the extraordinary accounts which Herodotus and Ctesias give us of the greatness of it under Ninus and Semiramis are fictitious, as many things related by those authors undoubtedly are.

Sect. XI. It is urged, That such a number of inhabitants, as are said to have dwelt in the land of Canaan, could not possibly have been supported there, viz. a million and a half of fighting men, (2 Sam. xxiv. 19. 1 Chron. xxi. 5.) nor such a stock

In opposition to this assertion, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, an American gentleman, has published An Essay on the Causes of the Variety of Complexion and Figure in the Human Species, so much to controversy to show, that all the varieties observable in that respect may easily be accounted for, by attending to the causes just now mentioned, and his efforts proposed in Hunter, by obscurity of remote ages, expense and several late, by dint, excessive and dissonance of living. I cannot but think will probably hereafter be thought on their common support by Mr. Marsden, who, we understand, is making it the subject of particular inquiry.

* Whoever shall inquire what manner America was originally peopled, has been the object of much discussion. A comprehensive view of the subject may be seen in the first volume of Dr. Robertson's History of America. The Historical and Geographical Dissertation of M. Pauw concerning the New World, do not appear to be highly considered. Recent navigations and discoveries have added further confirmation to the opinion, that America was peopled, at least in part, from the most eastern extremities of Asia and the north west of Europe.

† The accounts of Herodotus, though he was probably much misinformed, are by no means so absurd and extravagant as those of Ctesias.

of cattle be furnished out there, as are said to have been sacrificed, especially by Solomon at the dedication of the temple (viz. an hundred and twenty thousand sheep, and twenty-two thousand oxen, 1 Kings viii. 63). To this it may be answered, That, if there be no mistake in the numbers, it is to be ascribed to the extraordinary fruitfulness of the soil; to which it may be added, that as some neighbouring princes, who had been subdued by David, paid their tribute in cattle, they might furnish out the extraordinary sacrifice referred to. See 2 Kings iii. 4.

Maund. Trav. p. 65. Del. Life of Dav. in Loc. Univ. Hist. vol. ii. p. 386.

Sect. XII. It is urged as an impossibility, That David, notwithstanding all his conquests, should be able to amass those vast treasures mentioned in 1 Chron. xxix. 4, 7. which are computed by Le Clerc at eight hundred millions sterling: a sum, which is thought to exceed all the gold of all the princes upon earth put together. To this it is answered,

1. That the value of gold not being then so great with respect to silver as it now is, their wealth is not to be estimated merely by the quantity of gold which they had; and, on this principle, Mr. Whiston reduces the gold to less than one-tenth of the common computation, supposing its value to silver as their specific gravities, i. e. 19 : 11, whereas the former makes it 16 : 1.

2. There is reason to believe that a great quantity of the gold then used has long ago been destroyed and lost; yet it must be owned that more gold has probably been dug out of the mines in America in one year, than can wear out in many ages: but it is not unlikely that much may have been buried, and so have perished.

3. That there is a great deal of uncertainty in the principles on which the worth of those talents is computed; as appears from the different accounts which learned men give of it; and possibly the word talent may sometimes be put for wedge.

4. That, as numeral letters were used in the oldest copies of the Hebrew Bible, it is not to be wondered if transcribers might sometimes mistake them; and it is to be remembered, that this thought may also be applied to some certain contradictions, where numbers are in question.

As to that part of the objection which relates to the impossibility of expending those treasures upon the building described, we are to observe, That none can tell the curiosity of the carved work, the height of wages which artists would demand of so rich a prince as Solomon for so celebrated a building, nor the number of gems which might be used in some of the ornaments, either of vestments or other furniture. 1 Chron. xxix. 2, 8. 2 Chron. iii. 6. Sect. XIII. As to the objections that are brought against some accounts of miracles, v. g. that of Balaam's ass speaking, the exploits of Samson, &c. it is to be remembered in general, that we are very imperfect judges what it is fit for God to do; and various things said by good commentators on these heads are well worthy of being considered. Samson's foxes, of which there might be many in that country, might be caught by others, or brought to him by miracle; not to say that a little alteration in the points of the word שׁוּעָלִים will justify our translating it sheaves, instead of foxes.

LECTURE CXLVII.

PROPOSITION CXX.

To inquire into and vindicate several passages of the Old Testament, which are charged by the enemies of revelation as immoralities.

SOLUTION.

Sect. I. The command of God to Abraham to sacrifice his own son, is said to have been no other than a command to commit murder in its most horrid form and circumstances. Dr. Warburton has taken a singular method of removing this difficulty, by maintaining that the command was merely symbolical, or an information by action, instead of words, of the great sacrifice for the redemption of mankind, given at the earnest request of Abraham, who longed impatiently to see Christ's day. John viii. 56. Compare Heb. xi. 19.

Warb. Div. Leg. vol. ii. p. 589; ed. 1. part ii. p. 374.

On the common interpretation it may be replied, That God, as the great Lord of life, may, whenever he pleases, command one creature to be the instrument of death to another, though it must be owned, that where such circumstances as these attended the trial, there would have been great reason for Abraham to have suspected this pretended revelation to have been a delusion, had he not been before fully and certainly acquainted with the method of God's converse with him, to such a degree as to exclude all possibility of mistake. Sect. II. The Israelites borrowing by the divine command vessels of the Egyptians, upon their retreat from Egypt, which they never intended to restore, is objected as an evident act of injustice. To this it has been replied,

1. That the word שאל which we render borrow, may be rendered demand, and so their vessels might be required as an equivalent for the labours they had so many years given to the Egyptians;—or,

2. Had they intended only at first to borrow them, the pursuit of the Egyptians afterwards, with an intent to destroy them, would have given them a right to have plundered their country as well as their dead bodies, and therefore much more evidently to retain those goods of theirs already in their hands.

Sect. III. The dreadful execution to be done on the Canaanites by the divine command, is urged as an act of the greatest cruelty and injustice. Some have endeavoured to extenuate this, by arguing from Deut. xx. 10. compared with Josh. xi. 19, 20. that conditions of peace were to be offered them: but waving that, in consideration of Deut. vii. 1, 2, 5, 16. and many other parallel texts, (compare Deut. xx. 15, 16. Josh. ix. 6, 7, 24.) it may with greater certainty be replied,

1. That God, as their offended Creator, had a right to their forfeited lives, and therefore might as well destroy them and their posterity by the sword of the Israelites, as by famine, pestilence, fire, and brimstone, rained from heaven, or any other calamity appearing to come more immediately from himself.

2. The wickedness of this people, especially as aggravated by the destruction of Sodom, was such as made the execution done upon them a useful lesson to neighbouring nations. Compare Gen. xv. 16. Lev. xviii. 20—28. Jude 4—7. Wisd. xii. 3—7.

3. That the miracles wrought in favour of the Israelites, not only at their coming out of Egypt, but their entrance on Canaan, proved that they were indeed commissioned as God's executioners, and consequently that their conduct was not to be a model for conquerors in ordinary cases.

4. That there was a peculiar propriety in destroying those sinners by the sword of Israel, as that would tend to impress the Israelites more strongly with an abhorrence of the idolatry and other vices of those nations, and consequently subserve that design of keeping them a distinct people adhering to the worship of the true God, which was so gracious to mankind in general, as well as to them in particular. After all, had any among the Canaanites surrendered themselves at discretion to the God of Israel, a new case would have arisen not expressly provided for in the law, in which it is probable God, upon being consulted by Urim and Thummim, would have spared the lives of such penitents, and either have incorporated them with the Israelites by circumcision, or have ordered them a settlement in some neighbouring country, as the family of Rahab seems to have had.

Sect. IV. The punishing children for the sins of their parents has been charged as injustice. It is replied,

1. That generally speaking, this was forbidden to the Israelites, (Deut. xxiv. 16. Ezek. xviii. 20.) excepting the singular instance mentioned in Deut. xiii. 12, &c.

2. That the general threatening in the second commandment may only amount to a declaration, that idolatry should be punished with judgments which should affect succeeding generations, as captivity and war would certainly do.

3. That in particular instances, such as Josh. vii. 24, 25. Numb. xvi. 27—33. and the destruction of the houses of the wicked kings by a divine sentence, the terrible executions customary in the East abated something of the horror of it; and where innocent children were concerned, God, as the Lord of all, might make them recompence in a future state: and when we consider him under this character, and remember that we are to judge of his conduct towards any creatures, not by what befalls them in this life, any more than by what befalls them in any particular day or place of their abode, the greatest part of the objection will vanish; which seems to be grounded on this obvious mistake, that it is not righteous in God to do what it would be unjust for man to do in the like circumstances, forgetting the infinite difference of the relation.

4. It is so plain in fact, that children often suffer in their constitutions, and sometimes lose their lives even in their infancy, by means of the sins of parents committed before such children were born, that nothing can vindicate the apparent conduct of Providence in such instances, but such principles as will likewise vindicate the passages of Scripture here under consideration.

Dr. Warburton has a peculiar notion on this subject, that while the Israelites were under an equal Providence, and the state of future rewards and punishments was little known, this was a kind of additional sanction to their laws, which was afterwards reversed when a future state came more in view, in the declining days of their commonwealth: but, perhaps, it might rather be intended as an oblique insinuation of this state, since certainly, with relation to individuals, it was an unequal providence. Compare Matt. xxiii. 29—36.

Warb. Div. Leg. vol. ii. p. 162: part ii. p. 147. Grove's Posth. Works, vol. iv. p. 198.

Sect. V. God's hardening the heart of Pharaoh, in the circumstances in which he threatens to do it, (Exod. vii. 3—5.) is further charged as inconsistent with his holiness and justice.

Ans. 1. By God's hardening the heart of any person, we are to understand his exercising such providential dispensations, as he knew in fact would be perverted by that person as an occasion of more obstinate sin, God at the same time not interposing to prevent this effect (compare Exod. vii. 22; viii. 15, 32.); and thus prophets are said to harden mens' hearts, by taking measures which, though in their own nature adapted to subdue them, would in fact (as God knew and revealed to them) be attended with their greater hardness.—Isa. vi. 9, 10.

2. That the foreknowledge of such an event, supposing as we do that it was not rendered necessary, would nevertheless leave a righteous God at liberty to take such measures as the circumstances of the case would otherwise admit; for if we did not allow this, it would be equally impossible to vindicate the main course of God's conduct towards his creatures, especially the universality of his providence, and the certainty of his prescience.

3. If we should say with M. Saurin and others, That this hardening the heart was the immediate operation of God upon the mind, in consequence of which the obstinacy of Pharaoh became unavoidable, and which was itself a punishment of former sin, it must be allowed that it is not inconsistent with justice to inflict such a punishment, which is indeed no other than a terrible kind of lunacy; but whether a man in that state could be said to be punished for that hardness, remains a further question. Compare Exod. ix. 12, x. 20, 27, xi. 10. with vii. 22; viii. 15, 32.

Sect. VI. The law which appointed idolatry to be punished with death, is objected to as an invincible bar to all freedom of inquiry, and a foundation for persecution, which has already been proved to be contrary to the light of nature. Deut. xiii. pass. Vid. Prop. 77.

Ans. 1. Though we readily allow that persecution is an evil in a state of nature, yet perhaps it may be asserted, that as the Divine Being knows what degree of evidence will attend any doctrine of religion in any given circumstances of time, place, and person, which we cannot judge of, He may pass sentence upon idolaters and other profane persons, where human laws cannot safely do it.

2. As God was the temporal King of Israel, and even their kings were only to be considered as his viceroys, idolatry was looked upon in the nature of high treason; and therefore justly punishable as by their statute laws. Jenn. Jew. Ant. vol. i. p. 172.

3. It is also to be remembered, That God gave the land of Canaan, with many temporal emoluments, to the Israelites, as a reward of their obedience to him; it was therefore equitable that, in case of disobedience to some of his most important laws, they should be subject to some peculiar temporal penalties, and even to death itself, if this act were committed during their abode in that land.

4. Nevertheless, it is to be observed, that the Israelites are never commissioned to make war upon their neighbours, or exercise any violence towards any of them, in order to compel them to worship the God of Israel, nor to force them to it ever after they were conquered (Deut. xx. 10.); nor are they empowered thus forcibly to attempt to recover any native Israelite who should revolt to idolatry, and go to settle in a Gentile country.

5. As God had placed the Israelites under such an extraordinary equal providence, that the prosperity of the country should depend upon their adherence to the true God, in opposition to idols, his commanding them to put to death the beginner of a revolt, was a wise precaution: and such a one as, in these circumstances, even human prudence might have suggested to subordinate governors, if such governors had been permitted to make capital laws.

6. When we consider how great a good it would have been to the whole world that Israel should have continued to maintain the knowledge and worship of the true God, in opposition to all idolatry, it will further appear, that a constitution deterring them from idolatry would be merciful to the world in general, as well as their nation, in proportion to the degree in which it was severe to any particular offenders.

LECTURE CXLVIII.

SECT. VII. The execution of the descendants of Saul, (2 Sam. xxi. 2.) is further urged as an instance of human sacrifice, entirely inconsistent with the light of nature.

To this we answer, not by saying that the persons here condemned to death might be personally concerned in the cruelties before exercised on the Gibeonites, which some of them, on account of their infant age, must have been entirely incapable of; neither do we ascribe it to the supposed injustice of keeping possession of the Gibeonitish cities, on which Dr. Delany lays so much stress on the slender evidence of 1 Sam. xxii. 7. compare 1 Sam. viii. 14. and Josh. xviii. 25. neither do we say that it was merely an act of cruelty in the Gibeonites, and unacceptable to God, since it is said "he was on this entreated for the land."—It must rather be answered,

1. By saying, on the principles laid down in § 4. (to which indeed this instance does properly belong,) that we cannot reasonably affirm universally, That it is unjust in God, or unbecoming any of his perfections, to inflict temporal calamities, or even death itself, on one person, for the crimes of another, to whom the person suffering was nearly related; nor can the death of those descendants of Saul be called a human sacrifice, on any other principle than that on which the execution of malefactors with their families in any instance may be so called.

2. That the circumstances of the case here were such, as might well justify some extraordinary severity, and make it on the whole a blessing to the public; as it would be a useful lesson to all succeeding princes, to take care how they violated any of the laws of the theocracy, when they saw the breach of one of those treaties made at the time of their first settlement, so terribly avenged on the house of their first king; and it would probably be a means of awakening the people to some sense of religion, when they saw such a remarkable hand of God interposing, in the death of those persons, to remove the famine which had lain so long upon them.

3. That sufficient provision was made by the express law of God, to prevent their bringing such extraordinary instances as this into a precedent to direct their own conduct by in common cases. Vid. § 4. gr. 1. compare 2 Kings xiv. 5, 6.

Clar. in Loc. Grot. de Jure, l. ii. c. xxi. § 14. Chaud. Life Dav. vol. ii. b. iv. c. 7. prax. p. 378.

SECT. VIII. Some have thought that human sacrifices in general were authorized by Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. on which they suppose that Jephthah proceeded in the sacrifice of his daughter. Concerning this precept, (which common sense would teach us requires some limitation,) we observe,

1. It is evident that God expressly forbade the Israelites to sacrifice their children to him:—Deut. xii. 30, 31. Jer. vii. 31. compare Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 2. Psal. cvi. 37, 38. Ezek. xvi. 20, 21.

2. There is no reason to believe that he allowed even of the sacrifice of slaves: (1.) Because no peculiar rites are prescribed for that dreadful sacrifice, though a distinction is made in the burnt-offerings of herds, flocks, and birds. Lev. i. pass. (2.) Because none of the Canaanites (accursed as they were) are directed to be reserved for the altar, not even kings taken alive, though they might have seemed the noblest sacrifice. (3.) Because the sacrifice of a man is proverbially used to express what is as abominable to God as that of a dog or swine. Isa. lxvi. 3. (4.) Because a Jewish priest would have been rendered unclean, and incapable of attending the sanctuary, by the touch of a dead body, though it had fallen down in the temple by chance,—much less can we imagine he would have been allowed to cut it to pieces and lay it on the altar.

3. Nothing that was devoted could be sacrificed at all; so that this text cannot in any clause of it refer to sacrifice. 1 Sam. xv. 3. 15—22.

4. This, therefore, refers to a vow to destroy the inhabitants of any place which they made war against, and was intended to make them cautious in laying themselves under such obligations. Compare Numb. xxi. 1—3. Deut. xxv. 17—19. Josh. vi. 17, 18; viii. 24—26. See also Judg. xxi. 5. 1 Sam. xiv. 24, 39.

5. The words therefore should be rendered, "No devoted thing which a man shall have devoted to the Lord," and the field of his possession may be equivalent to the land of it, and may include any such place as Jericho, which, by the way, might be a lasting and very useful memorial, and (as it were) a sepulchral monument of the pride and strength of Canaan.—Comp. 1 Chr. i. 46. Psal. lxxviii. 12. Neh. xiii. 10. in all which places, field is put for land or country.

6. On this interpretation, it would by a strong consequence imply, that none had a power of pardoning those that were condemned to death by God's law; which may be more expressly intimated Lev. xxvii. 29. compare Exod. xxii. 20. Deut. xxi. 22, 23. xiii. 12—17.

7. The law forbidding murder in general, was equivalent to a prohibition devoting any human creature to death, unless in some extraordinary cases by public authority. As for the invidious turn which is given to the law of redeeming the first-born, as if it implied they must otherwise have been sacrificed, since, says Morgan, there is no reason to believe they would have been redeemed from a benefit,— it may be questioned whether the eldest sons of families would have chosen the life of Levites; but waving this, the insinuation may be sufficiently answered, by observing, that God having asserted a peculiar right to the first-born, and yet, by the choice of the Levites, having precluded other families from serving at his altar; had not such a pecuniary acknowledgment been made, he might probably have punished the neglect of the parents, by taking away their children in their infancy. Exod. xiii. 2, 13. Compare Exod. iv. 24—26.

Morg. Mor. Phil. vol. i. p. 128. Immor. of Mor. Phil. p. 11. Lel. ag. Tind. vol. ii. p. 468. Fam. Exp. on Luke ii. 23. What Dr. Sykes has advanced in favour of his interpretation, which supposes the meaning of Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. to be, "Whatever shall be consecrated to the service of God, shall die in its devoted state," has not altered my judgment of this text; because it seems that the חרם always implies the death of any living creature, whether man or beast, to which it is applied; and consequently though מות ימות signifies dying in the general, yet in this connexion it must signify (as it is generally allowed to do) being put to death; nor does it any where signify dying in the state in which a person is, but always implies death by a divine sentence, if not by a violent stroke. Sykes's Connec. c. xiii. pras. p. 310.

Sect. IX. The putting a lying spirit into the mouth of Ahab's prophets, is a circumstance often mentioned upon this occasion, 1 Kings xxii. 19. but the plain answer to this is, That Micaiah's speech was merely a parable; and the intent of it, according to the eastern manner, was only to declare that God had permitted the prophets of Baal to impose upon Ahab by a falsehood.

Patrick in Loc.

Sect. X. It is said that the whole book of Job turns upon a wrong moral, and represents God as overbearing Job by superior power, rather than convincing him by rational arguments. Vid. Job xxxviii—xli.

Ans. 1. In these chapters not merely the power, but also the wisdom, of God is insisted upon, as illustrated in the works of creation and providence; and nothing could have been more proper to convince Job how unfit it was for him to censure any of the Divine proceedings, as in the transport of his grief he had sometimes done.

2. That the awful display here made of the Divine Power and Sovereign Majesty, was by no means improper; because it would tend to convince Job of his fault, in treating this tremendous Being with so little reverence in some of his late discourses; and also as it would, by consequence, prove the equity of God's administration, since it could be no profit to him that he should oppress; and would give Job such a sense of the malignity of every sin, even those imperfections which were consistent with the general integrity and piety of his own temper, as might teach him to accept all his severest afflictions as no more than what he had justly deserved; and accordingly we find it had this effect on the mind of that good man. Job xl. 3—5; xlii. 1—6.

If Dr. Warburton's ingenious hypothesis concerning the book of Job be admitted, that it was written by Ezra, upon the plan of a true ancient story, with some particular view to the state of the Jews in his time, the difficulty concerning the morality of it, and the foundation of this solution, will continue much the same.

Warb. div. Leg. vol. ii. p. 483. Grey's Let. to Warb. p. 121.*

Sect. XI. That inveteracy of spirit which is sometimes expressed in the Psalms, is excepted against, as inconsistent with humanity, as well as with the spirit of the gospel. Compare Psal. lxix. 22, &c.; cix. 6, &c.; cxxxvii. 8, 9. To this it is answered,

1. As God was in a peculiar manner the temporal Prince of Israel, these passages may be considered in the same view as petitions offered to a prince by an oppressed subject, demanding sentence against such criminals as were the proper objects of his public justice; and the natural manner in which the sense of injury and hope of redress are expressed, is no inconsiderable internal argument of the credibility of Scripture,—as Dr. Jackson, according to his usual penetration, has well observed.

2. That in many of these places, the genius of the Hebrew language will allow us to suppose that the imperative is put for the future; so that they might be understood as prophetic denunciations rather than imprecations. Compare Acts i. 18—20.

3. That if we suppose the prophets to have received a revelation from God, that such and such calamities should be inflicted on the obstinate enemies of God and his people, it may be defended as a temper of mind no way inconsistent with virtue, thus to pray for their destruction, and thereby to express an acquiescence in the justice and wisdom of the divine proceedings; and accordingly, celestial spirits are represented by that benevolent apostle John, as addressing such prayers to God. Rev. vi. 9—11; xvi. 5—7; xviii 4—7. Or if none of these, which have all their weight, should be admitted as applicable to every case, it might be said,

4. That we have nowhere asserted the degree of inspiration to be such in all the poetical composures of Scripture, as to leave no room for small irregular workings of human passions in the hearts of those good men by whom the Scriptures were written. Jer. xx. 14—18.

Sect. XII. It is said that in the whole book of Esther there is no mention of God, though the interposition of Providence there be so remarkable; which seems very little agreeable to the genius of the rest of the Old Testament.

To this some would answer, by allowing it doubtful whether this is to be included among the canonical books; and, indeed, there is hardly any more dubious. Others conclude that the additional chapters preserved in the Greek translation were originally a part of the book, which, if they are, there can be no room at all for the objection here proposed; but we choose rather to say, there is a plain acknowledgment of divine providence supposed in Esther's fasting, which no doubt was attended with prayer to the God of Israel. The custom of speaking, at the time and in the place where this was written, might be different from that used at the time and place in which the other penmen of Scripture wrote; and, on the whole, the omission of the name of God, where there were so many proper occasions to introduce it, would rather be an argument against its being written by suggestion, which there is no apparent reason to assert, than against the truth of the history; nevertheless, it is proper here to observe, how great an argument it is in favour of the credibility of all the other books, that such a continued regard to God runs through the whole of them; and there is in this respect so great a resemblance and harmony between all the writings of both Testaments, as is well worthy of our admiration.

LECTURE CXLIX.

Sect. XIII. It is objected, That the Song of Solomon seems to be an amorous poem, and that there are some passages in it which shock common decency. To this we must answer, either by supposing (as some have done) that it is no part of the canon of Scripture, or otherwise, by interpreting it in an allegorical sense, as referring to the Messiah and his church (compare Psal. xlv. passim. with Heb. i. 8, 9). If it be said, that on this interpretation there are some indecent figures in it, as there are in Ezek. xvi. xxiii. and in many other places, it is answered, That the simplicity of the eastern nations made some of these phrases much less shocking to them than the delicacy, or perhaps the licentiousness, of these western parts make them to modest people among us.

Sect. XIV. Tindal has endeavoured to show that there are many passages in the Old Testament which give us a mean and unworthy idea of God: but the particular passages themselves, and the vindication of them, may be seen in the following references; by which it appears that some of these objections are built upon our translation; others of them upon the want of due candour, which would lead a reader of common understanding to expound those expressions figuratively, and to allow for the idiom of the age and country in which they were written; especially considering how plainly those perfections of God are asserted in other passages of this book, which evidently tend to give us the sublimest ideas of him, and lay in an easy and certain remedy against whatever danger could be supposed to arise from the passages excepted against. Compare Prop. 125.

SECT. XV. As for the objections which Tindal and Morgan have urged against the character of some of the Old Testament saints, it is answered,

1. That some of those facts are expressly condemned by the historians themselves.

2. That others of them are barely mentioned, without any intimation that they are to be commended or imitated.

3. That God might judge it necessary that the faults of the great founders and heroes of the Jewish nation should be thus circumstantially recorded, that the Jews might be humbled, who were so very ready to grow vain and insolent, and despise all the rest of mankind on account of their relation to them:—for this reason also, among others, it may be that Melchizedek and Job, and some other good men, not of the Jewish church, are mentioned with so much honour.

4. That notwithstanding this, if the characters of many, who were most faulty, be fairly examined, they will be found, on the whole, to have been excellent men; as may particularly be evinced in that of David, whose blemishes were so remarkably great.—See Delany's Life of that prince.

Chandler's Life of David, vol. i. book 2. c. 25; and Recapit. vol. ii. p. 482, ad fin.

5. That the mention of their imperfections and miscarriages, in such a manner as they are mentioned, is so far from being any argument against those books, that it is a very convincing proof of the integrity of the persons who wrote them, and a glorious internal proof of the truth of the Old Testament, which must be transmitted with it to all succeeding ages.

SECT. XVI. It is objected, That 1 Kings xv. 5. seems to intimate that the character of David was blameless, except in the business of Uriah; whereas his behaviour in the court of Achish, and on many other occasions, was grossly criminal. It is answered, Not equally so as in the case of Uriah; not to say that there is not the same evidence for the inspiration of the History of Kings, as most of the other books of Scripture; nor to insist on the possibility of some intimation received from God, which might have made it entirely lawful for David to have fought against Israel under Achish.

Nearly akin to this is the objection that Jephthah and Samson, though both men of bad moral characters, are reckoned among the believing worthies in the eleventh of Hebrews. Some have replied to this, by attempting to defend their characters; but perhaps it is sufficient to say, that Heb. xi. 39. only relates to such a faith as might be found in those who were not truly virtuous and religious; which, though it might entitle them to some degree of praise for the heroic actions they performed by means of it, could have no efficacy to secure their future and everlasting happiness. PART II.

To give the general solution of them.

It may be observed concerning these difficulties in general, that most of them, though not all, relate to numbers, names, measures, dates, and genealogies; for the particular solution, see the commentators on each of the places. We shall only offer the following remarks, by way of general solution.

1. Many of the seeming contradictions may be reconciled to each other, without doing any violence to either of the texts opposed, as the commentators have often shown; the reigns of kings being supposed by different writers to begin from different eras, as they reigned alone or in partnership, and the same person being often called by different names, and different men by the same name.

Sir Isaac Newton's Chron. pass. præs. p. 265.

2. In other cases, it cannot greatly affect the religious use and end of the Old Testament, to acknowledge that some numeral mistakes at least may have crept into our present copies, though perhaps they were not to be found in the first original.

3. It is also to be remembered, that by far the greatest part of these difficulties, indeed nearly three-fourths of them, arise from the book of Chronicles, the author of which is unknown, and the evidence of its inspiration less than that of most other books in the Old Testament. See Prop. 118. Grad. 7.

* Many of these difficulties, especially those which regard the books of Chronicles, are considered in Dr. Kennicott's two volumes on the State of the printed Text of the Old Testament. It may not be amiss here to observe, that independently of the professed commentators, Corrections of Remarks on detached Passages of Scripture are particularly needful; and the acuteness of Clerk, with his usual sagacity, has been recommended by Lord Bacon. The Essay on a New Translation, Baldwin's Notes, Pilkington's Remarks on several Passages of Scripture, Kennicott's Remarks on Select Passages of the Old Testament, Bowyer's Critical Conjectures and Observations on the New Testament, Hussey's Observations on divers Passages of Scripture, and other works of a very useful cast on this head. Young on the use of particular words as dependent on the customs of the Theologic Dispensations, and on the Connection of one part of Scripture with another, and Locke's Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles, are of the same kind. PROPOSITION CXXII.

To state and answer those objections against the authority of the Old Testament, which have been taken from the fundamental branches of the whole Jewish Economy, and are not referred to Prop. 120.

SOLUTION.

SECT. I. It is urged, That an institution so overloaded with ceremonies as the Mosaic was, could not be of divine original. It is answered,

1. That the genius and circumstances of that people required a more pompous form of worship than God would otherwise have probably chosen, especially considering their education in the land of Egypt, where such worship was so much practised; and thus far Spencer seems right, in the general design of his celebrated piece on the Laws of the Hebrews, though he has carried the matter too far in his particular illustrations.

2. Some of the ceremonies prescribed appear not even to us useless and unaccountable, but, on the contrary, answered some valuable ends; v. g. they might serve to guard them against the idolatries and superstitions of their neighbours, many of which these rites are so far from imitating, as some learned men have maintained, that (as Witsius has largely and excellently proved in his Ægyptiaca) they directly oppose them; a subject which Dr. Young has well illustrated in his late discourse on idolatry, c. iv. v. They might also bring to their frequent recollection illustrious deliverances wrought out for them, or some important hints of morality, which they represented in such an emblematical way as suited their apprehensions: and, above all, they were fitted to make way for the dispensation of the Messiah; partly by the affecting and perpetual display which was therein made of the divine majesty, purity, and justice, (which not only tended in general to promote morality, but might especially show how proper and needful it was that such mean, polluted, and guilty creatures should approach him by a mediator,) and partly by the representations of many gospel doctrines, especially relating to the incarnation, atonement, and intercession of Christ, as is shown at large by the apostle in his epistle to the Hebrews.

3. It is exceedingly probable that, if we had a more particular account of the usages of the neighbouring nations, we might find out the reasonableness of many of those institutions, which at present appear to us unaccountable; and what we know of the wisdom of some of them, should engage us to judge favourably of others.

4. Those precepts for which we can give no other reason at all, did at least serve to keep the Jews a distinct people from all others, which was very proper, in order to preserve the worship of the true God among them, and has since been the foundation of all that evidence which arises to Christianity from their continuing so distinct, even in the midst of all their dispersions. Compare Prop. 113. Cor. 1, 2.

5. They were expressly assured again and again, in the plainest words, that the principal stress was not to be laid on ceremonial observances, but that the great duties of morality were of much higher esteem in the sight of God. Vid. 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23. Micah vi. 6—8. Prov. xxi. 3; xv. 8. Hos. vi. 6. Jer. vii. 4—15. Isa. lxvi. 1—3; lviii. 3—10; i. 11—17. Amos v. 21—24. Psal. l. 8—23. To which we may also add the distinction made between the ceremonial and the moral law, by writing the chief branches of the latter on tables of stone, after they had been pronounced by an audible voice from Heaven; not now to insist upon such precepts in the Pentateuch as Deut. vi. 4, 5. and the many parallel passages which must be sufficient to show that no ceremonial observances could in themselves alone render them acceptable to God. Compare Deut. xxvii. 14—26.

Sect. II. To circumcision it is objected, That it was cutting off a part of the human body, which, had it been superfluous, would not have been given to man in the most perfect state; and that it was an operation attended with some danger. It is answered,

1. That it is plain, in fact, it is not attended with danger; and allowing there might be pain in it, yet that mortification was by no means comparable to the advantages accruing to the Jews from that covenant of which it was the sign.

2. That very mortification might be intended to remind them of their obligations to mortify their irregular desires and sensual affections. Vid. Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6. Jer. iv. 4. Acts vii. 51. Rom. ii. 25—29.

3. Such an indelible mark thus impressed might be a proper token of that covenant, in which succeeding generations were interested, and which contained so great and important a reference to a person who was in future ages to be born, and who was the foundation of the blessings promised to Abraham in that covenant of which circumcision was the sign. Not to insist upon what Drake has observed, as to the natural benefits which might attend this rite, by which, as he supposes, it was recommended to some neighbouring nations.

Sect. III. It is also objected, That sacrifices are in themselves an absurd and cruel rite, and therefore could not be made a part of a divine institution.

We acknowledge, that without a divine revelation, there could be no reason to believe they would be pleasing to God; but as it is plain they were of very early date, (Gen. iii. 21; iv. 4.) and prevailed almost universally, it is more probable they were of divine original. (Compare Heb. xi. 4.) They might be intended to promote humiliation, by impressing the mind of the offerer with a conviction that death was due to sin; and, as a more perfect atonement was gradually revealed, might lead on their thoughts to it. And when the death of beasts might serve this end, it must certainly be lawful to kill them for sacrifice, as well as for food.—As to their being so much multiplied under the Mosaic law, it is to be remembered that a great part of them went to the priest, and in many cases to the offerer; not to insist on the opinion of some, that the burnt-offerings were not entirely consumed. In some instances (v. g. in the case of sin-offerings) sacrifices were to be considered as a kind of fine imposed on the offender; and in many others, as a tribute paid to God, the great Proprietor and King of the country, for the support of the offices of his household: and there is, from the genius of that religion, great reason to believe that a peculiar blessing attended those who presented them, and gave them a more abundant increase in proportion to their pious zeal. Compare Prov. iii. 9, 10. Mal. iii. 8—11. Ezek. xliv. 30.

Ant.* vol. i. p. 26. Law's Theory, p. 45.

Sect. IV. It has further been objected, That the whole mystery of the Jewish religion was a contrivance to enslave the people to the power of priests, and exhaust their revenues to maintain that order. Compare Deut. xvii. 8—13. To this it is answered,

1. That the tribe of Levi had a right to the twelfth part of the land in common with their brethren; so that the allotment of the cities mentioned Numb. xxxv. 1—8. cannot be fairly brought into the objection, unless it could be proved that, in consequence of this allotment, the Levites possessed above one twelfth of it.

2. That the tithes, first-fruits, &c. appointed to be paid them, were in part a just equivalent for their attendance upon the service of the sanctuary, as well as their care in instructing the people out of the law; and in the payment of this, an extraordinary blessing might be expected, as above.

3. That there was also a magistracy among the people, to which the priests and Levites were in the same subjection as the rest of the Israelites: nor does there appear to be any such exemption in their favour, as many laws established in Popish countries have since given to their clergy.

4. That it can never be proved the Urim and Thummim was an oracle of such a kind, as to put it in the power of the high priest to produce any new model of government, or in particular instances to rescind such acts of the state as were disagreeable to him, or to grant protection to whom he pleased; for all this goes upon a very precarious supposition, that the high priest might consult the oracle whenever he pleased, and on whatever question he thought fit; and that the way of answering in that oracle was by the supposed inspiration of the person wearing the breastplate. And indeed, when we consider in how awful a manner God punished Nadab, Abihu, Korah and his associates, Uzza, and many more, who presumed to adulterate or profane his institutions, one can never imagine he would have permitted a high priest in this greatest solemnity to deliver a false oracle in his name, without immediately inflicting some remarkable judgment upon him: and it seems, that had he pretended to be inspired in any case, about which he was not consulted, he would have been liable to be tried, as another person falsely pretending to prophecy.

It may not be improper to observe here, that the very foundation of Dr. Morgan's strange calculation to justify his assertion that the Jewish priests had twenty shillings in the pound, or that the people paid the value of a rack rent for their pretended freeholds, depends upon several falsities, especially this, that he takes it for granted without any proof, that every male was obliged to pay half a shekel at each of the yearly feasts, which he computes at 1,200,000l. per annum.

Morg. ibid. vol. ii. p. 136. 142.

Much in the same strain is that instance of priest-craft which Morgan pretends to find in the institution of the water of jealousy, which he represents as a contrivance to make it safe for women to commit adultery with the priests, and none but them. Numb. v. 11—31.

In answer to this impious thought, it is sufficient to observe, that nothing can be more unjust than to charge so stupid and villanous a contrivance upon so wise and virtuous a person as Moses appears to have been, who, in the system of his laws, has made adultery punishable with death, no less in a priest than any other person. Considering the consequences attending this trial, in case either of innocence or of guilt, it would, on Morgan's supposition, be a very ill-judged contrivance: and all that was said under the preceding section, concerning the danger of a priest's solemnly profaning the name of God to any fraudulent purpose, would here have the most apparent weight: besides that, the person appointed to preside on this occasion was to be the chief of the priests then in waiting, which would render such a conspiracy as Morgan supposes utterly impracticable.

SECT. V. It has further been objected, That the Mosaic law does not lay a sufficient stress upon the duties of sobriety, temperance, and chastity, nor make a proper provision against the contrary vices:—but to this it is replied,

1. As to riot and drunkenness, it is spoken of with great abhorrence, Deut. xxix. 19. and in order to discourage it, there was a special law, which empowered parents even to put their children to death by a legal process, if they continued incurably addicted to it; which was such a provision against the first advances to debaucheries of this kind, as is quite unequalled in the laws of any other nation, Deut. xxi. 18—21. To which it may be added, that such provision was made for punishing injurious acts which drunkenness often produces, as would consequently have a further tendency to restrain it.

2. As to lewdness, it was provided against, (1.) By a general law, forbidding whoredom in any instance, Deut. xxiii. 17. and making it dreadfully capital in the case of a priest's daughter, Lev. xxi. 9. (2.) Adultery was punished with death, Lev. xx. 10. Deut. xxii. 22. which extended not only to women whose marriage had been consummated, but to those who were only betrothed, Deut. xxii. 23. and considering how young their girls were generally betrothed, this would have a great effect. (3.)

Rapes were also punished with death, Deut. xxii. 25–27. (4.) If a person debauched a young woman not betrothed, he was obliged to marry her, how much soever his inferior in rank; and could never on any account divorce her, Deut. xxii. 28, 29. (5.) A person lying with a female slave was fined in the loss of her ransom, Deut. xxi. 14. (6.) Universally, if a woman pretended to be a virgin and was not, whether she had been debauched before or after her espousals, she was liable to be put to death: which was such a guard upon the chastity of all young women, as was of a very singular and elsewhere unequalled nature, Deut. xxii. 20, 21. (7.) The law by which bastards in all their generations were excluded from the congregation of the Lord, i. e. probably from the liberty of worshipping among his people in the place where God peculiarly dwelt, (Deut. xxiii. 2.) was a brand of infamy which strongly expressed God's abhorrence of a lewd commerce between the sexes; and considering the genius and temper of the Jewish nation, must have a great tendency to suppress this practice; so that, upon the whole, sufficient care was taken in the Mosaic institution to convince the Jews that lewdness and other kinds of intemperance were highly displeasing to God: and there seems to be no remaining objection, but that future punishments were not denounced against them; and that is only one branch of the objection taken from the omission of the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, which will be considered elsewhere.

PROPOSITION CXXIII.

To propose and answer some other objections against the inspiration of Scripture, taken from the general manner in which the books of it are written, and some other considerations not mentioned above.

SOLUTION.

SECT. I. Some have objected the inelegancy of the style, especially in several parts of it: to which we answer,

1. That the inspiration of a book is not to be judged of by its style, but by its fitness to answer its end, which was something of greater importance than to teach men to write in an elegant and polite manner.

2. The different genius of different nations is to be considered in judging of the style of books;—and it would be absurd to condemn every thing in eastern and ancient books, which does not suit the western or modern taste.

3. Many of the supposed solecisms in Scripture may be vindicated by parallel passages in the most authentic writers, as Mr. Blackwall, and many others mentioned in the Preface to the Family Expositor, have largely shown.

4. There are multitudes of passages, not only in the original, but even in the most literal translations, which have been accounted inimitably beautiful, pathetic, and sublime, by the most judicious critics; and those in which there seems to be least of artful turn and antithesis, do so much the more suit the majesty and importance of the occasion.

SECT. II. Others have objected the want of a regular method both in the Old Testament and the New, which makes it a work of great labour to collect the several doctrines and arguments therein dispersed, and to place them in an orderly and systematical view. To this, besides what is said above, it may be answered,

1. That it now gives agreeable employment to those that study the Scriptures, thus to range and collect the several passages relating to the same subject, which are dispersed up and down.

2. That considering the Scripture as a book intended for the common people, who are by no means exact judges of method, this is no important deficiency: and indeed, on the contrary, the way of teaching men doctrines and truths in such loose discourses, especially as illustrated by historical facts, is much more fit for popular use, rendering these things more easy to be understood and retained.

3. By this means, such a foundation is laid for arguing the truth of a revelation from the genuineness of those books which contain it, as could not otherwise have taken place; as will abundantly appear by consulting the demonstration of Prop. 108.

SECT. III. The obscurity of many passages both in the Old and New Testament, and the number of controversies amongst Christians to which they have given rise, is also objected, as a further argument against their divine authority. To this it is answered,

* Though Mr. Blackwall may have failed in his attempts to prove the exact purity and elegance of the style of the New Testament, he has undoubtedly succeeded in establishing the genuine beauty of many particular passages. With respect to the Old Testament, a knowledge of the poetical parts of the Old Testament might be informed in what is derived from "Lowth's Prælections on the Poetry of the Hebrews," from Michaelis's Notes upon that work.

1. That it was, humanly speaking, impossible that there should not be many obscure passages in such very ancient writings, the languages of which have been so long dead. And indeed in any language it might be expected that there would be some obscurity, when some of the subjects were so sublime, and in many respects so incomprehensible, and when others related to future events, which were to come to pass so long after the prediction, the clearness of which might have frustrated their accomplishment.

2. That this obscurity generally lies upon those things which are of the least importance; and where it relates to momentous doctrines, as sometimes it must be acknowledged it does, it affects what is circumstantial rather than essential in them.

3. That the difficulties in many passages in Scripture afford an agreeable exercise to pious and learned men, by whose labours many of them have been happily cleared up.

4. That in other instances, they may tend to promote our humility, as the secrets in nature and Providence do.

5. They leave room for the exercise of mutual candour among those of different opinions, which, were it generally to prevail, would do a greater honour to Christianity than the most exact agreement in principle, or uniformity in worship, could possibly do.

Hist.* p. 138. Watts's Orthod. and Charity. Ess. viii.

Sect. IV. Another set of objections is drawn from the trivial nature of some passages, which are to be found especially in the Old Testament, and sometimes in the New. The vast abundance of words used to relate some facts, (v. g. Gen. v. Numb. viii. Exod. xxv—xxviii; xxxv—xxxix.) while others perhaps of much greater importance are entirely omitted, or passed over in a very slight manner, as also the frequent repetition of the same story and the same sentiments, are objections nearly akin to this. It is answered,

1. That great allowance is to be made for the genius of eastern nations, in many of whose modern histories we find the persons concerned introduced as speaking, and a much greater number of words used than was necessary for giving us some competent idea of the fact.

2. Nevertheless, this makes the story more popular, and tends in a more forcible manner to strike the minds of common readers, suggesting many instructive and entertaining thoughts, which in a more concise abstract could not have been introduced, at least with so great advantage.

3. An exactness in many particulars might be useful to those for whom these writings were more immediately intended,—where it is not so to us.

4. Nevertheless, we do not insist upon it that the Scripture is the most perfect model of style, nor pretend to establish such a degree of inspiration as would make that assertion necessary.

5. The repetitions were often very necessary: the same circumstances of the same or of different persons, required the review of the same important thoughts in the poetical, prophetic, and epistolary writings; and the repetition of the same fact by different historians, who do not appear to have borrowed from each other, is a great confirmation of the truth of it.

LECTURE CLII.

Sect. V. It is further objected, That if the Old and New Testament had been of divine original, we can hardly imagine they would have been the cause of so much mischief in the world, which is imputed to the great stress laid on believing certain doctrines. To this it is replied,

1. That the genius of them both, and especially of the New Testament, is so apparently full of meekness, benevolence, and goodness, that nothing can be more unjust than to charge the bigotry and persecuting zeal of its professors upon that.

2. That this evil has its origin in those lusts of men, which this revelation was peculiarly intended to restrain.

3. That there have been penal laws, and some considerable degree of persecution among Heathens on religious accounts, where Christianity has not been in question.*

4. That if there has been more among or against Christians, it has generally been, because Christian principles have spirited up those who have cordially received them to bear greater hardships, as well as engaged them more openly to profess their own religion, and more expressly to condemn those follies and crimes which have passed for religion among other men, much to the danger as well as reproach of those by whom they have been maintained.

* Proofs that there has been more persecution among the heathens than has often been supposed and represented will be found in Bishop Watson's Apology for Christianity, and in Dr. Leland's Lectures, passim, lately published. Lastly, the obscure exercises of Emperor Marcus Antoninus was a persecuting has been shewn by Mr. Mayor in a discourse that is published in the first volume of the Theological Repository; and by Dr. Lardner in his Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. ii. p. 178—220. Works, vol. viii. p. 406—447.

5. Because that hereby occasionally greater evidence has been derived to Christianity, as appears from the preceding argument.

6. That the eternal salvation of a few is, upon the whole, a rich equivalent for the greatest temporal damage sustained: nevertheless, it must be acknowledged that they have much to answer for who, by persecuting under pretence of defending the Gospel, have brought such a reproach upon it.

7. It is also observable, That men have seldom been persecuted by Christians for denying those doctrines which are evidently contained in the Gospel; but much oftener for refusing to submit to human explications, and very frequently to most corrupt additions; which has been the case of Popish persecution, which indeed furnishes out the greatest part of this argument.

8. The extraordinary piety, temperance, and charity, especially of the primitive Christians, and the joy of good men in the midst of the severest persecutions, must be allowed an evident proof that the world has been generally the better for Christianity, and a vast balance to what is urged in the objection: not to mention the influence Christianity has had in reforming the doctrines of morality among the Heathens; as appears from comparing the writings of the Pagan philosophers after Christ's time with those before it.—For the illustration of the former part of this step, see Cave's Primitive Christianity; and for the latter, Tillard against Warburton, ad finem.—And we may add here, That the good effects to be produced by the expected prevalency of true Christianity at last, are to be taken in as further balancing the account.

9. When all possible allowances are made to the objection, it can be of no weight; for since reason is the accidental occasion of all this persecution about Christianity, and of all others, whether among Mahometans, Jews, or Pagans, they will as well prove that God is not the Author of our reason as that he is not the Author of the Christian religion: and indeed nothing can be more apparently absurd than to say that God could not give what man may grossly abuse.

10. As to the stress laid upon believing the Gospel, it is ridiculous to make that an objection against the truth of it; for if the disbelieving of it had not been represented as a very dangerous thing, it had been in effect acknowledging its own evidence so defective, as not to be sufficient for the conviction of an honest inquirer,—and its own importance to be so small, as almost to bespeak a neglect, when yet its pretended apparatus was so amazing, as at the very first view it must appear to have been: so that here would in effect have been a self-contradiction, which few writers on either side the question seem to have been sufficiently aware of.

Serm.* vol. iv. p. 194. Bourn's Serm. vol. i. No. xiv. Let. to Waterl. p. 52. Fam. Expos. vol. i. p. 469.*

Sect. VI. It has further been objected, That the Scripture rules of morality are given in very loose terms, without such particular limitations as particular circumstances require, or without the reason on which they are founded. To this it is replied,

1. That if this concludes against any thing, it will conclude against all books of morality whatever,—since they can do no more than lay down general rules, without being able to descend to every personal circumstance.

2. Though God might have written such a book, it would have been too voluminous ever to have been read.

3. There are many excellent general rules, which, if men would honestly attend to, they would seldom be at a loss as to their particular duty, especially that of studying to show ourselves approved to God, of doing all to his glory, and of doing unto others as we would they should do unto us.

4. The reasons are sometimes suggested, especially those taken from the consequence of men's actions.

5. If there had been such a laboured deduction as in our ethical writers, few would have understood it.

6. It would not have suited the Majesty of the great Legislator, since human laws do not use this method. The declaration of the will of God, and a view to the sanctions and other motives suggested in Scripture, are of far greater importance than numerous decisions in casuistry, and laboured refinements of abstract argument.

Sect. VII. The imperfect promulgation of the Jewish and Christian religions has always been reckoned one of the chief objections against their divine authority, and urged as entirely inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God, if he be supposed the Author of them. To this it is replied,

1. That the objection seems to take it for granted, that it is a part of the revelation that the express knowledge of it is absolutely necessary for the final happiness of every human creature, otherwise God

* The first part of the Christian religion, consisting chiefly of faith, trade and love, and a sacred mystery, illustrated by Dr. Doddridge in three discourses from 2 Tim. i. 7. was not (for aught appears) obliged to give it to any, and if not to any, then certainly not to all.

2. Though it be acknowledged that the revelation has given great advantages, especially that of the New Testament, yet that can be no reasonable objection against its being true, though not universal, since it plainly appears, that if there be a universal Providence, and God be just and good, then it must be consistent with justice and goodness to give different men very different advantages for religious improvement, since (considering the diversity of men's tempers and circumstances) it is plain in fact God has done it.

3. The supposition of the truth of Scripture, (allowing as above, No. 1.) is so far from increasing the difficulty of accounting for the divine conduct which would arise on the foot of natural religion, that indeed it rather lessens it, both with respect to those who have enjoyed and embraced this revelation, and those who have not: for as to Jews and Christians, it represents them not as being left to error and superstition, (which, if Scripture be false, it must be allowed they are,) but as having received several distinguishing favours from the Divine Being, and glorious advantages for eternal happiness. And as to others, it shows us, First, That God has already done more for them than it can otherwise be proved that he has: particularly in the following instances: (1.) By discovering himself in various methods of revelation to Adam and Noah, who had such extraordinary facts to relate with such peculiar advantage from their relation to the rest of mankind (see Winder's History of Knowledge, vol. i. c. iii. and v.); and also to others in the earliest ages of the human race, from whom, on this supposition, useful traditions might be handed down to posterity, the remainders of which seem evident in Job and his friends, Melchizedek, Abimelech, and many others, and even in some of the Heathen writers. Compare Prop. cix. sub init. (2.) By the remarkable removes and dispersions of the Abrahamic family, and the singular appearances of God for them and the Jewish nation, previously to their settlement in Canaan; which were peculiar advantages to Egypt and Canaan, had they been wise enough to have improved them. (3.) In constituting the Mosaic religion in such a manner, as to encourage strangers to live among the Jews, and to oblige the Jews to endeavour to promote the knowledge of the true God abroad as well as at home. (4.) By remarkable appearances of God in their favour, both in the conquest of Canaan under such great natural disadvantages, and during their abode in it, especially in the victories of David, the time of Solomon's magnificence and wisdom while he continued faithful to God, which he no doubt would improve for the spreading of religion among the many sages and princes who resorted to his court (compare 1 Kings iv. 29–34, x. 23–25); but especially by the train of providences to Israel in and after the Babylonish captivity, which occasioned remarkable proclamations through the whole Babylonian and Persian empires, by which vast numbers of people must be admonished. (5.) By the dispersion of the Jewish Scriptures themselves when translated into Greek. (6.) By the mission of Christ and his apostles, and the early and extensive propagation of his Gospel by them. (7.) By all the advantages which have since been given, by the settlement of European and Christian colonies in almost all the principal, especially the maritime, parts of Asia, Africa, and America, whereby indeed immense numbers have been converted; and the number might have been yet greater, if those advantages had been properly improved.—Secondly, Revelation encourages us to hope that the time will come, when there shall be a universal prevalence of the knowledge of God, and all the Heathen nations shall be gathered in, Prop. 112. Solut. gr. 1.—Thirdly, In the mean time, it not only assures us that God will make all gracious allowances for the circumstances and disadvantages in which they have been placed,—but seems to point out a way, in which virtuous and pious Heathens, if such there be, may be accepted with God (i. e. through the atonement and mediation of Christ) with greater honour to divine justice than we could otherwise conceive.

LECTURE CLIII.

DEFINITION LXXVIII.

The books of the Apocrypha are those which are added by the Church of Rome to those of the Old Testament received by Protestants, and take their name from their having been supposed to have been hid a considerable time after they were written.

SCHOLIUM.

The names of these books, as they stand in the vulgar Latin Bible, are two of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, the remainder of Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, with Jeremiah's Epistle, the Song of the Three Children, the Story of Susannah, of Bel and the Dragon, the Prayer of Manasseh, and two books of Maccabees. The second of Esdras is not extant in Greek; but the most authentic copy of it is the Latin: but in some copies of the Greek Bible there are two other books of Maccabees added; the third of which contains chiefly the history of the Jewish affairs under Ptolemy Philopater.

Prid. Con. vol. ii. p. 185, &c.

PROPOSITION CXXIV.

The books of the Apocrypha are not to be received as written by a plenary superintendent inspiration.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Josephus only mentions 22 books of the Old Testament as inspired, in which these cannot be included; and he expressly says, that those which were written after the time of Artaxerxes (i. e. probably Artaxerxes Longimanus, from whom Ezra and Nehemiah had their commission) were not looked upon by the Jewish church as of equal authority. Compare Prop. 105. gr. 4.

Joseph. ag. App. l. i. c. viii. p. 1333.

2. They never appear to have been quoted in the New Testament, as most of the books of the Old are, though some passages of them might have been much to the purpose of the sacred writers.

3. The author of the first book of Maccabees, which is one of the most valuable in the whole collection, intimates that there had not for a considerable time been any prophet in Israel divinely inspired, 1 Mac. iv. 46. and x. 27. and the author of the second book seems expressly to own that he had no supernatural assistance, 2 Mac. xv. 38, 39. and ii. 19—28.

4. There are some passages in these books which seem in themselves absurd and incredible, v. g. the angel's lying to Tobit, and afterwards driving away the devil by a fumigation, Tobit v. 12. compared with Tobit xii. 15. Tobit vi. pass. the story of fire being turned into water, and vice versâ, 2 Mac. i. 19—22. the march of the tabernacle and ark after Jeremiah, ibid. ii. 4—8. to which most writers add what they think the inconsistent and contradictory account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is said to have died of grief, 1 Mac. vi. 8, 16. and to have died miserably in the mountain, consumed with worms, 2 Mac. ix. 5—12, 28. 2 Mac. i. 16. is also quoted, as relating that his brains were beaten out, but that Antiochus must probably have been another person.

5. There are other passages which are inconsistent with some parts of the Old Testament; v. g. Judith (c. ix. 2.) justifying the murder of the Shechemites, condemned in Gen. xlix. 7. The author of the Wisdom of Solomon, speaking in the person of that prince, represents Israel as under oppression, which it was not in Solomon's days, Wisd. ix. 7, 8; xv. 14. compared with 1 Kings x. 27. (Yet some have urged 1 Kings xi. 14, 25. as an answer to this objection.) Baruch is here said to have been carried into Babylon, at the same time when Jeremiah tells us he was carried into Egypt, Bar. i. 2. Jer. xliii. 6. to which we may add the false account of the fact related, Lev. x. 46—20. in the reference to it, 1 Mac. ii. 11. Compare also Esth. xii. 5. with vi. 3, 6; to which may be added the applause of self-murder, 2 Mac. xiv. 41, &c.

6. There are some other passages relating to the history of foreign nations, so inconsistent with what all other historians say, as not to be admitted without much greater evidence than belongs to these books. 1 Mac. i. 6, 7; viii. 16.

1, 2, 3—6. 7. From comparing all these steps, on the one hand, and considering on the other that there is no positive evidence for their inspiration, it follows that these books are not to be admitted as written by a plenary superintendent inspiration. Q. E. D.

Burn. on the Art. p. 89. Turret. Loc. ii. Q. ix. Limb. Theol. l. i. c. iii. § 5. Bennet ag. Popery, p. 71.

COROLLARY.

The insisting upon reading some portion of these books, instead of lessons from Scripture, in the daily offices in the church, was an unreasonable and cruel imposition in those who fixed the terms of conformity in England in the year 1662.

Hist. of Nonconf. p. 235. Old Whig, vol. ii. No. 87. Calamy's Abridg. of Baxt. Life, c. x. p. 252.

SCHOLIUM 1.

We allow that some of the Christian fathers cited these books with great regard: nevertheless, most of them place the apocryphal books in a class inferior to those which they call canonical; and the first council which is said to have received them was the provincial council of Carthage, A. D. 397. who evidently come too late to be more competent judges of this question than the Jews themselves were. Nevertheless, we acknowledge these books to have been of considerable antiquity: and as some of them are very valuable, on account of the wise and pious sentiments they contain, so the historical facts, and references to ancient notions and customs, in others of them, make them well worthy an attentive perusal.

Dupin on the Canon. l. i. c. v. § 1—6. Cosin's Hist. of the Canon.

It is exceedingly probable that the chief reason for which the authority of these books is maintained by the Church of Rome is, that some passages in them countenance their superstitions, particularly the intercession of angels, Tobit xii. 15. — and praying for the dead, 2 Mac. xii. 40—45. which is represented as prevalent even in favour of those who died idolaters.

A more particular critical account of most of these books may be found in PART VII.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THE SCRIPTURE DOCTRINE RELATING TO THE EXISTENCE AND NATURE OF GOD, AND THE DIVINITY OF THE SON AND SPIRIT.

LECTURE CLIV.

PROPOSITION CXXV.

THE account given us in the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, of the nature, perfections, and providence of God, is agreeable to that which the light of nature discovers concerning them.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The Scripture expressly asserts that there is a God, the Creator of all things. Gen. i. 1. Psal. xxxiii. 6. Acts xiv. 17. Heb. xi. 3.

2. The Scripture asserts that God is an Eternal Spirit. John iv. 24. Heb. xi. 27. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Deut. xxxiii. 27. Psal. xc. 2.

3. That he is omnipresent. 1 Kings viii. 27. Psal. cxxxix. 7—10. Jer. xxiii. 24.

4. That he knows all things. 1 Sam. ii. 3. Job xxxvi. 4; xlii. 2. Psal. cxlvii. 5. Jer. xxxii. 19. Acts xv. 18. And that future contingencies are not excepted from this general assertion, appears from his having foretold some of the most contingent events, (vid. Prop. 111, 112.) as well as from the following passages, Isa. xlii. 9; xlviii. 3; xlvi. 10; xli. 22—26. Psal. cxxxix. 2.

5. He is perfectly wise. Job ix. 4. 1 Tim. i. 17. Isa. xl. 13, 14.

6. That he is omnipotent. Jer. xxxii. 17. Rev. xix. 6. Psal. cxlv. 3. Job ix. 4, &c. 1 Chron. xxix. 11, 12.

7. That he is perfectly good. Psal. lii. 1; cxlv. 9; Matt. xix. 17. James i. 17. Exod. xxxiv. 6. 1 John iv. 8.

8. The justice of God is asserted, Psal. xxxvi. 6, cxxix. 4; cxix. 137. Rom. ii. 6. Acts x. 34, 35. Rev. xv. 3.

9. That he is true and faithful. Numb. xxiii. 19. Deut. vii. 9. 2 Sam. vii. 28. Tit. i. 2.

10. That he is perfectly holy. Isa. vi. 3; xliii. 15; lvii. 15. Psal. cxlv. 17. Rev. xv. 4.

11. That he is immutable. Exod. iii. 14. Mal. iii. 6. Heb. i. 10—12. James i. 17.

12. That he is incomprehensible. Job xi. 7. Psal. cxxxix. 6. Eccles. iii. 11; viii. 17. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Rom. xi. 33.

13. That his providence extends to every event, preserving, disposing, and governing all things, Psal. xxxvi. 6; cxxxvi. 25; civ. cvii cxlv. 15, &c. Job xii. 10. Acts xiv. 17; xvii. 28. Matt. x. 29, 30. And it may be observed in the general, that all the vast number of Scriptures, in which the operations of inanimate bodies, such as the sun, rain, &c. as well as the actions of brutes are ascribed to the divine agency and direction, do entirely agree with Prop. 32. Vid. Prov. xvi. 33. Psal. lxv. 9, &c.; civ. 13—30; cxlv. 15, 16; cxlvii. 16—18. Amos iii. 6; iv. 7. Job xxxvii. xxxviii. xxxix.

14. That he is the one only God, is expressly asserted, Deut. vi. 4; iv. 39; 2 Sam. vii. 22. Psal. lxxxvi. 10. Jer. x. 10, 11; xlv. 5. Matt. xix. 17. John xvii. 3. 1 Cor. viii. 4—6. 1 Tim. vi. 15; ii. 5.

15. That he is a being of all possible perfections, Matt. v. 48. 1 Chron. xxix. 11. Psal. viii. 1.

Gast. Chris. Inst. c. 11. Gayton's Scrip. Acc. of the Faith and Practice of Christians, c. i.

COROLLARY 1.

So great an agreement between the doctrine of Scripture and reason with regard to the being and attributes of God, is a considerable internal evidence in proof of the revelation itself, considering how much of religion depends upon forming right notions of the Supreme Being.

Scott's Chris. Life, vol. ii. p. 318; Works, vol. i. p. 310.

COROLLARY 2.

Considering how very clearly these things are taught in the forecited passages, and in such a multitude of others parallel to them, there can be no just reason to apprehend, that those popular passages, in which the members of the human body, or the passions of the human mind, are ascribed to God, should be taken in a literal sense, so as to mislead any impartial and attentive reader, how moderate soever his capacity may be: so that no just objection against the preceding corollary can be drawn from such passages. Compare Prop. 120. gr. 14.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To the Scriptures urged gr. 4. in proof of the prescience of future contingencies, it has been replied, That those passages only relate to God's knowledge of his own works: but as this solution can only be applied to some of those Scriptures, so it is evident with regard to them, that as the equity, wisdom, and goodness, of God's works towards his rational creatures, depends upon the correspondency between them and the moral character of those creatures, God would not have a complete view of his dispensations towards them if he were ignorant of future contingencies; nor can the contrary doctrine be reconciled with those other Scriptures, which represent the divine volitions as immutable. Compare 1 Sam. xv. 29. Job xiv. 5; xxiii. 13, 14. Psalm xxxiii. 11. Isa. xlvi. 10. Mal. iii. 6. Acts xv. 15—18; xvii. 26. Limb. Theol. l. ii. c. xviii. § 27.

SCHOLIUM 2.

To that part of the argument, gr. 4. which is drawn from predictions, it has been replied, That when God foretells future events, he determines to make them certain by making them necessary; and in order to reconcile this with his justice, it has been added, that his creatures in these actions are not considered as in a state of probation, but that in these particulars it is suspended: but this objection is sufficiently answered, Prop. 111. Cor. 1. and may further be illustrated by comparing Gen. xv. 16. Exod. iii. 19, 20; vii. 3. 4. Matt. xxvi. 24. to which may perhaps be added Acts i. 16—20. See (besides Colliber in the place referred to above)

Saurin's Serm. vol. ii. p. 199. Ridgley's Body of Divinity, vol. i. p. 69.

SCHOLIUM 3.

That God is not the Author of sin, expressly appears from all the texts relating to the holiness of God, and those relating to his justice and goodness when compared with the threatenings denounced against sin, as well as from James i. 13.; whence it appears that scriptures urged on the contrary side, such as Prov. xvi. 4. 2 Sam. xii. 11; xvi. 10. are to be interpreted as not to express an irresistible influence on the mind of man, but only proposing in the course of his providence such occasions and temptations, as he knew would in fact, though not necessarily, prevail, to draw man to the commission of sin: and that God should act thus, is not a difficulty peculiar to Scripture, since it is agreeable to what we see every day, if we allow the universality of his providence.

Limb. ib. l. ii. c. xxx. § 1—7.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Scripture does expressly assert, not only that all things are foreknown by God, but that he works all according to the counsel of his own will, Eph. i. 11. and that even the death of Christ happened according to his determinate purpose, Luke xxii. 22. Acts ii. 23; iv. 28. whence it follows, that to make this consistent with what is said elsewhere, we must allow that in Scripture language those things are said to be determined, or decreed, by God, not only which he wills himself by his own irresistible agency to effect, but which he foresees will come to pass, in consequence of his previous volitions relating to preceding circumstances, through the intervention of free agents, and which on that foresight he determined to permit: and in this sense it must be admitted on the preceding principles, that all things which happened are decreed by him, and that the light of nature teaches us they are so.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Nevertheless, notwithstanding this agency of God, even about the sinful actions of his creatures, which the light of reason evinces, and those passages of Scripture assert; forasmuch as the word temptation carries with it an ill sense, and implies some malignity of design in the being said to tempt another, we acknowledge, according to James i. 13. that it is not proper to apply it here; and great care should be taken in popular discourses to avoid this way of representing things, which, though it be strictly and philosophically true, yet may be so mistaken by common hearers, as to be injurious rather than subservient to the purposes of practical religion.

PROPOSITION CXXVI.

That glorious Person, who appeared in the world by the name of JESUS CHRIST, did not begin to exist when he was conceived by his virgin mother, but had a being, not only before that period, but before the creation of the world.

Theol. Repos. vol. ii. No. 2.

DEMONSTRATION

1. It is he who is spoken of by John, under the name of the LOGOS, and is expressly said to have been in the beginning with God, and afterwards to have been made flesh, i. e. to have appeared in a human form. John i. 1, 2, 3, 14. Compare Rev. xix. 12. See also Heb. ii. 14.

2. Our Lord himself frequently asserted his coming down from Heaven as his Father's Messenger, which he could with no propriety have done, had he not existed before his incarnation; for what the Socinians assert, that he ascended into Heaven before he opened his public ministry, to receive instruction from thence, is a fact which cannot be proved, yet was surely important enough to have been recorded; since Moses's converse with God in the mount, and Christ's temptation, are both so largely mentioned. It will also be found, that some of the texts quoted below refer to a settled abode in Heaven previously to his appearance among men, and not to a transient visit thither: John iii. 31; vi. 38, 50, 62; xiii. 3; xvi. 28; xvii. 5. As for John iii. 13. the latter clause is a much stronger argument against the opposite hypothesis, than the former is for it.

Clarke on Trin. No. 574. Fam. Expos. vol. ii. § 179. p. 487. Lowm. Tracts, p. 237. Unitarian Tracts, vol. ii. p. 25.

3. Paul asserts that Christ emptied himself of some glory which he was before possessed of, that in our nature he might become capable of suffering and death, Phil. ii. 6, 7. (Greek); with which may well be compared the following texts, which, though not equally evident with the former, seem to have some reference to the same matter: John viii. 58. 1 Cor. xv. 47.

Clarke on Trin. No. 535, &c. Dawson on Logos, p. 109.

4. Christ seems to have been the Person who appeared to Isaiah (compare Isa. vi. pass. with John xii. 41.); from whence, as well as his being called the Logos, and some other considerations hereafter to be mentioned, it seems reasonable to conclude that Christ is the Person who is called the Angel of God's Presence, by whom he revealed himself to Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and the other Old Testament saints; Isa. lxiii. 9. Exod. xxiii. 20, 21;—but the particular examination of this branch of the argument will be reserved for a distinct proposition.

Watts's Script. Doct. of Trin. Prop. viii. p. 51. Works, vol. vi. p. 433.

5. The work of creation is so expressly ascribed to him in Scripture, that this alone might be a sufficient proof of his having a real existence before the world was made: John i. 3. Col. i. 15, 16, 17. Heb. i. 2, 8, &c. Eph. iii. 9.

COROLLARY 1.

Forasmuch as in several of the preceding Scriptures there is such a change and humiliation asserted concerning Christ, as could not properly be asserted concerning an eternal and immutable being, as such, there is reason to believe that Christ had before his incarnation a created or derived nature, which would admit of such a change; though we are far from saying he had no other nature, and that all the texts quoted above refer to this.

COROLLARY 2.

This glorious Spirit, or Logos, must undoubtedly have been a most wonderful Person, possessed of vast and unknown degrees of natural and moral perfections, (for both must be included in the expression of the image of God,) beyond any of the creatures both in Heaven and upon Earth who were produced by his operation. Vid. Ax. 10.

Watts's Diss. on Trin. No. iii.; Works, vol. vi. p. 518.

COROLLARY 3.

His emptying himself for our sakes, and taking upon him the form of a servant (as it is expressly said he did, that he might become capable of suffering and death for us, vid. Phil. ii. 7, 8. Greek, Heb. ii. 9—17.) was a most amazing instance of condescension, and lays those, for whose benefit it was intended, under the highest obligation to love, reverence, and obey him.

Bulkley's Econ. of the Gospel, ii. 2.

COROLLARY 4.

The ample revelation of such a Person, who by the light of nature was entirely unknown, must be a glorious peculiarity of the Christian scheme, which recommends it to our highest regard, and demands our most serious attention.

COROLLARY 5.

They who, neglecting to inquire into the evidences of Christianity, bring themselves under a necessity of disregarding this glorious Person, bring guilt upon themselves by their neglect, proportionable to the excellency of his nature, the greatness of our obligation, and the opportunity they had of

* In addition to the writers who contend that the creation ascribed to Christ in the New Testament refers only to his being the Author of the Gospel dispensation, may be mentioned Mr Lindsey and Mr Cornelius of Cambridge. SCHOLIUM 1.

There are many who will not allow of any pre-existent, created, or derived nature of Christ, but explain all the phrases quoted above relating to his coming into the world, by the glory he originally possessed, and understand his emptying himself of it at his incarnation, merely as expressing a more or less sensible manifestation of a nature properly divine or immutable; alleging, that whatever may be asserted concerning either the divine or human nature, may be predicated of Christ as θεανθρωπος. To prove this doctrine and interpretation they plead, not only that God is said to have redeemed the church with his blood, and to have laid down his life for us, Acts xx. 28. (Vid. Mills, Enty. and Hallet in Loc.) and, according to some copies, 1 John iii. 16. (Vid. Mills in Loc.) but that Heb. ii. 9, 11, 16. are utterly inconsistent with the notion of such a pre-existent super-angelic Spirit as is supposed, Cor. 1.

Ans. It is difficult to say what inconsistency there is between that doctrine and the two former of these forecited texts, if we allow the glorious Spirit of Christ (which there is no reason at all to call human in its pre-existent state) to have been reduced to the condition of a human infant; since we have no notion of the nature of a human soul, but that of a created rational spirit united to and acted by a human body, as our own spirit is: and as to Heb. ii. 16. if επιλαμβανεται be interpreted took hold of, as it may naturally signify, and is plainly used, Luke xxiii. 26. all form of objection from these words will vanish.

What change was made in the Logos when united to human flesh, must be acknowledged to exceed our conceptions, and therefore to be incapable of full explication. The fathers frequently speak of a quiescence of its perfections.—If it be objected, That to suppose such a being divested of its will, of its knowledge, and power, as it must certainly have been, if it became the human soul of Christ (Luke ii. 52; xxii. 43. 2 Cor. xiii. 4.) is in fact to suppose it annihilated, and another being substituted in its room, it may be answered, That whether we do or do not suppose some degree of actual thought and perception essential to the human mind, such a consequence will not follow from such a supposed change; seeing here will still continue in the same subject either actual thought, or a power of thinking.

To which it may not be improper to add, That the Mahometans held an eternal ancient word, subsisting in God's essence, by which he spoke, and not by his simple essence; and the Platonics had a notion nearly resembling this, though Dr. Cudworth insists upon it, that it was not the same with that which the Arians afterwards held.

APPENDIX TO PROPOSITION CXXVI.

PROPOSITION

CHRIST was the Person in and by whom God appeared to men, under the Old Testament, by the name of JEHOVAH.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. There was often a visible appearance of Jehovah, the God of Israel.—Gen. xviii. pass. Exod. xxiv. 10. Isaiah vi. 1.

2. Scripture, as well as reason, assures us, the Father was not, and could not be, seen.—John. i. 18; v. 37. 1 Tim. vi. 16. Heb. xi. 27.

3. The Person spoken of as Jehovah, when visibly appearing to men, is sometimes expressly called the Angel of the Lord.—Gen. xviii. 1, 2; xxii. 15, 16; xxxi. 11, 13. Exod. iii. 2, 4; xiii. 21. compared with xiv. 19, 24. Exod. xxiv. 9—11. Gen. xlviii. 15, 16. Numb. xx. 16. compared with Exod. xx. 2. Judges vi. 12, 14. Isa. lxiii. 9. Zech. iii. 1, 2; xii. 8. He is also called the Captain of the Lord's Host. Joshua v. 14, 15. compared with vi. 2. and the Angel in whom the name of God was, Exod. xxiii. 21.

4. There is no hint of a plurality of persons successively employed as the medium of those divine manifestations.

5. When there is a reference to past transactions, they are referred to one Person as speaking, though numbers be sometimes described as present. Psal. lxxiii. 17; lxxviii. 15, &c. Hos. xii. 4, 5.

1—5. 6. There was one glorious Person, called both Jehovah and his Angel, who was, as above, under the Old Testament, the medium of divine manifestation.

6. 7. It is exceedingly probable that some great regards would be paid to this glorious Person in the whole dispensation of God, and that we should learn something of his dismission, if he were dismissed from that office, or of his present state, if he were not.

8. We learn from various passages in the New Testament, that Christ is the Logos of the Father. (John i. 1-3. Rev. xix. 1—3, 16.) by whom he made the world, and by whom he governs the kingdom of providence.—See the texts quoted Prop. 126. gr. 5.

9. We do not read in the New Testament of any other person, who had before been the medium of the divine dispensations,—but upon this occasion resigned his office to Christ.

7—9. 10. From the general character of Christ in the New Testament, compared with the account of the divine manifestations in the Old, and the silence of both with regard to any other person who was such a medium, we may infer, that it is most probable Christ was that Person.

11. Various things said to be spoken by or addressed to Jehovah in the Old Testament, are said in the New to be spoken of, done by, or addressed to, Christ, when such passages are referred to in the New, 1 Cor. x. 9. Heb. xi. 26; i. 8—12. compared with Psal. cii. 25, &c. John xii. 41. compared with Isa. vi. 9, 10. but Acts vii. 38. cannot properly be introduced here; for the word there must rather be understood of Moses than of Christ.

12. Several Scriptures not directly testifying this, will admit of the easiest interpretation, by supposing a reference to it;—John i. 11. Heb. xii. 25—27. compared with Psal. lxviii. 1 Cor. x. 9.

13. The primitive fathers of the Christian church represented this as the case.—See especially Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho.

14. It is also urged that the Chaldee Paraphrase shows it to have been the sense of the ancient Jews; and that there are many passages in their other most ancient writings, which speak the same language, and which can only be understood on this hypothesis.

10—14. 15. Christ was the Person by whom God appeared, under the Old Testament, by the name of Jehovah. Q. E. D.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it is objected, That this weakens St. Paul's argument in Heb. xiii. 2. and utterly destroys that in cap. ii. 2, 3. as both Grotius and Peirce have urged. As to the former of these texts, it is said that, if the hypothesis in the proposition were true, the apostle would have recommended hospitality not merely from those instances in which persons had unawares entertained angels, but in which they had received Christ himself, appearing under the character of the Angel of the Lord; but it may be sufficient to answer, that it does not seem necessary, in order to maintain the honour of Scripture, to assert that upon every occasion the apostles urged the strongest arguments that could possibly be proposed; besides, that this argument would not really have so much force in it as at first view it might appear to have; for as Christ had now left the earth, there would no longer be any opportunity of showing such hospitality to him again. Compare Acts iii. 21. As to Heb. ii. 2, 3. it is pleaded that if Christ was personally concerned in giving the law, there was no room to argue (as the apostle does) the superiority of the Gospel dispensation from its being published by our Saviour's ministry, since in this respect they were both equal. With regard to which, if it should not be allowed (as some have thought) that angels in this place only signify messengers, which indeed the context does not seem to favour,—yet this may be reconciled with the hypothesis in the proposition, if we suppose Christ to have been present in some visible form on Mount Sinai, but to have used the voice of angels in proclaiming that law which he publicly gave to Israel from thence; not to urge that these texts may in general refer to any message delivered by angels, and not particularly to the law; for it must be owned, that the following Scriptures show that the giving the law on Mount Sinai must be comprehended, if it were not principally referred to. See Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 19. Psal. lxviii. 17. On the whole, considering that in the places quoted above, God is said to have been among those angels, it seems impossible to defend the apostle's argument, if we suppose an extraordinary presence of the Father among them, on any topic, which will not also sufficiently defend it if we suppose Christ to have been so present. His appearance in human flesh, to preach the Gospel with his own mouth, and seal it with his blood, was so much greater condescension, than his encamping among the legions, whom he used as his heralds to proclaim his will, that it argues the Gospel to lie much nearer his heart than the law; and consequently the danger of despising the former, to be greater than that of despising the latter.

Peirce on Heb. ii. 2. Saur. Diss. vol. ii. p. 170.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is further objected, That God himself must sometimes have spoken as a distinct Person from Christ, of which Exod. xxiii. 20—23; xxxiii. 1—3. are urged as probable, and Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 5. John xii. 28. as certain, instances. To this it is replied, That though we allow the Father to have spoken sometimes without the mediation of the Son, it will not thence follow that he was not the medium generally made use of, especially when there were visible appearances to the church of the Jews.

Owen on Heb. vol. i. p. 164.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Mr. Lowman has objected, That the name of the Angel of the Lord might be given only to a material substance, which was not animated by any inferior spirit whatever (which seems indeed to have been the Sadducean hypothesis with regard to angels in general). Lowm. Civ. Gov. App. p. 45—48. but it is answered, As this does not agree with several other passages quoted above, so least of all with Exod. xxiii. 20, &c. and since the phrase Angel of the Lord does, generally at least, signify a distinct rational being, (as will afterwards be abundantly proved,) it is necessary to interpret it so in the present case, unless convincing reasons could be assigned for confining ourselves to this unlikely interpretation.

SCHOLIUM 4.

As for Mr. Peirce's hypothesis of Christ's undertaking the care of the Jewish people in such a manner as that he might be called their Guardian Angel, while other angels were guardians to other countries, (Dan. x. 13.) and that for administering his providence so remarkably well, he was appointed by God to be the head over all principalities and powers; and that those angels were divested of their former authority, that they might be made subject to him, to which he refers Eph. iv. 8. Col. ii. 15.—there is this great objection against it, That it seems not to make sufficient allowance for that superior dignity which the Logos must be possessed of, as the Creator of angels, and as more excellent than any of them. Vid. Heb. i.

Peirce on Col. ii. 15. and Heb. i. 9.

SCHOLIUM 5.

What has been said above, may perhaps give light to that much-controverted text, Phil. ii. 6, 7. the sense of which seems to be, "That Christ, who, when he appeared in divine glory to the Old-Testament saints, did not think he was guilty of any usurpation in speaking of himself by those names and titles which were peculiar to God; nevertheless, divested himself of those glories, that he might appear in our nature."

LECTURE CLVIII.

PROPOSITION CXXVII.

To enumerate the principal Scriptures in which names, titles, attributes, works, and honours, which are frequently appropriated to God, are, or seem to be, ascribed to Christ.

SOLUTION.

SECT. I. As for divine names,

1. The name Jehovah, which is appropriated to God, Psal. lxxxiii. 18. Isa. xlv. 5; xlii. 8. is given to Christ, Jer. xxiii. 6. Isa. xlv. 23—25. compared with Rom. xiv. 10—12. Isa. xl. 3. compared with Luke i. 76. and Isa. vi. 1, 9, 10. with John xii. 40, 41. To these some also refer Zech. xi. 12, 13; and whereas some urge, on the other side, Exod. xvii. 15. Judges vi. 24. Ezek. xlviii. 35. in which names, compounded of the word Jehovah, are given even to inanimate beings, it is answered, That there is a great deal of difference between that and the case of giving it to persons, since in such instances as those here produced, there was so evident a reference to the Divine Presence, that there could be no mistake concerning the meaning of the name: see also Jer. xxxiii. 16. But if the reasoning in the preceding proposition be allowed, there is no need of insisting on such particulars; it being indisputable, that on those principles Christ is called Jehovah many hundreds of times.

2. He is not only called God frequently, Matt. i. 23. John i. 1, 2; xx. 28. 1 Tim. iii. 16. (vid. Mills in Loc.) and perhaps 2 Pet. i. 1.—but he is called the true God, 1 John v. 20, 21. compare 1 John i. 2. and John xvii. 3. the great and mighty God, Tit. ii. 13. Isa. ix. 6. compare Deut. x. 17. Jer. xxxii. 18. Christ also seems to be called the only wise God, Jude ver. 24, 25. compare Eph. v. 26, 27. See also Rom. xvi. 27. the only God. Isa. xlv. 15. 17, 21—23. compared with Rom. xiv. 11. and God blessed for ever, Rom. ix. 5. compare 2 Cor. xi. 31. and Rom. i. 25.

It is pleaded, in answer to these texts, That the word God is often used in a subordinate sense, e. g. 1 Cor. viii. 5. 2 Cor. iv. 4. Exodus vii. 1. Psalm xcvii. 7; lxxxii. 6. John x. 34—36. but it is answered,

1. That in most, if not all, of these places, a subordination is expressly intimated.

2. That such additional titles as those mentioned above are never used; to which some add,

3. That o Θεος is never used concerning any who are Gods, only in a subordinate sense; but 2 Cor. iv. 4. is an instance of the contrary.

Sect. II. Titles appropriated to God, are also applied to Christ.

1. He (if the preceding reasoning be allowed) calls himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Exod. iii. 6. compare Acts vii. 30—32. Hos. xii. 3—5.

2. Lord of Hosts, Isa. viii. 13, 14. compared with the following passages: 1 Pet. ii. 6—8. Psal. cxviii. 22. Matt. xxi. 42. and 2 Sam. vi. 2. to which some add Isa. liv. 5. compared with 2 Cor. xi.

3. King of kings, and Lord of lords, Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 13—16. compared with Deut. x. 17. 1 Tim. vi. 14, 15.

4. The First and the Last, Rev. i. 17, 18; ii. 8. compare Isa. xli. 4. and xliv. 6. To the former of these especially it is objected, That Christ, though a created Being, might use such language as the Ambassador, and therefore Representative, of God. It is answered, That it is not usual for ambassadors to assert that they are the persons from whom they are sent; upon the same principles, any angel or prophet might have used the same language, and the temptation to idolatry would have been greater than it is reasonable to suppose God would have permitted. These arguments are further confirmed, by considering, on the one hand, how averse to idolatry the Jews were at the time when the New Testament was written, and how propense the Gentiles, which would have made such bold figures of speech in that book peculiarly dangerous.

Burn. on Art. p. 44. Herres on Mess. p. 137.

Sect. III. Attributes sometimes appropriated to God, are applied to Christ.

1. Omniscience, Col. ii. 3. Rev. ii. 23. to which many add John xxi. 17; ii. 24, 25. Matt. xii. 25. compared with 1 Kings viii. 39. and Jer. xvii. 9, 10.

2. Omnipresence, or a power of perception and operation in distant places at the same time, Matt. xviii. 20; xxviii. ult. Col. i. 17. to which many add Heb. i. 3. compare Jer. xxiii. 24. To these some add John i. 18; iii. 13. compare John ix. 25. (Greek); and also Gen. xix. 24. concerning which see Calvin's Notes on that place, and compare Hos. i. 7.

3. Almighty power, Phil. iii. 21. to which many add Rev. i. 8. It is indeed debated, whether that be spoken of Christ or the Father, but Rev. i. 11, 17, 18; ii. 8; xxii. 12, 13, 20. make it probable, that it refers to Christ. See also Prop. 126. gr. 5.

4. Eternity, Rev. i. 11, 17. Heb. vii. 3. Some also add Heb. xiii. 8. Prov. viii. 22, 23. compare Psal. xc. 2.

5. Immutability, Heb. i. 12; xiii. 8. compare Mal. iii. 6. James i. 17. and some have argued from John xvi. 15. that this, and all the other attributes of God, are claimed by Christ as his. See John v. 26.

LECTURE CLIX.

Sect. IV. Divine works of creation and universal support are ascribed to Christ as above, (see Prop. 126. gr. 5.) with this remarkable circumstance, that all things are said to have been made for as well as by him, Col. i. 16, 17. It is objected, That God is said to have created all things by Jesus Christ in several texts: compare 1 Cor. viii. 6. Eph. iii. 9. To this it is replied, That δια often signifies for as well as by; so that it may import their being made for the glory of Christ, or rather that the created or derived nature of Christ was the instrument by which the world was made. Compare Rom. xi. 36. Moore's Prop. p. 121.

Sect. V. Religious worship, though appropriated to God, Deut. vi. 13, 15; x. 20. Matt. vi. 10. was by divine approbation and command given to Christ, Heb. i. 6. John xx. 28. Acts vii. 59. Phil. ii. 9—11. compare Rom. xiv. 11. John v. 23. To this it is in the general objected, That we are to distinguish between supreme and subordinate worship, the former of which is due to God alone; the latter may be given to creatures: compare 1 Chron. xxix. 20. Matt. xviii. 26. It is replied, That in this case the worship addressed to man was apparently a civil, not a religious, homage; and that if it be the Christian scheme to introduce any inferior God, to whom religious adoration is to be paid, i. e. to whom we are to pray, whom we are to praise, in whom we are to confide, by whom we are to swear, (all which acts of worship are addressed to Christ in the following passages, John xiv. 1. answered by Exod. xiv. 31. and 2 Chron. xii. xx. 20. Rom. x. 13. 1 Cor. i. 2. Rom. xv. 12. 2 Cor. xii. 8. Rom. ix. 1.) one would have supposed that there should have been the strictest care to adjust the degree of worship due to him, that it might not interfere with that of the Supreme God: and it is hard to reconcile this with its being so often declared to be the design of the Gospel to bring men to the worship of the only true God, (Acts xiv. 15; xvii. 23, 24. Gal. iv. 8. 1 Thess. i. 9.) or with the force of Christ's reasoning in Luke iv. 8. This branch of the argument is likewise much illustrated by a multitude of texts, in which the apostles express an unlimited veneration, love, and obedience to Christ, and that dependence upon him and devotedness to him, which can only be justified in this view, and would indeed be very criminal, if he were to be considered only as an exalted man, or a mere creature; which two expressions, by the way, when applied to Christ in his present state, seem to coincide more than some have been willing to allow. Compare Phil. i. 20, 21. Col. iii. 11. Rom. xiv. 7—9. and many other texts quoted by Mr. Jennings in his discourses on preaching Christ.

COROLLARY.

It appears by the tenor of this proposition, that most if not absolutely all those names, titles, attributes, and works, which are ascribed and appropriated to the one eternal and ever-blessed God in Scripture, are also ascribed to Christ; and that such divine worship is required or encouraged to him, as is elsewhere appropriated to the one eternal and ever-blessed God.

DEFINITION LXXIX.

The word PERSON commonly signifies one single, intelligent, voluntary agent, or conscious being; and this we choose to call the philosophical sense of the word; but, in a political sense, it may express the different relations supported by the same philosophical person; v. g. the same man may be father, husband, son, &c. or the same prince King of Great Britain, Duke of Brunswick, and treasurer of the empire.

Dr. D. Scott's Ess. tow. a Dem. of Trin. Def. ii. Jenkins on Christianity, vol. ii. c. 26.

COROLLARY.

One philosophical person may sustain a great number of persons in the political, or, as some call it, the modal sense of the word.

SCHOLIUM.

Besides this, some have given various definitions of person in the theological sense of the word; of which few are more remarkable than that of Marcus, That "personality is a positive mode of being, ultimately terminating and filling a substantial nature, and giving to it incommunicability." To describe the Personality of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as "expressing that perfection of the Divine Nature, whereby it subsists three different ways, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, each of which, possessing the Divine Essence after his peculiar manner, thereby becomes a distinct Person," may perhaps be a definition much of the same import.

PROPOSITION CXXVIII.

God is so united to the derived nature of Christ, and does so dwell in it, that, by virtue of that union, Christ may be properly called God, and such regards become due to him as are not due to any created nature, or mere creature, be it in itself ever so excellent.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 127. Cor. 1. Such divine names, titles, attributes, and works, are ascribed, and such divine worship demanded or encouraged, to Christ, as are elsewhere appropriated to God.

2. Christ cannot be a being distinct from God, and yet coordinate with him, since that would infer such a plurality of Gods as is contrary both to natural and revealed religion (Prop. 39, 125. gr. 14.); besides, a multitude of things are said of Christ in Scripture, which undoubtedly prove him to be really and truly a man, and cannot be said of the one living and true God in himself considered; v. g. that he hungered, felt pain, died, &c.—Compare 1 Tim. ii. 5.

1, 2. 3. There must be some wonderful union of God with the man Christ Jesus, to lay a foundation for such ascriptions and regards.

4. The Scripture expressly speaks of such a union, and of God as dwelling in Christ.—John x. 28—30, 38; xvii. 11, 20—23. Col. i. 19. compare Eph. iii. 19. Col. ii. 19. John xiv. 9, 10.

* Some think I am too severe upon the question concerning the Divinity of Christ, as if I had not allowed matter for reasonable and pious inquiry and discussion. As I would by no means discourage, and indeed recommend to conscientious and pious persons to search into every proposed matter that concerns us most, and to form our own judgments, the most considerable part of them, with relevancy so far as we are able, to the Scriptural grounds and arguments of the controversy. There was a question (viz. whether Christ, head of Christ, being, as a man, a Deity of the Arian persuasion. thair Consciences by the Authority of Church Government and in pertinence to the Members of the Church of England.—In reference to this work see pamphlets, A modest Conference between the Author of the Common Sense of all Christian Prophets, in a Letter to the Reputed and the Rev. Doctors Mr Bennett, D. D. Mr. Hopkinson's Treatise gave occasion, we believe, to two or three other pieces in support of the common doctrine of the Trinity.

The most important publication of the Arian kind was the Essay on Spirit, ascribed to Dr. Robert Clayton, Bishop of Clogher, and which was the beginning of a considerable controversy. The publication of the Bishop's antagonists were as follows:—A Letter to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Clogher, occasioned by his Lordship's Essay on Spirit. A Dissertation on the Scripture Expression, the Angel of the Lord, and the Angel of Jehovah, considered; in Answer to a late Essay on Spirit. As also the most easy, Demonstration, from Principles justly pleasing to all the Trinitarians, of the several scriptural Glories of the Godhead by the Rev. John Kelly. A second Letter to the Bishop of Clogher. In Answer to the Essay on Spirit. By Thomas Rosse, M. A. A Vindication of the Essay on Spirit, from the misrepresentations of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Jones, who had appeared some time before as accusers, it seems absurdly for the Trinity. The Author was then Question. Whether is the Arminian Method, or Socinian Explanation and Defence, by Simon Reade, M. D. A Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, from the Exceptions of a late Pamphlet, entitled, An Essay on Spirit. Being the Substance of the Rev. Dr. Randolph's Sermon preached. The Doctrine of the Trinity proved and vindicated, in answer to the Essay on Spirit, and a pleasant proper Answer to the Question Why does not the Bishop of Clogher resign his Preferments? The two last tracts are supposed to have been the productions of Dr. Clayton himself. In this controversy, the books of principal importance were on the one side Mr. Hopkins's Sequel, and on the other side, Dr. Randolph's Vindication.

A much feebler Vindicator of the Arian hypothesis, was Mr. Henry Taylor, in his Apology of Benjamin Ben Mordecai to his Friends for embracing Christianity, to whom may be added Dr. Harwood in his Five Dissertations on the first of which he opposes the Arminian Doctrine, and in the second, the Socinian Scheme. Dr. Price enters the lists with regard to both these Schemes in his Sermons on the Arminian Doctrine. A Defence of the Arian hypothesis may also be seen in the fourth volume of the Theological Repository, p. 145—167, and in Mr. Cornish's Tract on the Preexistence of Christ.

Of late years, the controversy relative to the Divinity of Christ, has chiefly been between the defenders and opponents of the Socinian System; among the former of whom Dr. Priestley stands particularly distinguished. Previously however to the Doctrine of things upon the subject, several works were published of the same tendency. Among these, the most elaborate were Mr. Hopkin Haynes's Scripture Account of the Attributes and Worship of God, and of the Character and Offices of Jesus Christ. Dr. Lardner's Letter, written in the Year 1730, concerning the reason to Whether the Logos meant of the Plato of the Human Soul in the Person of Jesus Christ?—and Mr. Cardale's True Doctrine of the New Testament concerning Jesus Christ considered; wherein the misrepresentations that have been made of it, upon the Arian hypothesis, and upon all Trinitarian and Athanasian Principles, are exposed; and the Honour of our Saviour's Divine Character and Mission asserted.—Mr. Cornish and likewise the author of A Comparison of the Socinian and Arian Principles in Christ's Power at the Close of his public Ministry; being a Supplement to the true Doctrine of the New Testament;—and of a Treatise on the Application of certain Terms and Epithets in Jesus Christ, shewing that they have no Foundation either in the modern Revelation, or in any Principles of sound Reason and Philosophy. We may add to these, as the most lately published, till the year 1781, Dr. Lardner's Six Sermons of the Trinity considered, and the Divine Unity asserted. Dr. Price's Sermons on Phipps's Life, 1778. The reasons referred to by Dr. Lardner, besides the separate impressions of them, may be seen in his Works, vol. xi. p. 720. 2nd ed. 8vo. edit.

Dr. Priestley's publications relative to the present subject are, An Appeal to the serious and candid Professors of Christianity. No. 1. A Letter to Illustration of certain Passages of Scripture. A Free View of the Arguments for the Unity of God, and the Personality and Preexistence of Christ, from Reason, from the Old Testament, and from History. A History of the Corruptions of Christianity. Matt. xix. 17; that he often prays to his Father; that he declares himself to have received from the Father those things for which he is most eminent; and that, throughout the whole of his administration, he is described as the servant of God, Isa. xlii. 1; lii. 13; liii. 11. (by which some have explained his taking upon him the form of a servant, Phil. ii. 6.) referring all to his glory, and assisting his creatures in their approaches to him; to whom he shall finally give up the kingdom, 1 Cor. xv. 24—29.

With regard to all these texts, it is to be observed that we by no means assert (as some few have done) that the human nature of Christ is absorbed in the divine, which would indeed make the objection unanswerable; but acknowledging the reality and perpetuity of it, we reply, That all these things must be understood as being spoken by or of him as man and mediator, without a reference to that union with God established in the preceding proposition.

Dr. Clarke asserts the Logos to be something between a created and self-existent nature. But it is difficult to enter into the foundation of this distinction, unless the idea of a creature be, not a thing produced out of nothing by the Divine Power, but a thing produced by the Father, through the agency of the Son; which is a very unusual sense of the word. Clarke on Trin. p. ii. Prop. xiv. xvii.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The doctrine of the divinity of Christ has generally been expressed, by saying that the human and divine nature of Christ are united in one person, which has generally been called the hypostatic or personal union: and those were condemned as heretics in the fourth century, who either, on the one hand, maintained there was but one nature, or, on the other, that there were two persons in Christ. It is evident that Scripture does not use this language in what it teaches us on this head; nor is it easy to determine the idea which has been affixed to the word person, when used in this controversy. It has been pleaded, that we may as well conceive the union of the divine and human nature in one person, as of the soul and body in man: but it is plain this is far from being entirely a parallel case, since here are not two conscious beings united; and that God and the creature should have one and the same consciousness, certainly exceeds our comprehension. It seems, therefore, that those who have fixed any idea at all to the term person here, rather mean it in a political sense, to express the concurrent operation of the Deity with the human nature of Christ, in order to constitute a perfect mediator.

Dr. Waterland's definition of the word person, as used in this question, is this:—"A single person is an intelligent agent, having the distinct characters I, Thou, He, and not divided or distinguished into more intelligent agents capable of the same characters:" where it is proper to observe, he does not say it is not divisible or distinguishable, which is not here the case, but not divided or distinguished.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It has been hotly debated, whether Christ be called the only-begotten Son of God, with regard merely to his being the promised Messiah, or to his extraordinary conception and exaltation to his kingdom as mediator; or whether the expression refers to the eternal generation of the divine nature. The texts brought to prove the latter, are chiefly Psal. ii. 7. Prov. viii. 22, 23, 25. Micah v. 2. Heb. i. 2, 3. Col. i. 15. John i. 14, 18. but others have explained these texts of the production of the created or derived nature of Christ, which, according to the preceding hypothesis, was prior to the creation of the world; and with regard to some of them, have attempted to prove their application to Christ's Deity uncertain, and that the first of them relates to his resurrection. Compare Acts xiii. 33. urging that it is utterly inconceivable that a nature truly and properly divine should be begotten, since begetting, whatever idea is annexed to it, must signify some kind of derivation.

LECTURE CLX.

LEMMA TO PROPOSITION CXXIX.

It is evident that frequent mention is made of the HOLY SPIRIT in the New Testament, as an agent of great importance in carrying on the Christian cause.

have been written by Mr. Nisbett, the first with a particular view to Dr. Priestley's exceptions on the subject, and the second in answer to a private letter, addressed to him by Mr. John Pope. Mr. Pope has published a reply to Mr. Nisbett.

PROPOSITION CXXIX.

To enumerate the principal of those Scriptures, in which divine names, titles, attributes, works, or worship, are, or seem to be, ascribed to the Holy Spirit.

SOLUTION.

1. Many plead that the Holy Spirit is called Jehovah in the Old Testament, by comparing Acts xxviii. 25. with Isa. vi. 9. and Heb. iii. 7—9. with Exod. xvii. 7. Jer. xxxi. 31—34. with Heb. x. 15. 16. That he is called God, Acts v. 4. seems probable; to which some add 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19. 2 Cor. iii. 17.

2. Divine perfections are certainly ascribed to the Spirit of God,—particularly Omniscience, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. Isa. xl. 13, 14. to which some add 1 John ii. 20; Omnipresence, Psal. cxxxix. 7. Eph. ii. 17, 18. Rom. viii. 26, 27; Omnipotence, Luke i. 35. 1 Cor. xii. 11; Eternity, Heb. ix. 14.

3. Divine works are evidently ascribed to the Spirit; Gen. i. 2. Job xxvi. 13; xxxiii. 4. and Psal. xxxiii. 6; civ. 30. et sæp. Some likewise add those texts in which miracles, inspiration, and saving operations upon the heart of man, are ascribed to the Spirit.

4. The chief texts produced to prove that divine worship is given to the Spirit, are Isa. vi. 3. compared with ver. 9. and Acts xxviii. 25, &c. Rom. ix. 1. Rev. i. 4. 2 Cor. xiii. 14. and above all, Matt. xxviii. 19.

COROLLARY.

The blessed Spirit is spoken of in such a manner as we cannot imagine would be used in speaking of a mere creature, and consequently must be possessed of a nature properly divine.

Clarke on the Trin. part i. c. iii. Taylor on the Trin. part iii. p. 477—517.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The chief controversy on this head is, Whether the Spirit of God be a person in the philosophical sense, or merely a divine power or energy. That he is a person, is argued from his being described as having understanding, 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11; willing, 1 Cor. xii. 11; speaking, and sending messengers, Isa. vi. 8. compared with Acts xxviii. 25; viii. 29; x. 19, 20; xiii. 1—4. 1 Tim. iv. 1. yea, as Dr. Barrow interprets it, sending Christ, Isa. xlviii. 16; as pleading, Rom. viii. 26; as being grieved, Isa. lxiii. 10. Eph. iv. 30; as teaching and reminding, John xiv. 26; as testifying, John xv. 26; as reproving, John xvi. 8. &c.; as executing a commission received from God, John xvi. 13, 14.

Those who assert the Spirit to be a divine power, plead chiefly the sense of the word in the Old Testament; where they say it generally has that signification; and that it would be absurd to suppose that the idea should be so greatly changed, when Christ and his apostles addressed those who had been bred up in the Jewish religion, and must therefore have been used to conceive of the Spirit according to the representation made in their sacred oracles.

It is also pleaded, that the pouring out one person on another, is both unscriptural and unintelligible language; but not so, if it relates to a divine power, influence, or operation. They urge in favour of this explication of the doctrine, Luke i. 35. and reply to the Scriptures urged above, by observing, that nothing was more common among the ancients, and especially the eastern nations, than to represent powers, properties, and attributes, by personal characters: thus wisdom is represented as contriving, rejoicing, inviting, pleading, reproving, &c.; Prov. i. 20, &c.; iii. 13, &c.; iv. 6, &c.; viii. 1; ix. 1, &c.; charity, as believing, rejoicing, &c. 1 Cor. xiii.; and death, as being plagued, Hos. xiii. 14; the Scripture, as foreseeing and preaching, Gal. iii. 8; the sun, as rejoicing, Psal. xix. 5; a famine, as coming at God's call, 2 Kings viii. 1; righteousness, as walking before him. Compare Psal. lxxxv. 10—13; and the wind, as willing, John iii. 8. But it is answered, That none of these come up to the preceding texts; especially considering how frequently the personal term ἄγγελος is used, when spoken of the Spirit, and that not in poetical, but in the most plain and simple, discourses: but the strongest objection against this opinion arises from the form of baptism, and the forementioned John xvi. 13. 14.

Watts's Diss. v. § 4. p. 144; Works, vol. vi. p. 605. *

SCHOLIUM 3.

Among those who grant the Spirit to be a person, it is debated whether he be the same philosophical person with the Father, or another distinct from him. To suppose the latter (supposing him at the same time equal with the Father) is making him another God. Some therefore have represented him as a created spirit, in his own nature inferior both to Father and Son; against which the passages enumerated in the preceding proposition have been strongly urged; as it has also been, that the Spirit is never mentioned as a creature called upon to praise God, when a large enumeration of such is made. Others consider him as a created Spirit (called, as one thinks, Michael the Archangel) so united to God, and so acted by him, as by virtue of that union to become capable of such representations and regards as the Son is, though acting in some subordination to him in the economy of our redemption; while many others have contented themselves with asserting that there is only a political, modal, or economical distinction, in the personality of Father, Son, and Spirit. Others again have maintained that the Spirit is a third distinction in the Deity; and when he is called a person, the word is to be taken in a sense below the philosophical and above the modal; though what determinate idea is to be affixed to it, they do not more particularly say.

* A hypothesis [illegible] contrary to God in the text may be seen in Dr. Lardner's 2nd part of his [illegible] vol. ii. [illegible] an explication of those words, The Spirit, the Holy Spirit, and That Spirit of God as used in the Scriptures. Vol. ii. p. [illegible]

SCHOLIUM 4.

Divines have commonly taught, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son: and the Popish schoolmen introduce the phrase of spiration, to signify the manner in which his personality was derived from them. He is indeed said to come or to be sent forth from the Father, John xv. 26. and Christ often promises that he would send him; but for that notion of his spiration, mentioned above, it cannot be explained, and therefore cannot be defended.

Watts's Diss. p. 155; ib. p. 166; Works, vol. vi. p. 609. T. Burn. on Trin. p. 118. Mosh. Hist. Eccles. Le Seculum viii. part ii. c. iii. § ult.

SCHOLIUM 5.

On the whole, forasmuch as the Spirit is plainly spoken of in Scripture under a personal character, it is proper to retain that language in discoursing of him and praying for him, even though we should not be able certainly to determine in our own minds as to the nicety of some of those questions which have been touched upon in the preceding scholia.

Clarke on Trin. part ii. § 53, 54.

LECTURE CLXI.

PROPOSITION CXXX.

The Scripture represents the Divine Being as appearing in, and manifesting himself by, the distinct persons of FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST, each of whom has his peculiar province in accomplishing the work of our redemption and salvation, and to each of whom we owe an unlimited veneration, love, and obedience.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. That God appears under the character of Father in Scripture, i. e. the Father of Christ, and through him the Father of all his people, is so clear from the whole tenor of the New Testament, that it would be superfluous to enumerate particular texts in proof of it.—John xx. 17. 2 Cor. i. 3.

Prop. 127. Cor. 2. The Scripture represents the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, as a divine person, in whom the fulness of the Godhead dwelt, by whom the Father manifested himself to us, and who, with the Father, is God over all.

Prop. 129. Cor. 3. The Scripture also represents the Holy Spirit as a divine person, possessed of those attributes and perfections which are to be found in God alone.

4. There are various texts of Scripture, in which Father, Son, and Spirit are mentioned together, and represented under distinct personal characters; v. g. Matt. xxviii. 19; iii. 16, 17. 1 Cor. xii. 4—6. 2 Cor. xiii. ult. Eph. iv. 4—6. Heb. ix. 14. to which some add Rev. i. 4, 5. As for 1 John v. 7. the authority of it is contested; nor is the importance of it so very great as some have imagined, since it does not exactly determine in what respects the three there spoken of are one. Vid. Calv. in Loc. et Instit. l. i. c. xiii. § 5, 6.

5. It is every where represented in Scripture, that our redemption was contrived by the Father, purchased by the Son, and is applied by the Spirit, through whose assistance, in the name of Christ, we are to make our approaches to the Father. Eph. i. 3, 4. Tit. iii. 4—7. Rom. xv. 16. Eph. ii. 18.

5. 6. Hence it appears that correspondent regards are due to each, which are accordingly required in many passages of Scripture, John v. 23. 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Eph. iv. 30.

SCHOLIUM 1.

If it be asked, How these divine persons are three, and how one?—it must be acknowledged an inexplicable mystery: nor should we wonder that we are much confounded when inquiring into the curiosities of such questions, if we consider how little we know of our own nature and manner of existence. Vid. Prop. 18.

SCHOLIUM 2.

If it be inquired, In what sense the word person is used in the proposition? we answer, It must at least be true in a political sense, yet cannot amount to so much as a philosophical personality, unless we allow a plurality of Gods: and if there be any medium between these, (which we cannot certainly say there is not,) we must confess it to be to us unsearchable, and the higher our notions of distinct personality are carried, the more difficult does it appear to our feeble reason to clear up the Supreme Divinity of each, and vice versa.

Watts's Disc. No. vi. Works, vol. vi. p. 619.

SCHOLIUM 3.

We must acknowledge that Scripture seems sometimes to neglect this distinction of persons; and God dwelling in Christ, is sometimes called the Father, and sometimes the Holy Spirit. Vid. John xiv. 9, 10. Matt. xii. 28. John i. 32. Heb. ix. 14. 1 Pet. iii. 18. Acts v. 38.

Watts's Unif. Q. No. iv. v. p. 130; Works, vol. vi. p. 696.

SCHOLIUM 4.

From several texts above quoted, compared with some others, viz. Isa. lxi. 1, 2. John iii. 34. Acts x. 38. Matt. xii. 28. Heb. ix. 14. Rom. i. 4; viii. 11.) in which Christ is spoken of as qualified for his work by the descent of the Spirit upon him, and its indwelling in him, an argument has been deduced in proof of the Deity of the Spirit; which is also hinted at by Dr. Barrow.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Some have supposed that the plurality of persons in the Deity is every where intimated in the Old Testament, by the use of the plural אלהים to signify the one living and true God. (Which word, by the way, Mr. Hutchinson and his followers would read Elahim, or Alaim, as supposing it refers to the oath, or covenant, into which they have entered with each other and the church.) To confirm this opinion, it is further argued, that plural verbs (Gen. xx. 13. xxxv. 7.) and plural adjectives (Jer. xxiii. 36. compare Deut. xxxii. 17.) are sometimes joined with it.

LECTURE CLXII.

PROPOSITION CXXXI.

To inquire into the opinions of the most ancient Christian writers concerning the doctrine of the Trinity.

SOLUTION.

For a more particular solution we choose to refer to Bull, in his Defensio Fidei Nicenæ, Waterland, Clarke, and Jackson; especially the notes of the latter on NOVATIAN, which contain an enumeration of all the most important passages which are urged from them on any side of the controversy. The chief passages from the writers of the two first centuries may be seen in the fourth volume of Whiston's Primitive Christianity: a particular account of what each has said would take up a disproportionate room here; we must therefore content ourselves with the following general remarks.

1. Most of these writers speak of Christ and of the Holy Spirit as distinct persons in the philosophical sense of the word, and as the objects of the worship of Christians.

2. Before the Council of Nice, they generally spoke of the Son as having had a glorious nature pre-existent to his incarnation: they represented him as derived from the Father, and nevertheless so partaking of the Father's nature, as to be called God of God, Light of light; and they illustrate this in general by the simile of one taper being kindled by another, and of rays proceeding from the sun: this after the Council of Nice was explained by the word ὁμοούσιος: and it was reckoned heretical to say that the Son was ὁμοούσιος.

3. They, about the time of that council, counted those to be heretics, who asserted the Son to have been produced ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, or who reckoned him in the number of creatures.

4. This doctrine is only touched upon by the earliest fathers in an incidental manner: Origen and Tertullian treated most largely of it; and Novatian is the only writer of the three first centuries, whose entire treatise on this subject is come down to us.

5. It must be acknowledged that several of the fathers talked in a very loose and sometimes a very inconsistent manner; and several of them used expressions which, after the Council of Nice, would have been condemned as heretical.

6. After the time of this celebrated council, which was near the beginning of the fourth century, they ran into several subtilties of expression, in which one would imagine they studied rather to conceal than to explain their sentiments: yet they grew so warm upon the subject, as to anathematize, oppose, and murder each other on account of some of those unscriptural phrases, much to the dishonour of their common profession.

Chandler's Hist. of Pers. p. 39, &c.*

7. Most of the oldest Post-Nicene fathers carried their notion of the distinct personality and Supreme Divinity to a very great height; and seemed to have imagined they sufficiently supported the unity of the Godhead, by asserting that Father, Son, and Spirit had each of them the same divine, as three or more men have each of them the same human, nature.

Le Clerc's Life of Greg. Naz. p. 249. Dr. T. Burnet on the Trin. p. 135.

SCHOLIUM.

The subject of this proposition may receive some further illustration by mentioning some of the most considerable of those opinions, which were generally accounted heretical by the ancient Christians.

1. That of the Cerinthians, Ebionites, and Carpocratians,—who seem to have asserted that Christ was a mere man, and had no existence before his incarnation. This is the same doctrine which was revived in the fourth century by Photinus, as it had been before by Paulus Samosatenus.

2. The Arians, who held him to be only the first and most glorious creature of God, denying he had any thing which could properly be called a divine nature, any otherwise than as any thing very excellent, may by a figure be called divine, or his delegated dominion over the system of nature might entitle him to the name of God: and they seem also to have thought, that the Spirit was another distinct inferior being, created by the Son; but they did not employ themselves much in this part of the controversy. This is a heresy which most largely prevailed, and in some places and times seems to have almost entirely swallowed up what is commonly called the orthodox or catholic faith.

3. That of Nestorius, who asserted there were two persons in Christ, as well as two natures; to which was directly opposed that of Eutyches, who asserted but one nature, as well as one person, teaching that the human nature was absorbed in the divine: and these different extremes occasioned the most violent agitations in the disordered churches during the fifth and sixth centuries.

4. That of Macedonius, who denied the Holy Spirit to have any proper divine substance, and represents him only as a created power, which was diffused over all other creatures.

5. That of Sabellius, who taught that the Father, Son, and Spirit were only names and offices of the same person, who was in heaven called the Father, on earth the Son, and, as exerting his power on the creation, the Holy Spirit.

For the most ancient account of these, consult Eusebius, Sozomen, and Theodoret, in their Ecclesiastical History, and also Bayle's or Collier's Dictionaries, under their names. Many of the most material passages are collected and exhibited by Dr. Berriman and Dr. Ab. Taylor in their treatises on the Trinity.†

LECTURE CXXIII

PROPOSITION CXXX.

To give a brief account of some of the most celebrated of the opinions among the moderns, concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, especially of the English writers.

SOLUTION.

1. Mr. Baxter seems, as some of the schoolmen did, to have thought the three divine persons to be one and the same God, understanding, willing, and beloved by himself; or wisdom, power, and love; which he thinks illustrated by the three essential primalities (as he calls them) in the soul of man, viz. vital active power, intellect, and will; and in the sun, motion, light, and heat.

Baxt. End of Contr. c. ii. Baxt. Works, vol. ii. p. 130—132; ib. vol. iii. p. 568.

2. Dr. Clarke's scheme is, that there is one Supreme Being, who is the Father, and two subordinate, derived, and dependent beings: but he waves calling Christ a creature, as the ancient

* An ample discussion of this subject will be found in the authors referred to in the note annexed to the demonstration of the hundred and twenty-eighth proposition.

† For an account of the controversy between Dr. Waterland and Dr. Clarke, see the Memoirs of Clarke, by Dr. Robert Clarke, and the Life of Waterland, by Dr. Van Mildert. See also Dr. Waterland's Vindication of the latter work, vol. i. of the octavo edition.

Arians did, and principally on that foundation disclaims the charge of Arianism

Clarke on the Trin. part iii. Prop. 7, &c.

3. Dr. Thomas Burnet maintains one self-existent and two dependent beings, but asserts, that the two latter are so united to and inhabited by the former, that by virtue of that union, divine perfections may be ascribed, and divine worship paid to them. Burnet's Script. Doct. p. 173.

4. Mr. Howe seems to suppose that there are three distinct eternal Spirits, or distinct intelligent hypostases, each having his own distinct, singular, intelligent nature, united in such an inexplicable manner, as that upon account of their perfect harmony, consent, and affection, to which he adds their mutual self-consciousness, they may be called the one God, as properly as the different corporeal, sensitive, and intellectual natures united may be called one man. Howe's Works, vol. ii. p. 560.

5. Dr. Waterland, Dr. Ab. Taylor, with the rest of the Athanasians, assert three proper distinct persons, entirely equal to and independent upon each other, yet making up one and the same being; and that though there may appear many things inexplicable in the scheme, it is to be charged to the weakness of our understanding, and not to the absurdity of the doctrine itself.

Tayl. on Trin. part i. c. i. Waterl. Vind. and Serm.

6. Bishop Pearson, with whom Bishop Bull also agrees, is of opinion, that though God the Father is the fountain of the Deity, the whole divine nature is communicated from the Father to the Son, and from both to the Spirit; yet so as that the Father and Son are not separate, nor separable from the Divinity, but do still exist in it, and are most intimately united to it. This was likewise Dr. Owen's scheme.

Bull's Serm. vol. iii. p. 829. Owen on the Heb. i. 3. p. 83. Pears. on the Creed, p. 134, &c.

7. Dr. Wallis thought that the distinction between the three persons was only modal; which seems also to have been Archbishop Tillotson's opinion.

Wallis's Letter on the Trinity. Tillotson, vol. i. p. 492—494.

8. Dr. Watts maintained one supreme God dwelling in the human nature of Christ, which he supposes to have existed the first of all creatures; and speaks of the divine Logos as the wisdom of God, and the Holy Spirit as the divine power, or the influence and effect of it; which he says is a Scriptural person, i. e. spoken of figuratively in Scripture under personal characters.

Watts's Diss. No. viii. Works, vol. vi. p. 630—639. Flem. Christol. vol. i. l. ii. c. v. p. 188.

9. Dr. Jeremiah Taylor says, "That he who goes about to speak of the mystery of the Trinity, and does it by words and names of man's invention, talking of essences and existences, hypostases and personalities, priorities in co-equalities, &c. and unity in pluralities, may amuse himself, and build a tabernacle in his head, and talk something he knows not what; but the good man, that feels the power of the Father, and to whom the Son is become wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, in whose heart the love of the Spirit of God is shed abroad, this man, though he understands nothing of what is unintelligible, yet he alone truly understands the Christian doctrine of the Trinity."

Jer. Tayl. on John vii. 17. ap. Bessie's Def. of Quakerism, § 8.

COROLLARY 1.

Considering the excellent character of many of the persons above mentioned, whose opinons were most widely different, we may assure ourselves, that many things asserted on the one side and on the other relating to the Trinity, are not fundamental in religion. See Mr. Simon Browne's Sober and charitable Disquisition concerning the Importance of the Trinity.

Watts's Works, vol. vi. p. 715; ibid. p. 730. Fawc. Cand. Refl. on the Doct. of the Trinity.

COROLLARY 2.

We may hence learn to be cautious how we enter into unscriptural niceties in expressing our own conceptions of this doctrine, which is by all allowed to be so sublime and so peculiar to revelation.

Flem. Christol. vol. i. p. 187—191.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Some traces of this doctrine are supposed by many in the writings of Plato, and yet more probably in those of Philo the Jew, and in some of the Targums. See the references to Prop. 126. Schol. 3.

PART VIII.

OF THE FALL OF HUMAN NATURE, AND OUR RECOVERY BY THE MEDIATORIAL UNDERTAKING OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.

LECTURE CLXIV.

PROPOSITION CXXXIII.

MANKIND is at present in a degenerate state; and there is reason to believe that there never has been, since the transgression of Adam, and never will be among his adult descendants, a sinless mortal on earth, Christ excepted.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Our own observation on ourselves, and those adult persons with whom we are conversant, may convince us that the philosophical liberty of our minds and theirs is in some considerable degree impaired (Prop. 17.); and so far as the most credible history of all nations can inform us, this seems to have been a universal phenomenon.—See Prop. 89. and Schol.

2. There are many passages in Scripture which assert, not only that this was in fact the case with regard to those generations in which the authors lived,—but some of them plainly intimate that it always had been, and was likely to continue so: Gen. vi. 5. compared with viii. 21. 2 Chron. vi. 36. Psal. xix. 12; cxxx. 3. cxliii. 2. Prov. xx. 19. Eccles. vii. 20. Rom. vii. 14, &c. Gal. iii. 22; v. 17, 24. Eph. ii. 1—3. Tit. iii. 2—7. James iii. 2. John i. 8. to which we may add all those texts that assert the necessity of regeneration, and of mortification, and which speak of the sinful principle as the old man, Rom. vi. 6. Eph. iv. 22—24. Col. iii. 9. and indeed the whole of the apostle's argument in the beginning of the epistles to the Romans and Galatians, as well as all those other texts that are afterwards to be produced, to prove the universal necessity of believing in Christ for salvation, are conclusive to the same purpose; because they suppose mankind to be in a state of death and ruin, brought upon them by sin. Compare John iii. 16, 36; v. 24. 1 John iii. 14. Mark xvi. 15, 16. Luke xxiv. 47. and especially Rom. iii. 9—20. in which the apostle seems expressly to assert that the passages there quoted from the Old Testament contain a just representation of what is in general the moral character of mankind; and to this last argument John seems evidently to refer. 1 John i. 10.

3. Many of these evil inclinations begin to work very early, and appear even in children from the first dawn of reason. Compare Psal. lviii. 3. Isaiah xlviii. 8. Prov. xxii. 15.

1, 2, 3. 4. Mankind is at present in a very corrupt and sinful state.

5. It seems, in the nature of things, very improbable that so holy and good a God should have formed mankind in the original constitution of their nature in so corrupt and sinful a state.

Prop. 89. Cor. 3. 109. gr. 3. 6. There has prevailed among many nations a tradition, that mankind was once in a much more holy and happy state.

7. There are various passages of Scripture, besides the Mosaic History of the Fall, which plainly intimate that mankind was once in a better state; but that now a corrupted nature is derived from one generation to another. Eccles. vii. 29. compare Gen. i. 31; v. 1, 3. Job xi. 12; xiv. 4; xxv. 4. Psal. li. 5. Ezek. xxxvi. 26. John iii. 5. compare viii. 7.

4, 5, 6, 7. 8. Mankind is in a state of degeneracy, in which the original rectitude and glory of the human nature is in a great measure lost.

9. That Christ is not comprehended in this assertion, appears from Prop. 113. gr. 5.

8, 9. 10. Vide propositio.

Limb. Theol. lib. iii. c. iv. § 1, 2. Turret. Inst. vol. i. Loc. ix. Q. x. p. 694. Taylor. Orig. Sin. p. 100, &c. Jen. Ans. pass. Edw. Orig. Sin, i. 51. 8. 2. ii. iii. Chandl. Posth. Serm. vol. iv. No. vi. part 1.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Against that part of gr. 7. which relates to the propagation of a corrupt nature from one generation to another, it is objected, That the phenomenon of universal corruption in all the adult may be accounted for another way, i. e. by ascribing it entirely to imitation.

Ans. 1. The Scriptures quoted there, seem evidently to place it higher.

2. There often appear in children propensities towards those vices, of which they have seen no examples.

3. There are many examples of eminent virtue in the world, which yet are not so frequently or easily imitated as those of a vicious nature; which plainly shows a bias on the mind towards vice.

4. In consequence of this, those who have most carefully studied human nature, even among the Pagans, have acknowledged and that in very strong terms) an inward depravation and corruption, adding a disproportionate force to evil examples, and rendering the mind averse to good.

Watts's Ruin and Rec. p. 37. Works, vol. vi. p. 200. Hooker's Lec. Temp. part ii. c. iv. § 4—6. ap. Op. vol. i. p. 147. Reh. on Sp. p. 169. Watts's Cont. betw. Flesh and Sp. Tayl. Serip. Doct. of Orig. Sin, p. 190. Edw. ib. p. 131.

It is objected, That a propensity to sensual enjoyments is the inseparable consequence of our existence in a body, and of the weakness of reason in our infant state, when the sensitive and passionate powers are so strong.

Ans. 1. This propensity is not merely in proportion to the degree requisite for the good either of the individual or the species, and consequently is itself (so far as it prevails) the very corruption of our nature of which we speak.

2. That the degrees of goodness observable in the natural tempers of some children, may evidently convince us that it would have been very possible for the human constitution to have been so adjusted, that from the beginning the temptations to sin should have been much smaller than they generally are.

Tayl. Serip. Doct. p. 224. Sup. p. 50. Edw. on Orig. Sin, p. 150.

It is further objected, That it is inconsistent with the goodness, and even the justice, of God, to form creatures with evil propensities, and afterwards to leave them to condemnation and ruin in consequence of them; and it is also said to be inconsistent with his holiness, to make a creature corrupt in its first original.

Ans. 1. The difficulty is considerably lessened, if we suppose that things are so constituted upon the whole, as that a man is not necessarily impelled to any irregular actions which shall end in his final destruction.

2. What remains of the difficulty, after such a solution, is that which arises from the observation of plain facts, and not peculiar to the Christian scheme; nor is it at all increased, by supposing that man was once in a better state; but, on the contrary, rather much diminished.

Taylor's Supplement § 4.

SCHOLIUM 4.

As to the manner in which this hereditary corruption of our nature is conveyed, we acknowledge we cannot particularly explain it, but it seems exceedingly probable that it may result from the constitution of the body, and the dependence of the mind upon it, Prop. 3.

Lime-st. Lect. vol. i. p. 304. Watts's Ruin and Rec. p. 145; Works, vol. vi. p. 24. Turret. Inst. Loc. 18. Q. xii. vol. i. p. 706. Baluzii Tractat. p. 286. Tayl. Serip. Doct. p. 184.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Those passages of Scripture in which infants are said to be innocent, have been thought by some an objection against the proposition; v. g. Deut. i. 39. Jonah iv. 11. 1 Cor. xiv. 20. Matt. xviii. 3, 4. but this objection can only lie against that manner of expressing and stating the doctrine, which represents this corruption of nature as, properly speaking, sin. Now, as to this part of the controversy, it is evidently to be determined by the manner in which sin is defined; if it signify, as it commonly does, "An action contrary to the divine law," these evil propensities are not sins, but rather the root whence sin proceeds; if it be defined "A want of conformity to God's law," as well as a transgression of it, they must be allowed sinful; but if sin be taken in a more indeterminate sense, for any thing which God will or might punish with final misery,—the question must be considered in a further extent, and is referred to the scholia of the following proposition.

Limb. Theol. lib. iii. c. iv. § 3—11. p. 20. Tayl. Sup. to Orig. Sin, § vii. Lightf. Works, vol. ii. p. 569. Hor. Heb. on John ix. 2. Watts's Ruin and Rec. p. 41; Works, vol. vi. p. 202.

LECTURE CLXV

PROPOSITION CXXXIV.

To inquire into the account which is given in Scripture of the Fall of our first parents.

SOLUTION.

1. It is evident that they were created free from sin and from vicious inclinations, Gen. i. 31. Eccles. vii. 29. there is reason also to believe that the natural capacities of Adam's mind were good, and his genius at least equal to that which is to be found in any of his descendants; as well as that his bodily form was regular and beautiful, and his constitution so framed as to contain no principles of distemper; but perhaps some have carried the matter too high, in the representation they have given of the vast strength of his understanding, and the strong bias there was upon his will towards the choice of virtue and obedience.

Burg. Six. Lect. vol. i. p. 180. Smith's Serm. vol. i. p. 124. Tayl. Syst. Div. part iii. Suppl. on Orig. Sin, c. viii.

2. God forbade to our first parents the eating the fruit of some certain tree, (the kind of which is now unknown, and perhaps the whole species destroyed,) on the penalty of death; which must at least comprehend the loss of that happy state in which they then were, Gen. ii. 16, 17.

Berry-Str. Lect. ib. p. 189.

3. By the seduction of an evil spirit (compare Gen. iii. 4. with Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2. 2 Cor. xi. 3. and Gen. iii. 15. with Col. ii. 15. Rom. xvi. 20. 2 Cor. xi. 3.) they were prevailed upon to violate that precept, and thereby exposed themselves to the sentence of death by an act of aggravated guilt. To the texts mentioned above, may be added all that the Scripture says of the character of the devil as the tempter, and it being the purpose of Christ to triumph over him. Compare John viii. 44. 1 John iii. 8.

Bates's Harm. of Div. Attr. c. ii. p. 98. Wits. Econ. Fœd. l. i. c. viii. § 3—9. Goodm. Prod. part i. Berry-Str. Lect. vol. i. p. 208.

4. When this sin was thus committed, the sentence of death, though not immediately executed in its fullest extent, evidently began to lay hold upon them, as their minds appeared under the distress and the consternation of guilt, Gen. iii. 10. as they were deprived of the pleasures of Paradise, and made to live a life of toil and sorrow, as they were exposed to the disorders of a vitiated constitution, and so death begun to work in them, till at last they were brought down to the grave, Gen. iii. 16—19, 24; v. 5.

Collier's Sac. Int. vol. i. p. 135, 136. Cumberland's Orig. Gent. p. 409. Tayl. on Orig. Sin, p. 7—21. Chandl. Posth. Serm. vol. iv. No. i. p. 13—20; ib. No. ii. Burn. at Boyle's Lect. vol. ii. p. 9—32.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Any transgression of God's natural law would probably have been punished with at least as much severity as the breach of this positive appointment: but the circumstances in which Adam was at his first creation, were such as removed him from all temptations to, and in some instances from all possibility of, committing many of those sins, which now most frequently abound among his posterity; which is one thought of considerable importance to vindicate the divine wisdom in that constitution under which he placed him.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Had Adam continued in a state of innocence, there is a great deal of reason to believe that he would have been happy. It has indeed been pleaded, That God, being the Author of the creature's existence, and of all his capacities both of action and enjoyment, cannot be obliged to continue to him his being and comforts; so that, supposing the creature ever so innocent and ever so virtuous, he should be able of right to claim them. Nevertheless, it was what an innocent creature would naturally expect from a Being, of whose infinite goodness he had such abundant evidence and rich experience: and when there was (as in the case of Adam) an express threatening annexed to disobedience, that seems to imply, that while he continued obedient he should continue happy.

Wits. Econ. Fœd. l. i. c. iv. § 1—3. Clar. Posth. Serm. vol. i. p. 409.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is questioned whether Adam, in case of innocence, would have had reason to expect the continuance of a happy life on earth, or a translation to a nobler state of being elsewhere. Had he abode on earth, his felicity must have been continually increasing, by the exercise of his rational faculties in the contemplation of God, and new discoveries made of his works, as well as by the multiplication of his posterity, on supposition of their continued innocence. But it may be added, that on this supposition, in succeeding generations earth would have been too small to receive and sustain the growing numbers of mankind: and it must be acknowledged, that this seems to be an intimation that, some way or another, colonies would in that case have been transplanted from hence to some other abode; and on supposition of Adam's own removal, he would have had some reason to hope it should have been to some more excellent state and abode; at least he could have no reason to infer a change for the worse, while he continued innocent and obedient.

Turret. Instit. vol. i. Loc. viii. Quest. vi. § 9. Wits. Econ. Fœd. l. i. c. iv. § 9.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The revelation which was made to Adam did not (so far as we can learn) contain any intimation of pardon, in case of transgression; and had the sentence been executed in its utmost vigour, he would have had no room to accuse the divine justice: and if (which seems not improbable from comparing Gen. iii. 24.) Adam had any sight of and converse with other intelligent beings of a superior order, he might justly conclude, that God would act in such a manner towards him in case of his transgression, as to prevent any [illegible] evil which they might derive from his impunity: and if he had any suspicion of a posterity to be derived from him, (which the sentence on Eve gave him room, notwithstanding his offence, to conclude,) there would be further reason for such an apprehension.

Emlyn's Serm. No. iii. p. 43.

LECTURE CLXVI

SCHOLIUM 5.

The extent of that death, which was annexed to the transgression of the divine command given to Adam, might not perhaps be certainly known by him, unless it were more fully expressed to him than it is to us in the Mosaic history. He must certainly apprehend, that it included the loss of that happiness which he then possessed, and perhaps the extinction of being, and entire loss of all happiness, might be the punishment due to the least transgression of the divine law. That argument for the immortality of the soul, which is drawn from the unequal distribution of rewards and punishments, could not be known to Adam; but that which arises from the nature and capacities of the human mind, must appear to him in all its evidence: and therefore, (so far as we can imagine,) he would, from the light of nature, have reason to apprehend some state of future existence, and to fear, that if temporal death was brought upon him by his transgression of the divine law, that future existence would be a state of punishment rather than enjoyment: nor can we say how he should be able to assign any point of time in which the punishment of so aggravated an offence must necessarily terminate.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Hence it follows that, according to the Mosaic history, when God placed Adam in Paradise, he did in effect enter into a covenant with him, whereby he encouraged him to expect continued life and happiness, on condition of perfect obedience; but threatened him with death, in case he should in any instance transgress his moral or his positive law; which is the same thing that divines generally mean, by what they call the Covenant of Works. And it seems, That so far as the light of nature reaches in discovering our duty, we are all so born under such a covenant, as by sin to be exposed to death; which may be considered as including not merely the separation of our souls from our bodies, and the consequent dissolution of the mortal part, —but likewise such degrees of future punishment as it shall seem to the Supreme Judge righteous and fit to inflict. Compare Rom. vi. 23. Rev. xxi. 8. Deut. xxvii. 26. Gal. iii. 10, 13. Ezek. xviii. 20. Reasons on Justif. p. 8.

SCHOLIUM 7.

It is evident that the transgression in eating the forbidden fruit was the first sin committed by Adam, because the sentence of death followed it, which must (according to the nature of that dispensation he was under) be the consequence of the first offence. Gen. iii. 17, &c.

SCHOLIUM 8.

It is difficult to determine certainly what we are to understand by the Tree of Life. Some have thought that it was no more than a pledge of life to Adam, in case of obedience, and might in that view have been indifferently chosen from among any kind of trees in the garden: others have conjectured that it had some cordial virtue, of an excellent use for reviving the spirits and preserving the health (compare Rev. xii. 2. with Ezek. xlvii. 12.); and some have carried this so far as to conclude, that the mortality of Adam's nature was the natural consequence of his being excluded from that tree, even though we should suppose no change to be made in his constitution after his sin, Gen. iii. 22. Mr. Kennicott has endeavoured to prove, that the Tree of Life signifies all the trees of the garden, which were intended as food for the preservation of life; and another writer has attempted to prove, that the tree of knowledge and of life were the same. This is not a place in which to discuss their respective opinions; but, on the whole, that opinion which makes it a single tree of cordial virtue (as above) seems most probable. Compare Prov. iii. 18; xi. 30; xiii. 12.

SCHOLIUM 9.

Many divines have likewise thought that the tree of knowledge was a slow poison, which so vitiated the fluids of the human body, as in process of time to occasion the death of Adam, and of all those who should descend from him after the infection was taken: and they have likewise thought it possible, that his blood and spirits might be so altered by the juice of it, as that sensual propensities and other passions might be thereby made much stronger than they were before,—and so that symmetry of the faculties broken, on which philosophical liberty depends. (Vid. Def. 26. Cor. 2. Prop. 17. Cor.)—It is objected, That upon this hypothesis the corruption and distemper of human nature must get less and less, as every generation is further removed from Adam, in whom there must surely have been vastly more of this supposed poison than there can be in any of his descendants. But it is replied, That it is the nature of poisons so to assimilate the blood to themselves, as to corrupt the whole mass of it, and to render an infection transmitted through many persons as dangerous as at first hand, as in the case of the bite of a mad dog, the small pox, &c.

SCHOLIUM 10.

It is generally supposed, that the sin of Adam not only brought a curse on the ground, Gen. iii. 18, (which, by the way, Dr. Woodward supposes not to have taken place till the Deluge, and Bishop Sherlock to have been then removed,) but also, that it brought confusion and disturbance into the whole frame of nature in our world, both in the elements, occasioning greater inclemencies of weather than would otherwise have been, and also upon the animal creation, who it is supposed would not otherwise have devoured each other. Compare Isa. xi. 6 - 8; lxv. 25. Rom. viii. 19 - 22. It is indeed exceedingly probable that those animals, which are now dangerous to mankind, had at first such an awe impressed upon them, as effectually to secure him from any danger of their assaults; but we confess it is difficult to conceive how those animals, whose present frame shows them to have been of the carnivorous kind, could, without a miracle, have subsisted upon vegetables. SCHOLIUM 11.

Some have conjectured that our first parents, in their state of innocence, were clothed with a visible glory, or lucid appearance; which, according to these writers, was a part of the image of God in which they were created. They suppose that the departure of this glory, as soon as they transgressed, was the nakedness which they were conscious of; and on this principle suppose that the like glory will be restored to the righteous at the resurrection; and argue, from those passages which favour that doctrine, the probability of man's being possessed of it in his primeval state. Compare Matt. xiii. 43; xvii. 2. Phil. iii. 21. 1 Cor. xv. 43. and with reference to this, some authors explain Rom. iii. 23. 2 Cor. v. 1—5. Rom. viii. 3. and even Phil. ii. 6 though not all with equal reason.

LECTURE CLXVII.

DEFINITION LXXX.

The actions or sufferings of A, might be said to be IMPUTED to B, if B should on the account of them in any degree be treated as if he had done or suffered what A has done or suffered, when he really has not; and when, without this action or suffering of A, B would not be so treated.

COROLLARY 1.

The sin of A may be said to be imputed, if B, though innocent, be upon that account treated in any degree as a sinner.

COROLLARY 2.

The righteousness of A may be said to be imputed to B, if, upon the account of it, B, though a sinner, be treated as if he were righteous.

COROLLARY 3.

There may be real, when there is not a total, imputation either of the righteousness or sin of another.

SCHOLIUM.

The justice of such imputation, on one hand or the other, can in the general be neither affirmed nor denied; but it is to be determined in particular cases, by a view of particular circumstances, and especially by considering the degree of the imputation.

PROPOSITION CXXXV.

The sin of Adam is in some degree imputed to all those who descended from him in the way of ordinary generation.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 133. 1. We are all born with such constitutions as will produce some evil inclinations, which we probably should not have had in our original state; which evil inclinations are represented in Scripture as derived from our parents, and therefore may be ultimately traced up to the first sinful parent from whom we descended.

2. Infants are plainly liable to diseases and death, though they have not committed any personal transgression,—which, while they are incapable of knowing the law, it seems impossible they should be capable of. Rom. v. 12—14.

2. 3. The seeds of diseases and death are no doubt derived to children from their immediate parents, and from thence may be traced up, through preceding generations, to the first diseased and mortal parent, i. e. Adam.

4. The Scripture teaches us to consider Adam as having brought a sentence of death upon his whole race, and expressly says, "That by his transgression many were constituted sinners;" i. e. on account of it are treated as such, 1 Cor. xv. 22; Rom. v. 12—19.

5. The sin of Adam brought upon himself depraved inclinations, an impaired constitution, and at length death. Prop. 134.

6. There is no reason to believe that, had man continued in a state of innocence, his offspring would have been thus corrupt and thus calamitous from their birth.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it appears that the covenant was made with Adam, not only for himself, but in some measure for his posterity; so that he was to be considered as the great head and representative of all that were to descend from him.

Edw. on Orig. Sin, p. 200. Watts's Ruin and Recov. Taylor's Supplem. § 6.

COROLLARY 2.

It may seem probable, in consequence of this damage which Adam's posterity was to become liable to by his transgression, that they would have received some additional advantages from his continued obedience; but what those advantages were, the Scripture does not expressly say, nor is it necessary for us particularly to know: in general, we are sure they must have been such as would secure the honours of divine justice in the establishment of such a constitution;—but more will be said concerning this below.

SCHOLIUM 1.

This imputation of the sin of Adam to his posterity, is what divines generally call, with some latitude of expression, original sin, distinguishing it from actual sin, i. e. from personal guilt. Vid. Prop. 133. Schol. 5.

Watts's Ruin and Recov. p. 3. Taylor's Supplement, § 1.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is plain, in fact, that children frequently fare the worse for those faults of their parents which it was not in their power to help, especially as hereditary disorders are often communicated,—which lay a foundation for a miserable life and a more early death. If therefore a righteous God does in fact govern the world, we must allow it consistent with justice that it should be thus; nor will there appear any inconsistence, if we consider that justice determines not the manner in which the creature shall be treated in any given time in the beginning of its existence, but the manner in which it shall on the whole be treated;—a thought which might be sufficient to vindicate those passages in which God threatens to punish the iniquity of parents by the calamities of their children, Exod. xx. 5. 1 Kings xiv. 9, 10; xxi. 21, 22. Lam. v. 7. Matt. xxiii. 35.

Turr. Inst. Loc. ix. Qu. xix. § 20. Rutherf. Rel. Qu. iii. iv. p. 106; Works, vol. vi. p. 226. Grosse's Posth. II. vol. iv. p. 198. Saur. Serm. vol. vii. p. 372.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is debated how far the imputation of Adam's sin reaches; particularly, whether it extends to eternal death, or everlasting misery, supposing that everlasting misery is the consequence of personal guilt. We do here readily allow that God might righteously have put a period to the whole human race, immediately after the transgression of Adam, and consequently that we might have been said to be lost for ever by that transgression. We also allow, that God might, for aught we know, consistently with his own perfections, suffer the souls of those who die in their infancy to be utterly extinguished, and to sink into everlasting insensibility; and in that case, the transgression of that ancestor which made them mortal, might in a qualified sense be said to destroy their souls. But that one rational creature should be made finally and eternally miserable for the action of another, which it was no way in his power to prevent, does so ill agree with our natural notions of divine justice, and the repeated declarations of Scripture, (e. g. Ezek. xviii. 2, 3, 4, 20. Jer. xxxi. 29, 30. Deut. xxiv. 16. 2 Kings xiv. 6.) and with what God is pleased to say concerning his compassion for infants, Jonah iv. ult. that we must at least wait for the plainest and fullest decision of Scripture before we can admit it as true.

Ridgl. Body of Div. vol. i. p. 340. Ridg. Orig. Sin. p. 42. Watts's Ruin and Recovery, p. 329.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The most considerable argument to prove the imputation of Adam's sin to the eternal condemnation of his posterity, is taken from those passages of Scripture, as well as those rational evidences which prove eternal death to be the wages of sin, compared with those mentioned above, in which it is said that all died in Adam: but it is so evident that death does not always include eternal misery, and that a person may be said to die for the sins of another who is not made eternally miserable for them, that one cannot but be surprised at the stress that has been laid upon it. Calv. Instit. l. ii. c. i. § 8.

LECTURE CLXVIII

To show that a constitution, whereby all mankind should become obnoxious to eternal misery for the transgression of one common head, is consistent with divine justice, many have pleaded, that in consequence of such an appointment, we stood so fair a chance for happiness, that if we had then existed, and the proposal had been made us, we must in reason have been contented to put our eternal all on that issue: so that God might reasonably impute that to us as our act, which he knew would have been our act, if we had been consulted on the occasion. But nothing would seem sufficient to vindicate such a proceeding, unless we were to suppose (as an obscure writer has done) that the souls of all the race of Adam were for that moment actually brought into being, and gave personal consent to that covenant, after which they were reduced to a state of insensibility, till the appointed moment came for their animating their respective bodies.

SCHOLIUM 6.

As a counterpart of the hardships put upon Adam's race, by such a covenant as has been represented, it has been asserted that all his posterity would after his short trial have been confirmed in a state of immutable happiness; and Dr. Guyse in particular conjectures, it might have been as soon as the fruit of the forbidden tree dropped off: but all this seems to be said without any express warrant from Scripture. Had any of the race of Adam committed any act of moral wickedness, we may conclude that such an offender, and probably his posterity, would have received some detriment; and had Cain for instance, at least when adult, eaten of the forbidden fruit, the natural consequences flowing thence to all mankind on Adam's transgression must (so far as we can judge) have descended to the race of Cain alone. Now that the one of these was possible, none can deny, unless they suppose that the whole race would, on the obedience of Adam, have had such extraordinary degrees of divine influence entailed upon them as would in fact have been an everlasting security to them against every degree of temptation: this was indeed possible; but we cannot discern such evidence of it from Scripture, as should imbolden us to such an assertion.

Berry-Street Lect. vol. i. p. 189.

SCHOLIUM 7.

On the whole, the most plausible thing which is said to prove the probability of a covenant, in which eternal misery should be brought upon all men by the guilt of the first sin, is this:—That we see in fact that mankind is brought into such a state, that every man does in some instances or other break the law of God himself, when he grows up; and this, in consequence of an original corruption derived from Adam,—as most at least acknowledge, even of those who deny the total imputation of his sin. Now it is said that it is as just to punish an innocent person directly for the guilt of another, as upon account of that other person's guilt to bring him into such a condition, that he must necessarily sin, and then inflict that punishment upon him for his own necessary act, which was objected against as unjust in the former case.—It is hard to say how this argument can be answered, unless we deny that any act of sin whatsoever is necessarily committed. On the other side it is urged, That, upon this supposition, it is a possible thing that any man, even in this fallen state, may continue perfectly innocent throughout the whole period of his life. The consequence cannot be denied: therefore it must on the whole be considered, whether it may be more rational to believe that every man does in fact sin, though he might possibly in every instance have avoided it,—or that God should plunge the whole race of mankind into perpetual and necessary ruin for the guilt of one of them.

SCHOLIUM 8.

It may not be improper here to mention the singular opinion of Dr. Watts, in his very ingenious treatise on the Ruin and Recovery of Mankind; which is, that the sin of Adam has subjected all his posterity not only to natural death, but to the utter extinction of being; the consequence of which is, that all those who die in their infancy fall into a state of annihilation, excepting those who are the seed of God's people, who by virtue of the blessings of the covenant made with Abraham, and the promise to the seed of the righteous, (compare particularly Isa. lxv. 23. Jer. xxxi. 15—17) shall, through the grace and power of Christ, obtain a part in a happy resurrection, in which other infants shall have no share.—It is certain Rev. xx. 12. will not disprove this opinion, because it may refer to persons of all ranks in life, as it often does, vid. Rev. xi. 18. compare xx. 13. But, on the whole, it seems best to acknowledge that we know nothing certain concerning the state of infants, and therefore can assert nothing positively; but that they are in the hands of a merciful God, who, as he cannot, consistently with justice and truth, give them a sense of guilt for an action they never committed, so probably he will not hold their souls in being, merely to make them sensible of pain for the guilt of a remote ancestor.—Their existence in a state of everlasting insensibility (which was Dr. Ridgley's scheme) seems hardly intelligible: we must therefore either fall in with the above-mentioned hypothesis, or suppose them all to have a part in the resurrection to glory; which seems to put them all on a level, without a due distinction in favour of the seed of believers; or else must suppose they go through some new state of trial,—a thing concerning which the Scripture is wholly silent.

LECTURE CLXIX

DEFINITION LXXXI.

Whatever that is, which being done or suffered either by an offending creature himself, or by another person for him, shall secure the honours of the divine government in bestowing upon the offender pardon and happiness, may properly be called a SATISFACTION or ATONEMENT made to God for him.

Watts's Redeemer and Sanctifier, p. 28—32: Works, vol. iii. p. 741—743.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It is not here our intention to assert, That it is in the power of an offending creature to satisfy for his own sins,—but only to show what we mean when we speak of his doing it.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Such a sense of the word satisfaction, though not in strict propriety of speech amounting to the payment of a debt, is agreeable to the use of the word in the Roman law: where it signifies to content a person aggrieved, and is put for some valuable consideration, substituted instead of what is a proper payment, and consistent with a remission of that debt or offence for which such supposed satisfaction is made: which is a circumstance to be carefully observed, in order to vindicate the doctrine we are about to establish, and to maintain the consistency between different parts of the Christian scheme. See this sense abundantly confirmed by citations from Grotius, Caius, Ulpian, and Pomponius.

Chapm. Eus. vol. ii. p. 406. Benson on 1 Pet. Appendix.

PROPOSITION CXXXVI.

Christ has made satisfaction for the sins of all those who repent of their sins, and return to God in the way of sincere, though imperfect, obedience.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Although Christ was innocent, nevertheless he endured very grievous sufferings both in body and mind, Isa. liii. 3. Matt. xxvi. 38. and this he did spontaneously, Heb. x. 7, 9.

2. It is expressly asserted in Scripture, that these sufferings were brought upon Christ for the sake of sinful men, in whose stead he is sometimes also said to have suffered. Isa. liii. 5, 6, 10. Matt. xx. 28. Rom. iii. 25; v. 6—8. 2 Cor. v. 21. Gal. iii. 13. Eph. v. 2. Heb. vii. 27; ix. 26; x. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 24; iii. 18.

Rupbelii Annot. in Rom. v. 8. Cas. Neandr. apud Op. vol. ii. p. 257.

3. The offers of pardon and eternal salvation are made in Scripture to those that repent and return to God, for the sake of what Christ has done and suffered, in whom they are therefore declared to be accepted by God, and to whom they are hereupon taught to ascribe the glory of their salvation. John iii. 14—17. Acts x. 35, 36, 43; xiii. 38; xvi. 18, 19. Rom. iv. 25. Col. i. 20—22. 2 Cor. v. 18—20. Eph. i. 5—7. Heb. i. 3; ix. 14; x. 1—10, 14. Rev. i. 5, 6; v. 9, 10; vii. 13, 14.

Sykes on Redemption, part i. c. 5, 6.

4. It is evident that, according to the Gospel institution, pardon and life were to be offered to all to whom the preaching of the Gospel came, without an exception. Mark xvi. 15, 16. Acts xiii. 38, 39. 1 John ii. 1, 2. Isa. liii. 6. John i. 29.

5. It is plain, from the whole tenor of the epistolary part of the New Testament, as well as from some particular passages of it, that there was a remainder of imperfection, generally at least, to be found even in the best Christians; notwithstanding which they are encouraged to rejoice in the hope of salvation by Christ. Phil. iii. 13. Gal. v. 17. James iii. 2. 1 John i. 8—10; ii. 1, 2.

6. Whereas, so far as we can judge, the remission of sin, without any satisfaction at all, might have laid a foundation for men's thinking lightly of the law of God, it is certain that, by the obedience and sufferings of Christ, a very great honour is done to it; and mercy communicated to us as the purchase of his blood, comes in so awful as well as so endearing a manner, as may have the best tendency to engage those who embrace the Gospel to a life of holy obedience.

COROLLARY 1.

It is a very peculiar glory of the Gospel, that it gives so satisfactory an account of the method whereby sin may be pardoned, in a manner consistent with the honours of the divine government; and thereby relieves the mind from that anxiety to which, if left merely to its own reasoning, it might otherwise be exposed on that account.

Leechman. Tend. vol. i. p. 168.

COROLLARY 2.

From comparing what has been said in this proposition with Def. 80. Cor. 1, 2. it appears that, on the one hand, our sins were imputed to Christ;—on the other, that we are justified by the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us; i. e. we, though guilty, on complying with the Gospel, are finally treated by God as righteous persons, i. e. as if we had never offended him at all, or had ourselves satisfied the demands of his law for such offences,) out of regard to what Christ has done or suffered; whereas we should not otherwise have been so treated. Compare Isa. xlv. 24, 25; liii. 11. Jer. xxiii. 6. Rom. iii. 22; v. 17—19; x. 3; iv. 4—6. 2 Cor. v. 21. Phil. iii. 9. 2 Pet. i. 1.

COROLLARY 3.

It is plain, from gr. 3, 4. that there is a sense, in which Christ may be said to have died for all; i. e. as he has procured an offer of pardon to all, provided they sincerely embrace the Gospel. Compare John iii. 16; vi. 51. Rom. v. 18; viii. 32. 1 Cor. viii. 11. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15, 19. 1 Tim. ii. 4, 6. Heb. ii. 9. 1 John ii. 2.

COROLLARY 4.

From the Scriptures mentioned above, it appears how wrong it is to represent the death of Christ as merely the natural consequence of his undertaking the reformation of so corrupt an age, in the manner in which he did it. Nothing can be plainer than that Christ came into the world on purpose to die, (Matt. xx. 28. John vi. 50, 51; x. 17, 18; xii. 27, 28. Acts ii. 23. Gal. i. 4. Heb. ii. 14; x. 4, &c. 1 Pet. i. 19, 20. 1 John iv. 10.) which is much illustrated by the apparent power which Christ had, and in many circumstances of his life and sufferings showed, of delivering himself by miracle whenever he pleased.

LECTURE CLXX.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Though Christ were perfectly innocent, he might be afflicted in the manner in which Scripture represents, by reason of the imputation of our sins to him, seeing it appears that he voluntarily consented to it, and that ample recompence is made him, Heb. x. 7. Phil. ii. 9. Psal. cx. 7. to which may perhaps be added Heb. xii. 2.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It appears from Luke xxiii. 43. John xix. 30. that the soul of Christ, after his death, did not go into a state of punishment, but that his sufferings ended when he expired. As for the argument brought from 1 Pet. iii. 19. it is well known there are many other interpretations of that text; of which the most probable seems to be this, That Christ, by his Spirit in Noah, preached to those who, continuing disobedient, were destroyed by the flood, and whose separate spirits are now confined, and reserved to future punishment.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is greatly debated, Whether we are justified by Christ's death alone, or by the imputation of his active and passive obedience? but this seems to be a controversy of much less importance than it has generally been represented. All that Christ did or suffered to repair the violated honours of the divine law, and to secure the rights of God's government in the pardon of sin, must be taken into the view of his satisfaction, according to the definition given of it above; nevertheless, forasmuch as his death was a most glorious instance of his concern for the honour of God and the happiness of man, and that whereby the divine honour was most eminently secured, the Scripture does in many places ascribe our acceptance to this. See the texts quoted before, especially those under gr. 3.

Williams's Works, vol. iv. p. 19. Turretine loc. q. 3. vol. ii. p. 705.

Hardly any controversy on this head has been more insisted upon, than that which arises from this question, viz. Whether such a satisfaction as the Gospel represents were absolutely necessary? or whether God might have pardoned sin without it, by a mere sovereign act? For the necessity of a satisfaction, the chief Scripture argument is taken from Heb. ii. 10. but it is said, on the other hand, that this text only proves the way actually taken to have been a way worthy of God,—not that it was the only way that could have been so. It is likewise urged. That it is never to be imagined that God would have subjected so glorious a person to such sufferings, if any other way could have been discovered equally eligible. On the whole, we must acknowledge that we can conceive of no other method so happily contrived to illustrate the divine glory, and secure the gratitude, obedience, and happiness of the creature. Compare Rom. iii. 26.

Dr. Goodw. Restor. of Man, lib. i. c. iv. p. 13; Works, vol. iii. part ii. p. 13. Eml. Tracts, vol. i. p. 242. vol. ii. p. 50. Locke on Rom. iii. 24. Witsii Econ. Fœd. lib. ii. c. viii. Owen de Just. Div. pass. Christ the Med. p. 90. Hallet on Scrip. vol. ii. p. 299.

SCHOLIUM 5.

The prevalency of sacrifices in the world, although from the light of nature there appears to have been no rational foundation for them, seems, on the one hand, to intimate an apprehension in the mind of man, that some satisfaction for sin was requisite; and on the other, may perhaps intimate that there had been some tradition concerning an expiatory sacrifice appointed by God, which the sacrifices of animals were intended to represent.—See the references under Prop. 122. § 3.

Tillot. Works, vol. i. p. 478. Outram de Sacr. lib. i. c. xxi. xxii. Sykes on Sacr. Taylor on Deism, p. 249. Tayl. Doct. of Atonement.

To show with what propriety the death of Christ may be called a sacrifice, it may be proper, more particularly, to reflect on the nature and efficacy of those Jewish sacrifices which were called sin-offerings, to which there is so plain a reference in the epistle to the Hebrews, and other passages. Concerning such sacrifices then it may be observed,

1. That in all the instances in which they were allowed, they were the terms or conditions on which men were pardoned, i. e. on which the penalties denounced against such offences by the Mosaic law were remitted, without which they could not have been so remitted on any pretence of repentance, or any satisfaction made to their injured neighbour; and for this reason, where crimes were declared capital, no sacrifices might be admitted at all (Psal. li. 16.); and, on the other hand, the value of the sin-offering was sunk so low in some instances, that the poorest of the people might be able to bring it. Lev. v. 11. 12.

2. They were standing evidences of the evil and desert of sin; and,

3. Of God's being ready to forgive those who in appointed circumstances presented them; but,

4. They could not possibly take away sin, i. e. remove the moral guilt even of the least offence, so as to procure in any instance a remission of any thing more than the particular sentence pronounced against the offender, by God, as the King of the Jews.

From this survey, it appears, by the preceding proposition, that the death of Christ was a proper sacrifice, and much more excellent than any other, in that it takes away the final sentence of condemnation; whereas the Mosaic sacrifices left the Jews still subject to death, and future punishment too, without such a sincere repentance, as made no part of the condition of procuring a legal remission. Compare Heb. x. 1. 11. and also Acts xiii. 39.

Hallet on Scrip. vol. ii. Disc. iii. p. 269. Tayl Doct. of Atonem. c. 2. Sykes on Redemp. p. 324. Law's Theory, p. 274.*

SCHOLIUM 7.

Dr. Thomas Burnet puts the doctrine of the satisfaction in something of a peculiar view. He says that the death of Christ has not itself satisfied divine justice, but only put us into the capacity of doing it, by confessing our sins, and applying to God for pardon, with a humble dependence upon Christ's death; which he thinks so necessary a condition of salvation, that no man can obtain it without submitting to it: he thinks this to be the language of an attendance upon the Lord's Supper; which he lays a very great stress upon, to such a degree as to think that no man has a covenant claim to the mercy of God in Christ, if he does not by engaging in this ordinance declare his trust in Christ's sacrifice, and so atone the divine displeasure.

Burnet on Redemption.

* The question concerning the nature and design of sacrifices, seems to have been of considerable importance. See particularly Mr. Peters's Dr. Mayhew's Letter, and Dr. Chauncy's answer to the latter; Dr. Taylor on Atonement, and Dr. Jortin's Discourses. I have not met with the second, however, I have endeavoured to do Dr. Taylor justice. As Dr. Owen says, Our Saviour, Dying and Rising, and Sprinkling the Mercy-seat with the Blood of Sprinkling, is Answered, or Satisfied, and Accepted, as to the Legal Sacrifices, Burning, and Consuming, and Expiating the Sin-offering, and Trespass-offering, &c. Dr. Taylor's Scheme of Atonement explained, as proposed by the Jewish Sacrifices, p. 2. The Sacrifices of and Death of Christ. This question is likewise largely considered by the author of that well known pamphlet, Dr. Rutherforth's Essay on the Nature, Connexion, and Extent of the Christian Scheme. The question Dr. Owen proposes, whether the principal Sacrifices Expiatory in the Church, the Typification of different Mosaic Observations by the Death, Sacrifice, and Resurrection of Christ, Reference to the Day of Atonement, Sprinkling of the Blood of Christ, Sacrifice of the Passover, Lambs, Goats, Bullocks, Offering of the Incense, Sprinkling the Mercy-seat, Offering Bread, Wine, &c. and many other things, are to be understood as Sacrifices properly so called, or only as Types, Figures, Representations, Memorials, Commemorations, Declarations, Confessions, Professions, Prayers, Praises, Thanksgivings, Obedience, Worship, Ordinances, Duties, and other Services of God, is a question, whether it be more curious than useful, I shall not determine. Whether any, Dr. Owen, or the most general Body of the Divines and Doctors of the Church, have understood, or, by Scripture, can sufficiently prove, that Christ, and Atonement by Dr. Taylor, &c. LECTURE CLXXI.

DEFINITION LXXXII.

Faith in Christ is, in general, committing our souls to him for salvation in his appointed way; or more largely, such a persuasion that he is the Messiah, and such a desire and expectation of the blessings which he has in his Gospel promised to his people, as engages the soul to fix its dependence upon him, and subject itself to him in all the ways of holy obedience.

Grove on Faith, p. 5, &c.; Works, vol. iii. Rymer on Rev. p. 211. Tillotson's Works, vol. iii. p. 481.

COROLLARY 1.

Faith in Christ is a very extensive principle, and includes in its nature and inseparable effects the whole of moral virtue,—since the precepts of Christ evidently require that we should love God with all our heart, that we should be perfect as he is perfect, and pursue whatever things are pure, lovely, virtuous, and honourable.—Matt. xii. 37; v. ult. Phil. iv. 8. Grove on Saving Faith, p. 35.

COROLLARY 2.

Those who assert that, under the Gospel, a man is justified by faith, cannot justly be accused of subverting our injuring practical religion, if faith be taken in the sense here defined.

Saurin's Sermons, vol. ix. p. 245. Grove, ubi supra, p. 61.

SCHOLIUM 1.

If the account of faith here given, should appear to be agreeable to the Scripture notion of that faith to which the promises of Gospel salvation are annexed, then it will follow that Dr. Whitby is much mistaken, when he represents faith as consisting merely in an assent to the Gospel as true; and says, That upon declaring that assent, a man was justified from all past sins, without good works; but that good works were necessary, in order to continue in a justified state: unless by this he means, that a person sincerely and fully resolved for good works would have been in a state of salvation, though he had died before he had any opportunity of putting these pious purposes into execution. If this be his sense, he has not expressed it clearly, and it would be very unsafe in the general to define faith according to his notion of it.

Locke's Reas. of Christ. vol. i. p. 16. Whitby's Pref. to Gal. p. 292.

Dr. Taylor, of Norwich, seems to have entertained a notion much resembling this of Dr. Whitby's, but with this difference, that his idea of justifying faith seems to be a faith, upon professing which, a person was justly entitled to enter into the society of those who were called the justified ones, or the sanctified people of God, i. e. into the visible church of Christ, who receive the visible signs of pardon and favour from him, and are set apart as his peculiar people, as the Jewish nation in general once was. This is what he calls the first justification, and on that principle attempts to explain St. Paul's discourse of justifying faith in the epistles to the Romans and Galatians; thereby, as it seems, sinking the passages in question, and others, in which the apostle speaks of the privileges of believers, far below their original sense. It seems much more reasonable to say the apostle addressed the several churches as consisting of sincere Christians, as most of their members were, without taking particular notice of those few who might be otherwise.

*Taylor on Romans. Doddridge on Regeneration, Postscript.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some divines have chosen to call this purpose of holy obedience, essential to true faith, by the name of internal good works, and the fruit actually produced in life, external; and in this sense of the words it must be acknowledged that, according to our definition of faith, compared with the following proposition, we maintain the universal necessity of good works as much as any can do; but it may be questioned whether this is the most natural sense of the word. Comp. John vi. 29.

Waterland's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 54.

SCHOLIUM 3.

We allow that the word faith has various significations in Scripture besides this; viz. It is sometimes put for what is called a miraculous faith, i. e. a persuasion in a person who was endowed with miraculous gifts, that God would perform some miracle, correspondent to some present impression made on his mind, Matt. xvii. 20. Mark xi. 22, 23. 1 Cor. xiii. 2. Sometimes it signifies only an assent to the truth of the Gospel, though perhaps ineffectual; in which sense it is taken in many passages of the Epistle of James. Vid. Jam. ii. 14—26. Acts viii. 13. Sometimes an assent to the truth of any proposition, whether the evidence of it were that of testimony, reason, or sense. John xx. 8, 25, 29. Heb. xi. 3.

Tillots. vol. iii. Serm. 165. p. 428.†

PROPOSITION LXXXVI.

The Gospel absolutely requires such a faith as is here defined, of all those who would partake of the benefits of it; and also makes a promise of salvation to all those in whom such a faith is found.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Everlasting life is in the Gospel promised to believers, and appropriated to them, whatever the import of that faith shall afterwards appear to be. John iii. 16—18, 36. Mark xvi. 15, 16. Acts xvi. 31.

2. That this faith implies a persuasion that Christ is the Messiah, or a person sent into the world, under the character of the Saviour of fallen man, appears from John xvi. 17. Acts viii. 37. Rom. iii. 22, 26, 27; iv. 24, 25; x. 9. 1 John iv. 15; v. 1.

3. It is evidently asserted in Scripture, that all true believers receive Christ, and rejoice in him; that he is precious to them, &c. John i. 12. Phil. iii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 7. and for this reason, believing in Christ is expressed by coming to him, John vi. 35. and considering the etymology of the word πιστις from πειθω, and especially the import of πειθειν επι τινι, this seems to be the primary idea of faith, though necessarily connected with the view given of it in the last step, and in that which follows, in order to distinguish a true faith from such a presumption, as would affront Christ rather than honour him. Compare 2 Tim. i. 12.

Watts's Divine Dispens. p. 64; Works, vol. ii. p. 565, &c.

4. That no degree of persuasion, desire, expectation, or dependence, will be accepted of God, without a firm and prevailing resolution of sincere obedience, appears, not only from James ii. 14—26. but also from all those passages which declare holiness to be necessary in order to salvation, and which pronounce a sentence of final condemnation on all those who are disobedient to the truth; as Rom. ii. 8, 9. Heb. xii. 14. 2 Thess. i. 7—9. Matt. vii. 21—23; all which would be utterly inconsistent with those promises made to faith, gr. 1. if faith did not imply such a prevailing resolution of holy obedience. Compare John iii. 36. COROLLARY 1.

They who represent faith as merely a firm persuasion that we ourselves are justified, or that Christ particularly died for us, do greatly misrepresent it, and lead their followers into a dangerous error; not to insist upon the contradiction in such a definition of faith, which seems to imply that we must have our interest in Christ revealed to us before we can believe, and yet must believe before it can be revealed to us; unless that revelation were supposed to have no foundation, or a person were allowed to be justified while actually an unbeliever,—which is directly contrary to the whole tenor of the Scriptures mentioned above, and to many more which declare the displeasure of God against the workers of iniquity, which all unbelievers are.

Those who are received into the divine favour in the method before described, can have no cause to glory before God, it being matter of pure favour that such a constitution should be established for the salvation of sinful creatures. Eph. ii. 8, 9. Rom. iii. 27; iv. 2—5; xi. 6.

LECTURE CLXXII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It has been greatly debated, Whether faith be the condition of our salvation? If, by condition, be intended something which is a valuable equivalent for a benefit received, or something which is to be performed entirely in our own strength, it is certain that nothing done by us can merit that title, considering, on the one hand, the great and glorious rewards of eternal happiness proposed in the Gospel; and, on the other, the weakness of our created and the degeneracy of our corrupted, nature; but if condition only signifies, as it generally does, something insisted upon, if we would receive a benefit, and upon the performance of which we shall, in fact, be entitled to that benefit, it is the very thing asserted and proved in the proposition, that faith is in this sense the condition of our salvation. Nevertheless, since so strong a prejudice is by many weakly and foolishly imbibed against that phrase, it may generally be matter of prudence to decline it, since it can express no more than is expressed by saying, That they who do believe, shall, and they who do not, shall not, be saved; which is so Scriptural a manner of speaking that it offends none.

Wits. Econ. Fœd. lib. iii. c. i. § 8, 9, &c. Will. Gosp. Tr. c. viii.; Works, vol. iii. p. 59. Morris's Serm. vol. i. Grove, ubi sup. p. 28.

Much of the same kind with the former is that question, Whether the Gospel consists merely of promises, or whether it can in any sense be called a law? The answer plainly depends upon adjusting the meaning of the words gospel and law. If the gospel be taken for the declaration God has made to men by Christ concerning the manner in which he will treat them, and the conduct he expects from them, it is plain that this includes commands, and even threatenings, as well as promises; but to define the Gospel so, as only to express the favourable part of that declaration, is indeed taking the question for granted, and confining the word to a sense much less extensive than it often has in Scripture. Compare Rom. ii. 16. 2 Thess. i. 8. 1 Tim. i. 10, 11. and it is certain, that if the Gospel be put for all the parts of the dispensation taken in connexion one with another, it may well be called on the whole, a good message, εὐαγγέλιον. In like manner, the question, Whether the Gospel be a law or not? is to be determined by the definition of a law and of the Gospel as above; if law signifies, as it generally does, the discovery of the will of a superior, teaching what he requires of those under his government, with the intimation of his intention of dispensing rewards and punishments, as this rule of their conduct is observed or neglected,—in this latitude of expression, it is plain from the proposition, that the Gospel, taken for the declaration made to men by Christ, is a law, as in Scripture it is sometimes called (James i. 25. Rom. iv. 15; v. 13; viii. 2.); but if law be taken in the greatest rigour of the expression, for such a discovery of the will of God and our duty, as contains in it no intimation of our obtaining the divine favour, otherwise than by a perfect and universal conformity to it,—in that sense the Gospel is not a law, as appears likewise from the proposition.

Wits. ubi sup. Williams' Gosp. Truth, p. 133; Works, vol. iii. p. 343.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It has been denied that any who are already Christians can be rationally exhorted to believe in Christ; and Dr. Whitby expressly says, There are no instances of it in the New Testament; but it is to be considered, that faith is not any one act of the mind to be performed once for all; but it expresses the temper which a man is to carry along with him throughout his whole life. Compare Gal. ii. 20. 2 Cor. v. 7. and 1 Pet. ii. 4, 5, 7. and the more lively the impressions and acts of it are, the more firmly may we be said to believe; or, in other words, there may be different degrees of this faith; and consequently it is not an absurd or unprofitable thing to address to those who have already believed, for the establishment and increase of their faith; as it appears the apostles did, John xx. 31. 1 John v. 13. Comp. John xi. 15; xiii. 19; xiv. 1. 29. Eph. iii. 17.

Whitby on New Test. vol. ii. p. 296. Grove, ubi sup. p. 146. ad fin.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is further questioned, How far faith can be said, as Rom. iv. 5. to be imputed for righteousness, if it be by the righteousness of Christ imputed to us, that we are justified, as was asserted before. Prop. 136. Cor. 2. To this some have answered, That faith is there put for the object of faith, as hope is for the object of hope, Jer. xiv. 8. Heb. vi. 18. 1 Tim. i. 1. and fear for the object of fear, Gen. xxxi. 53. and this solution is maintained by Raucl. on Just. p. 209. Grove on Law.

We answer, That any thing may be said to be imputed to us for righteousness, or in order to our justification, which, being as it were set down to our account, serves in any degree as the means of our justification, as faith evidently does, though not by virtue of its own merit and excellency, but with regard to the righteousness of Christ, on the account of which God is pleased thus graciously to regard it; or, as Witsius states it, "Faith is set down to our account in the book of God, as an evidence that we are in the number of those who, by the righteousness of Christ, according to the tenor of the Gospel, are to be justified."

SCHOLIUM 5.

It has been questioned, How far the precepts requiring faith in the Gospel, on the penalty of damnation, can be supposed to extend? As to the Heathens, we shall briefly consider their case in the eighth scholium. It seems this declaration must at least extend to those who have an opportunity of inquiring into the truth of Christianity, and who may, by an honest inquiry, attain to satisfaction in the truth of it. If there be any adult person in a Christian country, who, not by his own fault, but by the circumstances in which Providence has placed him, lies under difficulties absolutely invincible, it is as rational to suppose God will allow for such, as for the ignorance of infants; but where persons have genius and opportunity to inquire, it is hard to imagine how their difficulties should be invincible, unless we suppose that God has left the Christian religion in such circumstances, that those who inquire most fully into its evidence, with the greatest sincerity and impartiality, may not see sufficient reason to embrace it, which is utterly incredible (compare John vii. 17.); so that the case of most infidels in Christian countries must be exceeding dangerous; and consequently the denunciation (Mark xvi. 16.) must not be limited to those who heard the apostles preach, and saw their miracles, as some suppose.

SCHOLIUM 6.

The damnatory sentence which Christianity pronounces on those who reject it has been urged as in itself a most unreasonable thing, since faith depends not upon ourselves, but on the degree of evidence in the things to be believed.

But to this it may be answered,

1. That it evidently appears from Def. 82. that faith is not merely the assent of the understanding to a speculative truth, but implies our reposing such a confidence in Christ, and holding our souls in such a subjection to him, as depends upon the human will as much as any disposition and action of the mind, both as to the impartiality of inquiring, and the manner of acting, when evidence is proposed and apprehended. Comp. Isa. xxix. 13, 14. Dan. xii. 10. Matt. vi. 23; xi. 25; xiii. 11, 12. John iii. 19; v. 44. 1 Cor. ii. 14. 2 Cor. iv. 4. 2 Tim. iii. 13. Whist. Princ. of Rel. Pref.

2. That there is in general no absurdity in supposing, that a divine revelation may be attended with a sentence of condemnation against those who reject it, since it is certain, God may contrive an evidence which he knows to be reasonably sufficient for the conviction of every one to whom it is addressed, and on that supposition may condemn those who will not submit to it; which, if he has determined to do, it is wise and gracious in him to add such a threatening; and indeed, on the whole, it is most probable that this will be the case with regard to every revelation whatever.

3. That these general reasonings have peculiar weight when applied to Christianity, considering the representation which Scripture makes of the degree of its evidence; the nature and circumstances of the scheme itself, bringing the guilty creature such important blessings in so extraordinary a way; the manner in which it was introduced, and the difficulties it was to struggle with, which required such strong sanctions.

SCHOLIUM 7.

It is a question of the utmost difficulty, How much of the Gospel must be believed in order to salvation, or, in other words, what articles of faith are fundamental? To this some have answered, by saying, It is only fundamental to believe that the Scriptures are the word of God, and that all things contained therein are true; but this answer is liable to a double objection; as, on the one hand, it supposes it absolutely necessary that every man should believe both the plenary inspiration, and the extent of it to all the books of Scripture, which can never be proved to be a thing absolutely required; on the other hand, such an implicit belief of this might be consistent with the ignorance of, and mistakes about, many of the most important doctrines of Christianity; and therefore this will determine nothing in regard to the main question; though it may be indeed admitted, that where a person is possessed of such a belief, and appears not to contradict it by gross errors, it may be expedient, to avoid endless disputes, for Christian societies to acquiesce in such a declaration, rather than to insist upon others more critical. Mr. Locke, and many others with him, maintain that the only fundamental of Christianity is, that Christ is the Messiah; but here a question arises concerning the extent of these words; perhaps it may be sufficient to answer it by saying, That wherever there appeared to be such a persuasion of the dignity of Christ's person, and the extent of his power, as should encourage men to commit their souls to his care, and to subject them to his government, those who professed such a persuasion were admitted to baptism by the apostles, and ought to be owned as Christians; and it seems necessary in the general to acquiesce in some such determination; for the demand of drawing up a list of fundamentals, i. e. of doctrines without the belief of which none can be saved, seems to be founded on a mistaken supposition, that the same things are fundamental to all; whereas according to persons' different capacities and opportunities of inquiry, that may be fundamental to one (i. e. necessary to be believed by him, in order to approve the general sincerity of his heart before God) which is not so to another.

SCHOLIUM 8.

It has been much disputed, Whether it be possible that the Heathens should be saved? Some have absolutely denied it, upon the authority of the texts mentioned in the proposition, which universally require faith in Christ; but to this it is answered, That they can only regard such to whom the Gospel comes, and are capable of understanding the contents of it. The truth seems to be this, That none of the Heathens will be condemned for not believing the Gospel; but they are liable to condemnation for the breach of God's natural law; nevertheless, if there be any of them in whom there is a prevailing love to the Divine Being, and care in the practice of virtue, there seems reason to believe that, for the sake of Christ, though to them unknown, they may be accepted by God: and so much the rather, as the ancient Jews, and even the apostles of Christ, during the time of our Saviour's abode upon earth, seem to have had but little notion of these doctrines, which those who deny the salvability of the Heathens are most apt to imagine fundamental. Compare Rom. ii. 10, &c. 26. Acts x. 34, 35. Matt. viii. 11, 12. to which may be added 1 John ii. 2. which Mr. Rymer supposes intentionally decisive on this question, as to the application of Christ's merits to all virtuous men, who may not have opportunities of hearing of his name. Some also add John i. 29.

SOLUTION.

1. It seems to be agreed on both sides, That Christians are to be concerned that they maintain the purity of the faith as delivered in the Scriptures; and that in proportion to the degree in which any particular error is apprehended to be pernicious, it is to be discouraged, and by all rational and Christian methods opposed, by private persons and religious societies, Rom. xvi. 17. 1 Tim. i. 19, 20. 2 Tim. ii. 16—18. Jude ver. 3. 2 John ver. 10, 11.

2. Nevertheless, the frequent exhortations that every where occur in Scripture to maintain mutual candour and love towards each other, should teach us to use the greatest tenderness on this head, and will oblige us to put the kindest construction on the different expressions, and even the mistakes, of our fellow-Christians, that we rationally can. See the texts quoted at the end of Turretine on Fundamentals.

Doddridge's Sermon on Christian Candour.

3. When these two points are allowed, if the question be, what those peculiar errors are which are to be discountenanced, so as to refuse acts of religious communion with those that hold them? the question is much the same with that of the fundamentals of Christianity treated of before: if it be, Whether persons censured and avoided as erroneous are to be called heretics, or are so called in Scripture? it is only then a debate concerning the particular use of a word, which indeed is the chief thing that seems in question between the two accurate and ingenious writers mentioned above; and with regard to that, it may be remarked,

(1.) That the word αιρεσις, from αιρεω, eligo, seems to answer most exactly to the English word sect, and consequently though it may sometimes admit of an indifferent signification, is generally taken in an ill sense: so it certainly is in Gal. v. 20. (compare 2 Pet. ii. 1.) and though some have disputed it, yet it seems on the whole most probably to bear such a sense in 1 Cor. xi. 19. Acts xxiv. 5, 14; xxviii. 22. but the last instance seems the most doubtful.

(2.) It seems dubious whether heresy does, in the New Testament, signify any thing different from a high degree of schism, or breaking the peace of the church by uncharitable divisions and separations. The chief place where any pretend to find a difference is 1 Cor. xi. 19. compared with ver. 18. but if the word και, in the 19th verse, be supposed only an expletive, the argument which is drawn from thence is certainly inconclusive; or the two words may only express different degrees of the same thing.

(3.) Nevertheless, we acknowledge that, in the early ages of the church, the word Heretic signified those who erred in fundamentals, or doctrines reckoned of the greatest importance; and Schismatics were those who separated from others with a regard to discipline only.

Suic. Thes. vol. i. Col. 120 and 124, on the words.

4. It is further questioned, Whether a heretic, in St. Paul's sense, (Tit. iii. 10, 11.) is one who, contrary to his conviction, maintains any doctrine in debate; or whether it may take in the case of one who is mistaken in his judgment. Dr. Foster, following Dr. Whitby, is of the first of these opinions; and would infer from it, that as none can ordinarily tell who is self-condemned without the gift of discerning spirits, the use of this rule was peculiar to the apostles' time. His chief argument is, not so much that such a person is said to sin, but that he is said to be αυτοκατακριτος; which he supposes must signify condemned by his own conscience. But Dr. Stebbing thinks the meaning is, that such a person does not, like many other offenders, study to conceal his crime, and thereby oblige others to prove it, but that openly declaring and maintaining his sentiments, he is accused and condemned out of his own mouth. Compare Heb. xi. 7. Matt. xii. 41, 42. Acts xiii. 46. where persons are said to be condemned by those who furnish out matter for their condemnation. Compare also Job xv. 6. Luke xix. 22. It is a strong objection against Dr. Foster's scheme, that the truth or falsehood of the doctrine professed, has, upon his principles, nothing to do with the question of a person's being a heretic; but the most orthodox professor might be condemned under this view, if by a secret revelation, or otherwise, it should be manifested that he was a Deist, whereas in this case, all the world would own he was condemned for infidelity, or for knavery, rather than heresy.

* Dean Tucker, in his Two Letters to Dr Kippis, has taken the same ground with Dr. Stebbing.

5. Some have urged, that if this text refers to the case of those who actually separated themselves from the church upon the account of Jewish ceremonies, which the context favours, they might be said to condemn or pass sentence on themselves, as by their separation they justified the conduct of the church in excluding them from their communion; but there seems no necessity for having recourse to this interpretation.

LECTURE CLXXIV

SCHOLIUM 1.

Mr. Hallet's notion of heresy is, that there is only a gradual difference between schism and heresy, and that schisms grow up into heresies when separations are occasioned; all heretics are therefore sectaries; and no doctrine alone can constitute a person a heretic. Sects in the Christian church are evils, and wherever there is a needless and contentious separation, there is somewhere a guilt. The only rule, he says, to determine which is heresy in all places and all ages, is the declaration which God has made in Scripture of the terms of acceptance with him; and when any thing more than this is insisted upon, in order to continue communion, there is the guilt of heresy on that side which insists on those unnecessary and unscriptural things. On this foundation, he concludes that the Pope is the chief heretic in the world, and others in proportion to the usurpation of an authority not given by Christ; and adds, that wicked men can from him have no authority in the church at all.

Hallet's Disc. vol. iii. p. 338. Manne's Critical Notes on Gal. i. 8, 9. p. 81.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some have also objected, as a defect in Christianity, that there is no infallible rule whereby exactly to judge what heresy is, though it be so expressly condemned, supposing it to signify such an error as exposes a man to the regular censure of his Christian brethren. It is answered, That a scheme of doctrine is laid down in Scripture, to which all are obliged to assent, so far as they can understand it. Men may indeed mistake in the sense of these rules, and how far these mistakes are important, particular persons and particular societies are to judge for themselves: and though it is a necessary consequence of this, that some will disapprove the determination of societies, as well as the opinion of private persons, yet this is an imperfection of human nature for which there could be no imaginable remedy, unless it were to make every man infallible; for whatever decisions were given, and whatever living judge were to interpret these decisions, there would still be room for putting various senses even upon these interpretations themselves. And if men do not proceed to hate and persecute those whom they think erroneous, the consequences of men's thus condemning each other for mere mental errors will not be very important: and probably leaving the matter in this latitude will, on the whole, be attended with fewer inconveniences than any other scheme whatsoever; and it may deserve serious consideration, whether the way of arguing in the objection may not also affect Christ's rule, (Matt. xviii. 15--18.) and indeed all other rules and laws, human or divine, in the interpretation or application of which it is certain fallible men may err.

Lett. to Stebb. in Lond. Mag. for 1735. p. 512.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have thought the only remedy for the above-mentioned defects would be, to introduce some human form as a standard of orthodoxy, wherein certain disputed doctrines shall be expressed in such determinate phrases, as may be directly levelled against such errors as shall prevail from time to time, requiring those especially who are to be public teachers in the church to subscribe, or virtually to declare their assent to such formularies. On this head we may observe,

1. Had this been requisite, it is probable the Scriptures would have given us some such formularies as these, or some directions as to the manner in which they should be drawn up, proposed, and received.

2. It is impossible that weak and passionate men, who have perhaps been heated in the very controversy thus decided, should express themselves with greater propriety than the apostles did.

3. It is plain, in fact, that this practice has been the cause of great contention in the Christian church; and such formularies have been the grand engine of dividing it, in proportion to the degree in which they have been multiplied and urged.

4. This is laying a great temptation in the way of such as desire to undertake the office of teachers in the church, and will be most likely to deter and afflict those who have the greatest tenderness of conscience, and therefore (cæt. par.) best deserve encouragement.

5. It is not likely to answer the end proposed, viz. the preserving a uniformity of opinion, since persons of little integrity may perhaps satisfy their consciences in subscribing what they do not at all believe, as articles of peace, or in putting the most unnatural sense on the words. And whereas, in answer to all these inconveniences it is pleaded, that such forms are necessary to keep the church from heresy; and it is better there should be some hypocrites under such forms of orthodoxy, than that a freedom of debate and opinion should be allowed to all teachers, the answer is plain; that when any one begins to preach doctrines, which appear to those who attend upon him dangerous and subversive of Christianity, it will be time enough to proceed to such an animadversion as the nature of his error, in their apprehension, will require, and his relation to them will admit.

Nevertheless, it is very consistent with what we have said under the preceding scholium, that voluntary societies should demand such satisfaction as they shall, on serious inquiry, think fit, of the orthodoxy of one who is to minister among them: nor can this be said to intrench at all upon Christian liberty, and the right of private judgment, since every private Christian has the same right of judging who is fit to teach him, as every teacher has of judging for himself what is the true Christian doctrine. And the like may be said with respect to ministers, when desired to concur in any solemn act, by which they are to declare their approbation of the admission of any particular person to that office. Confessional, c. ii. p. 30.

LECTURE CLXXV.

PROPOSITION LXXXIII.

Any degree of divine influence on the mind, inclining it to believe in Christ and to practise virtue, is called GRACE.

SCHOLIUM.

There are in Scripture many other senses of the word grace, which does in the general signify any favour of God freely bestowed upon his creatures: compare 1 Cor. x. 30. 2 Cor. viii. 4, 5. Eph. iv. 7. but forasmuch as those which relate to the improvement of their temper, and their fitness for final happiness, are favours of the greatest importance, this name is, by way of eminence, applied to them, as we shall show in what follows.

Clarke's Posth. Serm. vol. ii. p. 265.

DEFINITION LXXXIV.

The communication of grace given to any soul in such a degree, as actually to bring that soul to faith in Christ, and consequently into a state of salvation, may properly be called SPECIAL GRACE.

COROLLARY.

Special grace is the work of the Spirit of God, Tit. iii. 5, 6. Gal. iv. 6; v. 18, 22. Rom. v. 5; viii. 9, 13, 14. 2 Cor. iii. 3; v. 5. to which may be added 2 Thess. ii. 13. and many other texts, several of which will be mentioned under the following proposition.

DEFINITION LXXXV.

Those divine influences, which leave the mind short of faith and sincere obedience, may be called COMMON GRACE; but those which introduce special, though they do not yet amount to it, may, with respect to that introduction, be called PREPARATORY.

PROPOSITION LXXXVI.

All those who do indeed believe in Christ, and in the main practise virtue, are to ascribe it not merely or chiefly to their own wisdom and goodness, but to the special operation of divine grace upon their souls, as the original cause of it.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. None can deny that God has such an access to the minds of men, that he can work upon them in what manner he pleases: and there is great reason to believe, that his secret influence on the mind gives a turn to many of the most important events relating to particular persons and societies. Prov. xxi. 1. as it is evident many of the public revolutions mentioned in the Old Testament are ascribed to this cause. Ezra i. 1.

Rel. of Nat. delin. p. 105.

2. Though the mind of man be not invincibly determined by motives, yet in matters of great importance it is not determined without them: and it is reasonable to believe, that where a person goes through those difficulties which attend faith and obedience, he must have a very lively view of the great engagements to them, and probably upon the whole a more lively view than another, who in the same circumstances in all other respects acts in a different manner.

Not to mention incidental publications, the matter has been largely discussed in the four controversies occasioned by the Confessional, the Country Application to Parliament, the Dissenting Ministers Address to the Parliament, and the Attempts to obtain the Repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts. pressions on the mind, the efficacy of them is to be ascribed to the continual agency of the first cause.

1—3. 4. The prevalence of virtue and piety in the church is to be ascribed to God, as the great original Author, even upon the principles of natural religion.

5. Good men in Scripture, who appear best to have understood the nature of God and his conduct towards men, and who wrote under the influence and inspiration of his Spirit, frequently offer up such petitions to God, as show that they believed the reality and importance of his gracious agency upon the heart to promote piety and virtue. Psal. li. 10—12; xxxix. 4; xc. 12; cxix. 12, 18, 27, 33—37, 73, 80, 133. 1 Chron. xxix. 18, 19. Eph. i. 16, &c. Col. i. 9—11, et sim.

6. God promises to produce such a change in the hearts of those to whom the other valuable blessings of his word are promised, as plainly implies, that the alteration made in their temper and character is to be looked upon as his work. Deut. xxx. 6. Psal. cx. 3. Jer. xxxi. 33; xxxii. 39, 40. Ezek. xi. 19, 20; xxxvi. 26, 27. Compare Heb. viii. 8—13.

7. The Scripture expressly declares, in many places, that the work of faith in the soul is to be ascribed to God, and describes the change made in a man's heart when he becomes truly religious in such language, as must lead the mind to some strength superior to our own, by which it is effected: John i. 13; iii. 3, 5, 6. Acts xi. 18; xvi. 14. 2 Cor. iii. 3. Eph. i. 19, 20; ii. 1, 10; iv. 24. Phil. i. 29. Col. i. 11, 12; ii. 12, 13. Vid. James i. 18. 2 Tim. ii. 25. To this catalogue we scruple not to add Eph. ii. 8. though some have objected that τουτο cannot refer to πιστεως; since the like change of genders is often to be found in the New Testament. Compare Acts xxiv. 16; xxvi. 17. Phil. i. 28. 1 John ii. 8. Gal. iii. 16; iv. 19. Matt. vi. ult.; xxviii. 18. Rom. ii. 14.

8. The increase of Christians in faith and piety is spoken of as the work of God; which must more strongly imply that the first beginnings of it are to be ascribed to him. Psal. cxix. 32. Phil. i. 6; ii. 13. 1 Cor. vii. 25; iii. 7; iv. 7; xv. 10. 2 Cor. v. 5. Heb. xiii. 20, 21. 1 Pet. v. 10. Jude 24, 25.

9. The Scripture does expressly assert the absolute necessity of such divine influences on the mind, in order to faith and holiness, and speaks of God's giving them to one while he withholds them from another, as the great reason of the difference to be found in the characters of different men in this important respect. Deut. xxix. 4. Matt. xi. 25, 26. John vi. 44—46; xii. 39, 40. Rom. ix. 18—23.

4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. 10. It appears probable from the light of nature, and certain from the word of God, that faith and repentance are ultimately to be ascribed to the work of special grace upon the hearts of men. Q. E. D.

LECTURE CLXXVI.

COROLLARY 1.

We may learn with what dependence Gospel ministers should undertake their work, and to what they should ascribe the success of it. 1 Cor. iii. 4; and xv. 10. Somers's Fun. Serm. for Mr. Saund.

COROLLARY 2.

Those who are finally brought to faith, repentance, and salvation, have great reason to acknowledge the divine goodness to them, and no room to boast of themselves. 1 Cor. i. 29, 30.

COROLLARY 3.

It is a gross mistake to assert, as some have done, that grace never signifies the operation of God upon men's minds, but only intimates his gracious acceptance of their repentance, brought about by the motives and assistance of the Gospel, i. e. as it must here mean, by the discovery of the Christian scheme. Compare Acts xiv. 26; xv. 40; xviii. 27; 1 Cor. xv. 10; 2 Cor. i. 12. Heb. iv. 16. Gal. vi. 18. in all which places, and many more, grace makes very good sense, if taken for a divine operation on the heart, which on the interpretation opposed it would by no means do: and it may further be observed, that when grace is used to express moral virtues and good dispositions in our hearts, they are so called, not merely, or chiefly, as recommending us to the divine favour, but as produced by divine influence, though still working in a manner suited to the freedom of our nature. Compare Eph. iv. 29. 2 Pet. iii. 18. 2 Cor. viii. 1, 6, 7.

Clarke at Boyle's Lec. p. 328. Balguy's Serm. vol. ii. p. 361. Lardn. Serm. p. 297.

They are greatly mistaken who assert, That the assistances of God's Spirit were peculiar to the primitive ages: and who interpret such texts as those quoted above, merely of a miraculous agency on the apostles and primitive Christians. See the

* In 1792 Dr. Thomas Edwards, of Coventry, published a work, entitled The Doctrine of Irresistible Grace proved to have no foundation in the Writings of the New Testament.—In Leeds, upon this subject, the author pursues the plan which had been adopted by Clarke on the Trinity, Hoadley on the Sacrament, and Sykes on Redemption, of arranging every text of Scripture that was supposed to relate to the point in question. COROLLARY 5.

Forasmuch as gratitude is so powerful a principle in human nature; and the obligations arising from the divine goodness in imparting special grace to believers are so high and important, it must be the duty of those who preach the Gospel, to lead their people diligently to reflect upon it, and to appear themselves under an affectionate sense of its value and excellency.

COROLLARY 6.

On the principles of the proposition it will appear proper, that the distinction between the regenerate and unregenerate should be kept up in preaching; and though there be some, on whom divine grace has wrought so early, that perhaps it is difficult to find a time, from the first dawning of reason, when they did not appear in the main under the influences of it, yet such instances are comparatively few; and as those early good dispositions must appear to be in a peculiar manner the work of God's Spirit, considering the strength of appetite and passion in children, and the weakness of reason, it would be extremely wrong to exempt such out of the class of the regenerate, and to confine the phrase to those who have been reclaimed from a vicious and immoral course.

Sharp's Serm. vol. iii. p. 290.

SCHOLIUM 1.

As it appears that, by the corruption of our nature, the whole symmetry of it is broken, it has generally been maintained by those who assert the doctrine in the proposition, That divine grace may work, not only by enlightening the understanding and awakening the affections,—but also by some immediate influences upon the will, in order to restore that harmony of all the faculties in which the perfection of our nature consists; and many have thought that the body, as well as the mind, may be the subject of such divine operations. Compare 1 Thess. v. 23. and Def. 26. Cor. 2. Prop. 17. Cor. but it is extremely difficult to conceive of the distinction in all its branches; and it does not seem of so much importance as some have thought.

Foster's Serm. vol. ii. p. 96.

As to the manner in which divine grace operates upon the mind, considering how little it is we know of the nature and constitution of our own souls, and of the frame of nature around us, it is no wonder that it should be unaccountable to us (John iii. 8.); perhaps, it may often be, by impelling the animal spirits or nerves, in such a manner as is proper to excite certain ideas in the mind with a degree of vivacity, which they would not otherwise have had. By this means various passions are excited; but the great motives addressed to gratitude and love seem generally, if not always, to operate upon the will more powerfully than any other, which many divines have therefore chosen to express by the phrase of delectatio victrix. Compare Deut. xxx. 6. Psal. cxix. 16, 20, 32, 47, 48, 97, 103. Psal. xix. 10, 11. Rom. vii. 22. 1 John iv. 18, 19. Rom. v. 5.

* The opinion, however, that the assistances of God's Spirit were peculiar to the apostolic times, and refer to the extraordinary works and gifts of those times, has been maintained by some Scripture critics. See Dr. Priestley's Sermon on the Doctrine of the Divine Influence on the Human Mind, in his Discourses on various Subjects: and an article concerning the Apostolical Benediction, published in the first volume of Commentaries and Essays, p. 111.

LECTURE CLXXVII.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It enters into the definition of special grace, That it is never on the whole finally rejected, so as to fail of working faith in those who are the happy objects of it; but there is a great controversy, Whether these operations be in their own nature irresistible or not?—or, in other words, Whether it was possible that those who in consequence of it do believe, should, in these circumstances, have continued in their infidelity, and finally have rejected the Gospel? To prove that special grace is irresistible, the following arguments have chiefly been insisted upon:—

1. That the Scripture represents men as by nature in a condition entirely helpless. Compare Eph. ii. 1. Luke iv. 18. Acts xxvi. 18. Rom. viii. 7.

2. That the action of God in the conversion of a sinner is described in such terms, as plainly to show it is invincible; v. g. by raising from the dead, by giving a new heart, by writing the law of God in the soul, &c. Compare Prop. 139. gr. 5, 6. But to both these arguments it is answered, That they are figurative expressions, which are not to be interpreted in the utmost rigour: that they do indeed intimate a strong disinclination in men to faith and repentance, and a powerful, but not therefore irresistible, operation of God upon the mind. Compare Rom. vi. 2. 1 John iii. 9. and other texts of the like import.

3. It is said, That if special grace were not irresistible, then it would be uncertain whether any would believe or no, and consequently possible that all which Christ had done and suffered in the work of redemption might have been done and suffered in vain. To this it is answered, That the event may be certain where it is not necessary, or otherwise there can be no foundation for a certain foreknowledge of future contingencies, which those who maintain this doctrine of irresistible grace do generally grant. This likewise will answer the arguments brought from those Scriptures in which conversion to God is made the subject of a divine promise. Those who are on the other side of the question allow, that in some instances divine operations on the mind may be irresistible, as in the case of St. Paul's conversion; but they say, That to maintain that it is thus in every instance, is to destroy the liberty of the mind in all these cases, and consequently to leave no room for the exercise of justice in conferring rewards and inflicting punishments; not to say that the grace of God itself cannot be said to assist us, if there be no cooperation of our own with it. Compare Phil. ii. 12, 13.

LECTURE CLXXVIII.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is also questioned whether common grace be sufficient; and here it is to be observed, that the question has some ambiguity. If that grace alone is to be called sufficient, which is such, as to put it into a man's power immediately to believe, without any further or higher influence on his mind, it seems that the sufficiency of common grace cannot be proved; but if that is sufficient, by which a man is enabled to take some steps, on his taking which further grace will be communicated, till at length, by a longer or shorter train of convictions, special grace is given, it is difficult to reconcile the denial of such a sufficiency of common grace with the divine justice, in condemning men for their infidelity, and the frequent declarations which God makes in Scripture, that he does not desire the death of a sinner. Prov. i. 21—25. Ezek. xviii. 23; xxxiii. 11. Isa. v. 1, &c. Ezek. xii. 2. Matt. xi. 21—24; xxiii. 37, 38; xxv. 26, 27. The most considerable argument for the negative is, That grace, which is always in fact ineffectual, (as common grace is, by the very definition of it,) cannot properly be said to have been always sufficient; but not to insist upon its being taken for granted in this objection, that there is a specific difference between common and special grace, the objection seems only to be saying, in other words, that the mind of man is so formed, that it could not be determined by considerations by which it is not in fact determined, which is only an obscure way of denying the liberty of choice; for if that be allowed, it must be owned, that in every crime which has been committed, from the first original of mankind, there have been sufficient reasons against it, which yet have never in fact prevailed in any one of those instances.

SCHOLIUM 5.

This may teach us in what sense God may be said to will the salvation of those that perish, i. e. he wills it conditionally, and determines to do what may be sufficient to effect it, if it be not their own fault; but he does not will it to such a degree as to do the utmost which his almighty power could effect for that purpose, nor to do any thing more for their salvation than he knows in fact will, by their own perverseness, be overborne. Fact proves that this is the highest sense in which he can be said to will their salvation; and it seems that any thing short of this would not be a foundation for using the phrase at all, especially with such great solemnity as is observable in some of the passages quoted above. Schol. 4.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Whether the mind be entirely passive in the first moment of its conversion, or whether there be any cooperation of our own together with the influences of divine grace upon our heart, is a question which has also been very much disputed. It chiefly depends on what is meant by conversion. If a man is then only said to be converted when his heart is in a prevailing degree really determined for the service of God through Christ, he is plainly active in such a determination, though there may have been some preceding scenes in which he has been passive; i. e. while God has made those impressions on his mind which have led to this determination; and as, according to the natural constitution of our mind, some motives must precede the volition leading towards this final determination, it is proper to own God as the first Mover in this blessed work, and to acknowledge that, in this sense as well as others, we love him because he has first loved us. Compare 1 Cor. i. 30, 31. Psal. xcv. 7, 8. Eph. iv. 30. Rev. iii. 20. Phil. ii. 13. Ezek. xi. 19. with Ezek. xviii. 31. Deut. xxx. 6. with Jer. iv. 4. Acts ii. 40. 1 Tim. iv. 16.

* Some observations concerning Mr. Baxter's Theological System, with respect to the doctrines of grace and its influences, which will be found in a discourse of that good Christian, called Baxterianism, will be found in the Biographia Britannica, vol. i. p. 22, second edition.

SCHOLIUM 7.

The question, Whether the work of regeneration and conversion be accomplished in an instant, is nearly akin to the former. It must be acknowledged, there is some one moment in which there is the first preponderancy of religious impressions and resolution in the soul; but if all that the Spirit does to bring a man to real religion, is called (as with some latitude of expression it may) the work of his converting or regenerating grace, it is evidently a gradual thing; and it would certainly have an ill influence upon practical religion, to encourage men to expect an instantaneous miraculous change in the neglect of proper means.

SCHOLIUM 8.

We most readily allow, that the rules by which God proceeds in dispensing his special grace are to us unaccountable; for it plainly appears that it is not always given in proportion to the use that has been made of common grace, since many who have been the most abandoned sinners are in a very sudden and surprising manner brought to repentance and faith, while others of a fairer character go on in impenitence and unbelief. Compare 1 Cor. vi. 9—11. 1 Tim. i. 14—16. Nevertheless, it would be very unjust to accuse God of partiality on that account; because, in his final judgment, he will distribute rewards and punishments according to the characters of men, (Rom. ii. 6.) and dealing justly by all, so far as to inflict no undeserved punishments, he may certainly be allowed to dispense his favour as he pleases, (Matt. xx. 13—15.) and if we will not allow this, we shall find invincible difficulties in the dispensations of nature as well as of grace, considering the vast difference which God is pleased to make in the circumstances of various creatures, even where there has been no correspondent difference in their previous character and behaviour.

SCHOLIUM 9.

Some of the Heathens seem to have had a notion of divine influences on the mind as necessary to make them wise and good, and have ascribed their virtues as well as their intellectual endowments to it; though others have spoken in a very haughty manner upon this head.

DEFINITION LXXXVI.

That it is said to be A STATE OF SALVATION, in which if a person die, he would partake of the future salvation and happiness promised in the Gospel.

DEFINITION LXXXVII.

The doctrine of the PERSEVERANCE OF SAINTS, is that doctrine which asserts, That all who have ever believed in Christ, according to Def. 82. or who have ever been in a state of salvation, are never suffered finally to perish; but do either continue in that state to the end of their lives, or, if they fall from it, are again recovered to it.

COROLLARY 1.

A person may be said to believe the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints in this sense, who believes their apostasy to be in the nature of things possible, provided he believes it in fact certain that they will not actually apostatize.

COROLLARY 2.

A person may be said to believe the doctrine of perseverance in this sense, who admits of a total apostasy for a time, from which the person so fallen away is afterwards recovered; but whether this belief be consistent with Scripture or not, will be afterwards inquired.

LECTURE CLXXIX.

PROPOSITION CXI.

To inquire, Whether the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints, as stated above, be or be not the Scripture doctrine?

SOLUTION.

SECT. I. For the negative, that it is not a Scripture doctrine, the following arguments are produced:—

Arg. I. There are various threatenings denounced against those who do apostatize, both under the Old Testament and under the New, which the patrons of the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints allow to have contained the same covenant of grace, e. g. Ezek. iii. 20; xviii. 24. Heb. vi. 4—8. 29. Psalm cxxv. 3—5. To this it has been answered, That some of these texts do not so much as suppose the falling away of a truly good man; and to all of them it is said, they only show what would be the consequence, if such should fall away, or at most prove it in the nature of things possible, but cannot prove that it ever in fact happens. Compare James ii. 10. Matt. xviii. 8, 9. 22. Luke xvii. 4; xvi. 26. 31.

Limb. Theol. l. v. c. lxxxi. § 1—6, &c. Tillots. Works, vol. ii. p. 490.

Arg. II. It is foretold as a future event, that some true Christians shall fall away. Matt. xxiv. 12. 13. John xv. 6. Matt. xiii. 20, 21.

To the first of these passages it is answered, That their love might be said to wax cold, without totally ceasing; or there might have been an outward zeal where there never was a true faith. To the second, That persons may be said to be in Christ, only by an external profession: see John xv. 2. comp. Rom. viii. 1. Gal. iii. 27. As to Matt. xiii. 20, 21. it is replied, That this may refer to the joy with which some may entertain the offers of pardon, who never attentively considered them, nor cordially acquiesced in the method in which that and the other blessings of the Gospel covenant were proposed.

Limb. Theol. ib. § 5—9.

Arg. III. It is urged, That many have in fact fallen away, as David and Solomon, and those mentioned 1 Tim. i. 19, 20. 2 Tim. iv. 10. Compare Phil. iv. 3. Col. iv. 14. Philem. ver. 24. 2 Pet. ii. 18.

To those instances it is answered,

1. By some, that with regard to David and Solomon there might be some habits of grace remaining in their hearts, even when they were overborne by the remainders of corruption.

2. By others, that David and Solomon were recovered, and that Demas might possibly be so; and as to others, that there is no proof of their ever having been sincere Christians and truly good men; which is particularly applicable to Alexander and Hymeneus. As for 1 Tim. v. 12. which some add to the above-mentioned instances, it is answered, That their first faith might be a mere ineffectual assent; or that it may mean only their promise given to the church that they would continue widows, in order to attend to its service.

Roberts. Clav. Bibl. p. 86. Ham. on 1 Tim. v. 12.

Arg. IV. It is urged, That the doctrine of perseverance supersedes the use of means, and renders those exhortations and motives insignificant, which are so often to be found in Scripture, v. g. Luke xii. 5. Rom. xi. 20. 1 Cor. ix. 27. Heb. iii. 12; iv. 1. Rev. ii. 10; iii. 11. 2 Tim. ii. 12. To this it is replied, That these admonitions and exhortations have their use, being the means by which God continues his saints in their holy course, it being still true that continued holiness is absolutely necessary in order to their salvation, with which the certainty of their salvation in that way is not by any means inconsistent. Comp. Acts xxvii. 22—24. 31.

Limb. Theol. lib. v. c. 83. Saur. Ser. vol. ix. No. 1.

Arg. V. It is urged, That the doctrine of perseverance gives great encouragement to carnal security, and presumptuous sin.

Ans. 1. We allow that it may be abused; but that will not prove it to be false, though it is a reason against admitting it to be true without clear evidence; but the free pardon of the greatest sins upon repentance and faith, though so certain a truth, is also liable to as fatal and obvious abuse.

2. None can assure themselves of their own perseverance (allowing the doctrine in general to be true) any further than as they have an evidence that they are already true believers. To all therefore who are in any doubt with regard to the sincerity of grace in their hearts, the argument taken from the fear of eternal condemnation and misery must have its full weight.

3. As for those who are true believers, and know themselves to be such, allowing the doctrine of perseverance, they may nevertheless receive great damage by sin. There is on this very principle so much the more reason to believe that God will visit it (as he remarkably did in the instance of David) with temporal afflictions; and the diminution of future glory in proportion to the degree in which sin prevails, will still remain as a consideration of great moment with the most excellent saints.

4. If the motive taken from the fear of everlasting misery be weakened, that from love and gratitude, which is the most powerful and acceptable principle of obedience, is greatly strengthened; so that, upon the whole, this doctrine is not likely to prove a snare to a man, except when he is in so ill a situation of mind, that nothing but the fear of immediate damnation will restrain him from the commission of sin; and the probability of dying immediately upon the commission of sin, before there is room for renewed acts of faith and repentance, is so small, that few persons who do not believe perseverance, will be restrained from guilt merely by that fear:—and to conclude, before a man can with any plausible appearance draw an argument from this doctrine to encourage himself to sin, he must be sure he is a believer: but how can he know it? If by a pretended revelation, strong proof must be demanded; for it will seem in theory very improbable that such a favour should be granted to a wretch disposed so vilely to abuse it: if by rational evidence, what past impressions which he may have felt, can give a stronger evidence of true piety than arise to the contrary from so detestable a disposition as is now supposed to prevail? So that, though on the whole it is possible this doctrine may be abused, the probability of such an abuse is less, and the absurdity of it much greater, than persons on the other side the question have seemed generally to apprehend.

LECTURE CLXXX.

SECT. II. To enumerate the principal arguments in favour of the doctrine:—and,

Arg. I. It is argued from the promises of preserving grace, Jer. xxxii. 38—40. John iv. 14; vi. 39; x. 28; xi. 26. To the first of these it is answered, That the clause on which the argument turns, may be translated, "That they may not depart from me;" but it is replied, That the apostle quotes this text, Heb. viii. 10. in a manner not liable to this ambiguity. As to the other passages, some understand them merely as a conditional promise, expressing the safety of believers while they adhere to Christ; but the relation of a shepherd, professed in some of them, intimates a care to prevent a seduction of the flock, as well as to defend them from violence. To these texts some add all those passages, in which Christ owns such a relation to his church, and expresses such a care of it, as must in fact be a security to every true member, as when he calls himself its Head, Husband, Saviour, &c.

Limb. ib. l. v. c. 84. Lime-st. Lec. vol. ii. p. 331.

Arg. II. The doctrine is argued from the cheerful hope and persuasion which the apostles often express of their own persevering, and that of their fellow-saints, as will appear from consulting the following texts.

Rom. viii. 35—39. 2 Tim. iv. 8. Ans. The apostle only expresses his confidence that none of those evils should hurt them while they continued stedfast unto Christ; but this is sinking the sense very low; it could never have been imagined or suspected that calamities alone should alienate the love of God from good men, especially when a regard to the cause of God brought on those calamities; but it was very important to assure them that God would so strengthen them under their trials, that they should be enabled to bear them without final apostasy. Limborch, ib. § 10, 11.

Phil. i. 6. Ans. It expresses what appeared probable rather than certain. It is replied, That admitting the answer, it must be granted that the perseverance of good men is at least probable, and the reason insinuated, which is God's having begun a good work in them, is applicable to all believers; as the following words intimate, that it is through the divine inspection and care to finish his work that they are secured.

1 Pet. i. 4, 5. Ans. The apostle speaks of their having been kept hitherto, but does not assert that they shall still be kept; but this does not seem to amount to their being kept to salvation.

1 Cor. i. 8, 9. Object. This refers to the confirming of the saints in a state of perpetual holiness at the last day. Ans. It would not be so proper to say they were then confirmed unto the end; and there may be (as our version supposes) an ellipsis in the expression, q. d. "He shall confirm you even to the end, that ye may be blameless," &c.

Whitby in Loc. Beza in Loc. Doddridge in Loc. and Bos and Albertus.

1 Thess. v. 23, 24. The turn of phrase here is so much the same with the last text, that the same objection and the same answer may easily be applied; as there is indeed a remarkable resemblance between the two texts.

Arg. III. Those passages are pleaded, in which this doctrine is said to be expressly asserted, v. g.

Rom. viii. 28—30. Dr. Whitby understands the phrase, Who are called according to his purpose,—of their being called to a profession of Christianity; and by being glorified, their receiving the Spirit of God, whereby a very considerable glory was conferred upon them (compare 1 Pet. iv. 4.); but it is certain this is a very uncommon sense of the word; to which we may add, that the called are spoken of as lovers of God; not to insist upon that part of the argument which is taken from the mention of God's purpose and predestination concerning them.

Matt. xxiv. 24. Ans. EI DONATON only implies the exceeding difficulty, not impossibility, of the case. Limb. Theol. lib. v. c. 84. § 8.

1 John iii. 9. Objection. It is only, q. d. an allowed course of sin is inconsistent with true Christianity.

Ans. Such an explication will by no means suit the phrase of the seed abiding in such, (comp. 1 Pet. i. 23.) even though it should be granted that abiding signifies no more than is in them.

Limb. ib. § 12, 13.

Matt. vii. 25.—It is answered, That by storms and tempests are to be understood persecution, or the final trial all are to expect from God; and in either sense, the meaning will only be, that he who does the will of Christ shall have a secure foundation of hope and confidence under this trial. Compare Prov. iv. 18. Job xvii. 9. Psal. xcii. 12—15. Isa. xl. 31. to which texts nothing can be answered, but that they express either the happiness of good men, or what is generally their character.

Arg. IV. There are many passages in which it is asserted, that those who have fallen away from their profession were never sincere in it; which plainly implies that those who are sincere do never fall away. They are such as these,

1 John ii. 19. compare Deut. xiii. 13.—Object. The apostle speaks of what would probably, though not certainly, have been the case; or, considering the peculiar evidence which attended Christianity, he might have peculiar reason to say that no sincere professor would be ashamed of the Gospel; but even this must only be on supposition that there is a certain degree of wickedness, into which no one who had once been good could fall; which few grant who deny perseverance. Matt. vii. 23.—Object. Christ might say this concerning many, though not all; and if it might be said of the greater part, it would justify such a general representation; as it may be only of the greater part of sinners he speaks, when he describes all at the left hand as condemned for uncharitableness, Matt. xxv. 42, 43. Luke viii. 4—15. where only those who brought forth fruit to perfection are said to have received the word in an honest heart. Object. It is only a circumstance of a parable, therefore not to be strained too far. Ans. It is a very material circumstance, and not merely incidental. It is further urged, by way of objection to this argument, that they may be called good ground, who receive it with an honest heart, and bring forth fruit, even though their fruit should wither and they themselves perish; but it is replied, That this is the very case of the stony ground hearers; nor can those be said to bring forth fruit to perfection who never attain to more than an imperfect state, and at last fall from that, and incur aggravated guilt and ruin.

Lime-st. Lec. vol. ii. p. 284. Baxter's End of Con. c. xxvi. Wits. Econ. Fœd. l. iii. c. xiii.

COROLLARY.

There is, on the whole, reason to believe that the doctrine of perseverance, as stated and limited above, is indeed the Scripture doctrine.

LECTURE CLXXXI.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Most of those who believe that the saints shall not finally fall away, so as actually to perish, do likewise believe that they never totally apostatize, even for a time; and consequently allow that David, under his greatest guilt, was still in a state of favour and acceptance with God, as having a secret principle of spiritual life, though at that time overborne by the prevalency of sin. The chief stress of the argument lies on Heb. vi. 4, &c.; and it is urged, that if this text be allowed to speak of those who fall short of real piety, as the patterns of perseverance generally suppose, yet in pronouncing their recovery impossible, it must much more strongly conclude against the recovery of a true saint, if he should fall away; but we answer, If it be allowed (as perhaps there may be reason to allow it) that the falling away, here spoken of, is such a total apostasy from Christianity, as implies the sin against the Holy Ghost, then it will follow, that whatever argument there is to prove final perseverance, will prove that true believers shall not be suffered to fall into that sin; and if it be supposed only to express inferior degrees of apostasy, then it must be granted that ἀδύνατον only signifies extremely difficult; and so, on either supposition, no certain conclusion can be drawn from this passage. Compare Heb. x. 26—29.

Wits. Econ. Fœd. lib. iii. c. xiii. § 10, 11, 26. Lime-st. Lect. vol. ii. p. 297.

To this it has been added by some, that if several of the texts urged above have any weight to prove perseverance at all, it must be a total as well as a final perseverance. Compare particularly 1 John ii. 19; iii. 9. 1 Pet. i. 4, 5.

Limb. Theol. lib. v. c. 85. § 4, 5. Hale's Gold. Rem. p. 129.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Perseverance is owing to the continued influence of the Spirit of God upon the hearts of true believers (vid. Prop. 139. gr. 7, 8.); and this seems to be the foundation of that metaphor by which the Spirit is said to dwell in them, and they are described as his temple, Rom. viii. 9. 1 Cor. iii. 16; vi. 19. Eph. ii. 22. John vii. 37—39.

Howe's Liv. Tem. ap. Op. vol. i. p. 215. vol. ii. c. 10. p. 369. Lime-str. Lec. vol. ii. p. 336.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The preceding scholium may serve to explain the foundation of that metaphor by which Christ is represented as the head of the church; which, together with him, makes up one mystical body; for his created nature being thus inhabited by the Holy Ghost, and the influences of that Spirit being communicated from him to believers, to animate them to the same great end of cultivating holiness and glorifying God, it is evident that such an allegory as we have mentioned above is just and beautiful; since the several parts of the human body are actuated by the same mind, and have sensation and motion communicated to them by virtue of their union with the head. Compare John i. 16; xvii. 21; xv. 5. 1 Cor. vi. 17; xii. 12, 13. Eph. iv. 15, 16. Col. ii. 19. Lime-st. Lec. vol. ii. p. 331.

SCHOLIUM 4.

From those texts in which God engages to cause all things to operate for the good of his people, such as Rom. viii. 28; v. 3. 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. many have inferred that God will order all events in such a manner, that the good of every particular believer shall, in fact, be advanced and promoted thereby; and some have carried this so far as to say that even sin itself shall be for the believer's advantage; though some have contradicted themselves again, by adding, that to have resisted the temptation would have been much more so: but it seems that the design of those texts will be sufficiently answered, if we allow that God's dispensations are so adjusted, that good men, if they are not wanting to themselves, may receive some good from all, and probably in general do so.

Turr. vol. ii. Loc. xv. Q. xvi. § 14, 18.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It seems from some of the texts enumerated, Prop. 133. gr. 2. that none have made such a progress in piety as to be entirely free from the remainders of indwelling sin; and Rom. vii. 14. &c. is often urged as a confirmation of this doctrine. It is answered, That the 7th chap. to the Romans describes the state of an unregenerate man. The arguments on both sides may be seen in the commentators; but, on the whole, it seems most probable that the context there describes the state of a good man under the imperfection of the Mosaic dispensation, and therefore is not so much to the purpose of the present question as some suppose. It is certain St. Paul sometimes speaks in the first person, when he means to represent the circumstances and sentiments of another, (Rom. iii. 7, 8. 1 Cor. iv. 4—6.) and perhaps, upon the whole, the true key to this much-controverted passage may be this:—St. Paul first represents a man as ignorant of the law, and then insensible of sin, but afterwards becoming acquainted with it, and then thrown into a kind of despair, by the sentence of death which it denounces, on account of sins he is now conscious of having committed; he then further shows, that even where there is so good a disposition, as even to delight in the law, yet the motives are too weak to maintain that uniform tenor of obedience which a good man greatly desires, and which the Gospel by its superior motives and grace does in fact produce.

Taylor on Rom. Par. p. 186. Doddr. Exp. on Rom. vii. 14. vol. iv.

1 John iii. 9. if it prove the perfection of any man, would prove, contrary to the most evident experience, the perfection of all believers: and whereas it is said the precepts of the Gospel require us to aim at perfection, it is replied, They may answer their end by exciting us to press after it, though in the present state it be not actually attained: and as for those who are said in Scripture to have been perfect, such as Noah and Job, it appears from the infirmities which attended their character, that the most which can be meant by it is, that they were not only sincere in religion, but had made eminent progress in it. On the whole, none can pretend to say that it is absolutely impossible for us to do our best, or that God now requires of us to do better than we possibly can in present circumstances; nor can we certainly say that no one has ever exerted the utmost of the capacities God has given him in any particular act of duty: but we find, in fact, those who seem the best of men generally most ready to acknowledge their own remaining imperfections; and the perfection that some have talked of, seems only to be a freedom from known, wilful, deliberate sin, which it is to be hoped many have attained for some considerable time, who yet lament numberless imperfections attending the best of their services. Christians would in general be better employed in seeking greater degrees of perfection, than in disputing in a subtle and abstruse manner the nicety of such questions as have sometimes been started upon this head. And we may add, that where the progress towards perfection is greatest, the remembrance of past sins, only pardoned by the free grace of God in Christ, and of our continued dependence upon the aids of God's Spirit for every step we take in our holy course, may be sufficient to keep us humble; and it is certain, that pride in our religious attainments, is one of the greatest of the imperfections to be found in good men. Compare Job ix. 20.

LECTURE CLXXXII.

The Spirit of God produces in the hearts of good men the hope of eternal life, which in various persons and circumstances prevails in various degrees. Some who are fully persuaded of the doctrine of perseverance, and have a clear evidence that they are true believers, grounded on extraordinary attainments in piety, or approved fidelity in some great and remarkable trials, may have an undoubted certainty of their own salvation: and it appears in fact that this is the case with many, if we may credit the living and dying testimony of some, on their own experience, who seem to have been among the best persons of their age. It is probable that, in times of difficulty and persecution, this persuasion may be more common than in persons of equal attainments in religion, in more peaceful circumstances; which may be one reason why it is sometimes spoken of by the apostles as so common a case in their days: vid. 1 John ii. 5; iii. 14, 19—21; v. 13. Heb. vi. 11; x. 34, 35. 2 Pet. i. 10. 1 Thess. i. 4. Rom. viii. 16, 17; and something like this may be traced in the writings of our first reformers. Where there is not such a full assurance, there may, nevertheless, be a cheerful and prevailing hope; and this even in those who do not apprehend the doctrine of perseverance to be universally true, since they may see that there is at least a degree of probability, that every particular saint, whose case may be under consideration, will in fact finally persevere, though the conclusion may be attended with some degree of uncertainty. How far full assurance is to be ascribed to the immediate testimony of the Spirit, is a question difficult to decide: it is allowed that God can, by an immediate impression, reveal such truths to the soul beyond all possibility of doubt, and cause us to apprehend it as his own voice speaking to us; but this is a thing, the idea and evidence of which can be communicated to none: it seems therefore improper to lay a stress upon it, as absolutely necessary to a well-grounded comfort and hope; though it is, on the other hand, great rashness, universally to deride all pretences of this kind, especially when coming from persons of wisdom and piety. That the generality of Christians are exercised with so many doubts about their own state, is generally to be ascribed to the imperfection of their attainments in religion, to their entertaining wrong notions of it, especially their laying too great a stress upon present frames, and regarding the lively exercise of the passions more than the steady determination of the will,—which is the only sure standard by which to judge.

Howe's W. vol. i. p. 342. Mason's Serm. vol. iv.

There are a great variety of different methods in which the work of religion is carried on in the hearts of believers, in order to their final perseverance, and their improvement in piety. Sometimes certain texts of Scripture occur with such power and efficacy to the mind, as at other times they have never had; and these Scriptures are not always applied in a sense most agreeable to the context, but frequently according to the most obvious sense of the words, considered as alone, and compared with some present occasion on which they are given; sometimes a strong persuasion arises in the mind of a Christian, as to the answer of some particular request, which takes off a heavy and almost overwhelming burthen which before lay upon his heart: and in a variety of other instances, consolation is sometimes so strongly poured in upon their minds, from principles before known, considered and believed, yet not attended with any such sensible effects, that all who believe the fact must acknowledge it an extraordinary phenomenon; and considering the great usefulness of such experiences for establishing Christians in the way of piety, it seems reasonable to suppose that these impressions may (frequently at least) be the extraordinary work of the Holy Spirit on their minds. It is observable, that these peculiar experiences are most frequent where persons' natural faculties are weak; or that if they are imparted to persons of higher genius and stronger reason, it is generally when under the pressure of some uncommon calamity, or when called out to any service which requires an extraordinary share of courage and resolution.

From considering these things, it appears that all, especially Christian ministers, should be cautious how they deride and expose such impressions as mere enthusiasm. If it be asked, How they can be distinguished from those which are indeed so, (as many warm impressions no doubt are,) it may be answered, That, in order to prevent any dangerous mistake here, the tendency of them is by all means to be regarded: it would be very dangerous to venture on any thing which in other circumstances would be evil, from the apprehension which some have entertained, that the common rules of morality are to be dispensed with, in consequence of such a supernatural impulse; for no impulse in such cases is to be believed, without stronger evidence than can commonly be given: but where they lead only to a more cheerful acquiescence in the Divine care, and a more zealous discharge of certain duties, they may safely be regarded as coming, whether in a more or less natural way, from God, unless any medium of argument be thus suggested, which is evidently absurd and ridiculous.

SCHOLIUM 8.

Besides these particular revelations, which seem intended only or chiefly for the use of the persons to whom they are made, some have thought that there may still continue in the church something of what was before called an inspiration of elevation, (Def. 75.) chiefly imparted to those who are to lead the devotions of public assemblies: but how far in any given instance uncommon enlargements are supernatural, it is impossible for us to discover, who know so little of the constitution of our own minds, and of the degree in which they may sometimes be influenced by something peculiar in the state of the brain and animal spirits; but as for those gifts and powers which attended the apostolic ages, Prop. 117. they seem to be so generally ceased, that none pretending to them ought to be believed, without the most clear and convincing proof.

LECTURE CLXXXIII.

PROPOSITION CXLI.

To inquire into the Scripture doctrine of the unpardonable sin.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. The Scripture declares, that there was, at least in the first ages of Christianity, a sin that should not be forgiven, Matt. xii. 31. Mark iii. 28, 29. compare 1 John v. 16. which has been interpreted by some as referring to the cure of diseases by prayer; but there seems to have been no note given by which a sin could be known to be to death in that sense: it seems therefore more rational to refer it to those cases upon which God had so expressly decided; and the refusing upon any occasion ever to pray for one who had committed it, might be a proper expedient to keep up a due horror of it, and care to stand at the greatest distance from it.

Harberry on Future Punish. p. 130.

2. This plainly appears to have been some sin of the tongue, by which a particular affront and injury was offered to the Holy Spirit, and therefore it is called, by way of eminence, the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. Waterl. Serm. vol. ii. p. 167.

3. It is plain that the occasion on which our Lord uttered the words referred to above, was the Pharisees ascribing those miracles to the Devil, which he wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost; and, undoubtedly, any who, under the ministry of the apostles, after the effusion of the Holy Ghost, on the day of Pentecost, had ascribed the miraculous operations of the Spirit in them to Satan, would have incurred an equal degree of guilt; but we cannot certainly say that this last was the only case in which it could be committed; and that what our Lord said, gr. 1. was only a caution addressed to the Pharisees, lest they should in time come to be guilty of it, though Dr. Whitby has advanced some considerable arguments to support this hypothesis, which deserve to be attentively weighed.

4. If any in these latter days manifest an obstinate enmity to the truth, so far as to contradict a degree of evidence, on the whole equal to that which those persons had, who, in the primitive ages, were said to have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, there is reason to believe that, the guilt being equal, it would be equally fatal and unpardonable; but how, in present circumstances, this can be, it is not easy to conceive.

Whit. 4th App. to Matt. c. xii. Howe's Works, vol. ii. p. 46. Tillot. Ser. vol. i. No. xvii. pass.

Many have defined this sin to be a malicious opposition to known truth, or, as others have expressed it, to truth as truth; but it may be doubted whether the human mind be capable of the latter, nor does the former enter into the account of this sin as given in Scripture; nor can we imagine that every wilful opposition to truth is absolutely unpardonable, since every known and deliberate sin seems to carry in it this guilt. 1 John i. 6. John iii. 20.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The reason why this sin is declared unpardonable, seems to be, that persons who commit it cut themselves off from the very possibility of being convinced by other arguments for the truth of Christianity, and can never be brought to conviction, without such a miraculous influence of God upon the soul, as in righteous judgment he sees fit universally to deny to all such.

Those celebrated texts, Heb. vi. 4—6; x. 29. refer to an apostasy from Christianity, and such an impious contempt of Christ and his Gospel, as one can hardly imagine any one in the primitive ages could be guilty of, who did not ascribe the miracles wrought in confirmation of it to some evil spirit; and this indeed seems intimated in the phrase of crucifying Christ afresh, and judging his blood an unholy thing, which they must surely do, who esteem him a magician, and consequently by the Jewish law worthy of death; and therefore these texts may perhaps be considered as referring to the same purpose with those in the proposition. Maur. in Loc.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is said, That, according to the account of the unpardonable sin given above, Paul must have committed it, who could not, with any consistency, have opposed the Christian cause, unless he believed the miracles wrought in confirmation of it to have been of an infernal original. To this it is answered,

1. That possibly, not being an eye-witness to any of them, (which we are not sure that he was,) he might make a shift, with a great deal of artifice and prejudice, to disbelieve the facts; or,

2. That if he believed they were miraculous, he might think (as Bishop Fleetwood plainly did) that miracles wrought in the cause of falsehood, might be wrought by God, and not the Devil, and might expect that, as in the case of the Egyptian magicians, God would at length visibly interpose to overbear them, and turn the balance on the contrary side; and that text (Deut. xiii. 3.) might be so interpreted by him as to favour this hypothesis; or possibly he might have recourse to some foolish hypothesis of the influence of the stars and power of imagination, a secret charm in the name of God, or the like, which we know some Jews have acquiesced in, when they could not dispute the facts of Christ's miracles. Vid. Prop. 99. gr. 8. This is something illustrated by the account which Josephus gives of Solomon's skill in dispossessing demons, and the traditional art which he left behind him;—of which we see below.

Fleetw. on Mir. p. 42; Works, p. 132. Jos. Antiq. book viii. c. ii. § 5.

Though perhaps this sin cannot be committed now, at least by any who continue to retain an external profession, yet it is of great importance that the strictest care be taken to keep at the remotest distance from all the appearances of it; and perhaps it was expressed the more obscurely in Scripture, on purpose to promote such a caution: but in dealing with those dejected souls who fear they have committed it, it is generally the safest way to assure them, that such a tender concern, lest they should have been guilty of it, implies such a reverence for Christ and the Gospel, and such remaining operations of the Spirit on their hearts, as plainly proves they have not.

Baxt. W. vol. ii. p. 30. Reas. of Relig. part i. c. 10.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Dr. Waterland seems to intimate a doubt, whether the sin in question be absolutely unpardonable, pleading that ἁβεύατον signifies only exceedingly difficult; and this, if granted, might afford another solution for the difficulty started in the fourth scholium; but it seems the texts in the first step are too determinate to admit of these softenings.

Waterl. Serm. vol. ii. No. ix. p. 177.

LECTURE CLXXXIV.

DEFINITION LXXXVIII.

Those are said to be PREDESTINATED TO LIFE, whom God did, from all eternity, intend actually to make partakers of the Gospel salvation in a future state; and those are said to be PREDESTINATED TO DEATH, whom God did from all eternity purpose finally to condemn.

COROLLARY.

It follows from this definition, that if (as many grant) an event may be allowed contingent, though it will certainly in fact happen, divine predestination, as stated above, does not imply the necessary salvation or condemnation of any.

SCHOLIUM.

It may perhaps be questioned, Whether this be the Scriptural sense of the word?—but considering that the ruin of sinners is in Scripture charged not upon the necessitating act of God, but the abuse of their own liberty, (vid. Prop. 149. Schol. 4.) it is necessary, in order to make Scripture consistent with itself, as we shall afterwards see, to suppose that this is the precise sense in which the word is to be taken.

PROPOSITION CXLII.

All those who do finally partake of eternal life by the Gospel, were from all eternity predestinated unto it.

DEMONSTRATION

Prop. 35. 1. God from all eternity did foreknow all events, and consequently the salvation of every particular person who is, or shall be, finally saved.

1. 2. God from all eternity willed the salvation of those who are finally saved, in the circumstances in which he saw they would then be; for it is by his act they must be made finally happy; and whatever determines him to will their happiness in the moment when it is accomplished, must, on the same principles, have determined his volitions, upon a full view of the case, even from all eternity.

1, 2. 3. The light of nature assures us, That all those who are finally happy were predestinated by God to eternal life.

4. The Scripture frequently asserts the doctrine laid down in the proposition. Vid. Matt. xxv. 34. Rom. viii. 29, 30. Eph. i. 3—6, 11. 2 Tim. i. 9. 2 Thess. ii. 13. 1 Pet. i. 1, 2. John vi. 37; xvii. 2, 9, 10, 24. Rev. xiii. 8. compared with xvii. 8.

3, 4. 5. Valet propositio.

Burn. on Art. xvii. What. in Loc. Cit. Saur. Ser. vol. i. p. 202. King on Predest. § 33.

COROLLARY 1.

It evidently appears from hence, that they who represent the election and predestination spoken of in Scripture, as relative only to nations, and not to particular persons, are greatly mistaken: several of these Scriptures lie directly against such a notion, particularly those in the Epistle to Timothy and the Revelations; and whatever arguments could be brought to prove that God had a respect to nations as such, or indeed that he, before the foundation of the world, foresaw any thing concerning the idolatrous Gentiles under that character, would certainly prove, on the like principles, a regard to particular persons, since we cannot suppose the views of God to be merely general and indeterminate.*

COROLLARY 2.

If the reasoning of Prop. 139 and 140. relating to the special influences of divine grace, and to the perseverance of the saints, be admitted, it will follow, on the same principles with those in the proposition, that all those who are predestinated to life,

* In support of the different side of the question, reference may be made to Locke, Taylor, Hutchinson, Le Clerc, and divers other commentators. One of the most elaborate performances on the Calvinistical doctrine of Predestination, both upon principles of reason and Christian principles, is Mr. Jonathan Edwards's Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will, and his History of the Work of Redemption. Mr. Topladdy, in his Doctrines of absolute Predestination, stated and asserted, in his Letter to John Wesley, in his More Work for Mr. John Wesley, and in his Scheme of Calvinism and Philosophical Necessity, maintains the same sentiments which are contained in the late Mr. Edwards. Sir Roger Hill, in his Review of Mr. Wesley's Doctrines, in the Lord's Watchman, and in his Strictures on Mr. Fletcher, is another Defender of Calvinism. Mr. Wesley, in his Predestination calmly considered, and in other pieces, has written with considerable Acuteness in favour of Arminian tenets. Dean Tucker is the same with his great friend and advocate Mr. Fletcher, in his Checkers Act I. and in his several other Tracts and pieces. Those published by Dr. Taylor, written with a view and purpose, which does not affect A Review of the principal Doctrines of Calvinism, compared, Farther Remarks on the several Points and Controversies, Doctrine, and some Observations on the Use of Reason in Religion, on Human Nature, and on Free Agency. See also Dr. Taylor's Six Dissertations, No. i. ii.

are also predestinated to receive special grace, and to persevere in a holy course; and, on the other hand, that all those who are predestinated to holiness, are also predestinated to perseverance and life.

COROLLARY.

Hence it will further appear, that the reason of God's predestinating some to everlasting life, was not fetched from a foresight of their faith and obedience, considered as independent upon any communication of grace from him; but that it is to be referred into his sovereign mercy and free grace; which is also the language of many other Scriptures. Tit. iii. 4, 5. Eph. ii. 8, 9.

COROLLARY 4.

It further appears, that if any represent divine predestination as a determination to save such and such persons, let their temper, character, and behaviour be what it will,—and, on the other hand, assert a corresponding purpose of making such and such finally miserable, without any regard at all to their temper and behaviour, they greatly misrepresent the Scripture doctrine on this head; but this is by no means the Calvinistical scheme, which always teaches that the means are decreed as well as the end, and that God purposes to save none but such as by his grace he shall prepare for salvation by sanctification; and it is very remarkable, that though this doctrine of predestination is expressly asserted and often referred to in Scripture, (which shows that the apostles esteemed it of considerable importance,) yet the process of the final judgment is described as turning, not upon the secret decrees of God, but upon the actions and characters of men.

SCHOLIUM 1.

On the same principles, those who finally perish, may be said to have been predestinated to death. Compare Prov. xvi. 4. John x. 26. Rom. ix. 17. 1 Pet. ii. 8. Jude 4. On the whole, comparing one part of Scripture with the other, there seems to be this remarkable difference between the predestination to life and to death: that, in the former case, God determines by the influence of his grace to work such a change in the hearts of his elect, as that their salvation should, on the whole, be ascribed to him, and not unto themselves; whereas he determines to bring others into such circumstances, that, though their ruin should in fact happen, yet they themselves should be the authors of it, and the blame lie as entirely upon themselves as if it had not been so much as foreknown. Vid. Rom. ix. 22, 23. Matt. xxv. 34, 41.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The Remonstrants generally believed that God's electing some to everlasting life, was only a purpose of making believers finally happy, and of giving all to whom the Gospel became sufficient means of faith; and that predestination to death was only a purpose of making unbelievers finally miserable; that God did not purpose the happiness of one more than another, and that neither of these predestinations could properly be said to be personal, wherein their notion evidently differed from that stated above. It is indeed answered, That this predestination of all believers in general, implies a predestination of every particular believer, on condition of his faith; and on the principles of the proposition and scholium, it may be allowed, that none are chosen but on this condition, provided we further add, that every particular person who does believe was chosen freely by divine grace to receive those assistances which God saw would in fact prevail to bring him to faith, and so by consequence to salvation.

Limb. Theol. lib. iv. c. i. § 3.

The chief objection against this doctrine is, That it tends to make those who believe themselves predestinated to live careless, and to make others desperate. It is replied, That as those only are in Scripture said to be predestinated to life who are also chosen to be saints, there can be no reason for any who do not find a prevailing principle of holiness in their hearts, to conclude they are in that number: and, on the whole, this objection nearly coincides with that against perseverance more largely considered, Prop. 140. § 1. gr. 5. and if persons will venture to argue themselves into negligence in matters of everlasting importance, from principles, on which (though they are equally applicable to them) they will not neglect their lives or their secular business, it is perverseness, for which they are justly responsible before God. As to the second part of the objection, If it be granted that sufficient assistances are given to all, none will have reason to despair, nor will any have an excuse to plead before God, in consequence of his secret purposes, which will not be made a rule of his final judgment. If it be said, that nevertheless those who are not predestinated to life are left under a necessity of perishing, and an impossibility of salvation,—it must be owned, that it is difficult to say how the doctrine, as explained by some, can be freed from this objection; but this consequence does not necessarily follow from it, as we have stated it above.

Berry-st Lec. vol. i. p. 241. Watts's Ruin and Recov. p. 278.

The Supralapsarian and Sublapsarian schemes agree in asserting the doctrine of predestination, but with this difference, that the former supposes that God intended to glorify his justice in the condemnation of some, as well as his mercy in the salvation of others; and for that purpose decreed that Adam should necessarily fall, and by that fall bring himself and all his offspring into a state of everlasting condemnation. The latter scheme supposes, that the decree of predestination regards man as fallen, by an abuse of that freedom which Adam had, into a state, in which all were to be left to necessary and unavoidable ruin, who were not exempted from it by predestination. The chief difficulties which may be urged against the former, do likewise attend the latter; but the scheme stated in the proposition does properly agree with neither. Le Blanc's Theses, p. 132.

LECTURE CLXXXV.

DEFINITION LXXXIX.

The mutual stipulation between Christ and the Father, relating to the redemption of sinners by him, previously to any act upon Christ's part, under the character of Mediator, has generally been called by divines the COVENANT OF REDEMPTION.*

SCHOLIUM.

That there was such a covenant, either tacit or express, we may assuredly conclude, considering the importance of the work undertaken by Christ, and the expensive rate at which it was to be accomplished: and the Scriptures afterwards to be produced, relating to the particulars of this covenant, will consequently prove the existence of it in the general: as indeed all those prophecies which relate to what was to be done by the Messiah, on the one hand, and what benefits and rewards were to be conferred upon him and his people, on the other, may properly be considered as intimations of such a covenant, supposing (what has been already proved) the existence of Christ as a distinct person from the Father, in the philosophical sense of the word, and his interposition in the suggestion and promulgation of those prophecies. 1 Pet. i. 11. Compare John xvii. 1—5, 14; vi. 37. Tit. i. 2. 2 Tim. i. 9. Rev. xiii. 8. Psal. LXXXIX. 19, &c.

PROPOSITION CXLIII.

To inquire into the tenor of the Covenant of Redemption.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. By this covenant, Christ undertook to become incarnate, to dwell a certain time upon earth, subject not only to the law of human nature, but likewise to that of the Jewish dispensation; directing the whole of his conduct, while he should continue here, in such a manner as most effectually to promote the honour of his Father and the salvation of his people: that at length he would voluntarily deliver himself to sufferings and death, and remain for a time in the grave; and also, that after his resurrection and ascension into Heaven, he would employ his renewed life and extensive authority in the mediatorial kingdom to the same great purposes, which engaged him to become incarnate. See Psal. xl. 6—9. Heb. x. 5—10. Isa. lxi. 1—3. Luke iv. 18, &c. Isa. l. 7, 6. Pearce on Heb. x. 5.

2. God the Father, on the other hand, stipulated that he would, by his miraculous power, produce Christ's human body in the womb of the virgin; that he would strengthen him by the gifts and graces of his Holy Spirit for the extraordinary work before him; that he would raise him from the dead, and set him at his right hand, giving him a universal command over the whole created world, as the judge of which he should at length appear; in the mean time, that he would send forth the influences of his Spirit to confirm his doctrine, so that hereby it should be established even among the Gentile nations; and that, besides all the advantages which others might receive, they who were predestinated to life, and were in a peculiar manner given to him, should in fact be regenerated by divine grace, and strengthened even to the end, and after death should be made completely happy in their whole persons in his heavenly kingdom for ever. See (besides the Scriptures quoted, Def. 89. Schol.) Isa. vii. 14; xi. 2, &c.; lii. 13—15; liii. 10—12; lv. 4, 5; xlix. 1—12. compared with Luke ii. 32. 2 Cor. vi. 2. and Rev. vii. 16, 17. Psal. ii. 7—9; cx. 1. Mich. v. 4. Luke xxii. 29. John v. 22—29. Heb. xii. 2. Berry-st. Lec. vol. i. p. 232.

COROLLARY.

As we before observed, Def. 89. Schol. that the reality of this covenant would follow from the distinct personal existence of Christ, and his interposition in the prophecies, so, on the other hand, from those Scriptures here enumerated, which more directly prove that covenant, we may draw another argument for the pre-existence of Christ, as a distinct philosophical person from the Father, distinct from and independent upon those arguments urged Prop. 126. Burn. on Redemp p. 25.

This may seem a proper place to inquire into the extent of redemption, or that celebrated question, For whom Christ died; but all that is important on that head has been said under the preceding propositions, Prop. 139. 140. 142. If those relating to predestination and special grace be allowed, as also those concerning the divine prescience and decrees in general, then it evidently follows, there was a sense, in which Christ might be said to die for all, as all men partake of some benefit by his death, and such provision is made for their salvation as lays the blame of their ruin, if they miscarry, entirely upon themselves; but it was in a very peculiar and much nobler sense that he died for the elect, intending evidently to secure for them, and only for them, the everlasting blessings of his Gospel; and it seems that the Scripture uses such a latitude and variety in the sense of the phrase, otherwise it will be very difficult to make one part of it agree with another. Comp. on the one hand, the texts quoted Prop. 136. Cor. 3. and on the other, John x. 15, 16, 26; xvii. 2, 9, 16.

* The Hutchinsonian divines must needs mention the covenant of redemption, as entered into by the three persons of the Trinity. See these divines in general, and particularly Duncan Forbes's Thoughts concerning Religion, the Abstract of Hutchinson's Works, and Calasio's Concordance, by Romaine.

It is objected, That if Christ did in any sense die for all, then forasmuch as all are not saved, the purposes of Christ's death are in many, and probably in most, instances frustrated.

Ans. Were we to say that the only end of Christ's death was, that all men might actually obtain eternal life, the objection might be just; but it may be said, the purposes of Christ's death are various, and the ultimate end of it was to glorify God in the actual salvation of all believers, and the giving others such advantages as should silence them, and justify God in their condemnation and punishment, for wilfully rejecting his mercy. It plainly appears, in fact, that this matter can be carried no further; for the hypothesis of the actual salvation of all at last, is so contrary to Scripture, as to be entirely insupportable, as we shall show in the progress of this Work (vid. Prop. 163. Schol. 3.); and, indeed, the granting this great absurdity would not thoroughly relieve us from the difficulty here mentioned; for the coming of Christ into our world is represented as in prosecution of a design, to prevent the condemnation of men, not to rescue and to recover them from the final sentence of the judgment-day. 1 Thess. i. 10. John iii. 16—18; v. 24.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is urged, That instead of magnifying, it rather asperses, the Divine goodness, to say, that he appointed Christ to bring those into a salvable state whom he certainly knew would never be saved; since this, instead of being any favour to them, lays a foundation for tormenting reflections at last. It is answered, That on these principles it is unkindness in God to bestow any advantages of genius or circumstances, which he knew men would, through their own wilful folly, abuse to their detriment; but God is to be considered as dealing with rational creatures in a way suitable to their rational nature; and if they will turn the gifts of his providence or grace to their own disadvantage, they only are responsible for it; nor will they find either their refuge or comfort in an ungrateful denial of the reality or importance of the mercies they abuse.

Baxter's End of Controv. c. xi. xii. § 5.

There is perhaps a reference to this covenant of redemption in Heb. vii. 22. and Christ is commonly said to have been the surety of the elect, as he undertook for them that they should, through the influences of divine grace, be in fact brought to faith and salvation (compare 2 Cor. i. 20.); hence some have inferred that they were actually justified from eternity, and consequently are in a justified state, even while they are going on in a course of unrepented sin; but this seems most directly contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture; and it is certain that, on the same principles on which they may be said to be justified, they may also be said to be glorified from eternity. If the expression be intended to signify no more, than that God purposed to justify them, it is not denied; but it is a most improper way of speaking, and the arguments drawn from thence in favour of any kind of licentiousness are utterly inconclusive.

Will. Gosp. Tr. c. i; Works, vol. iii.*

SCHOLIUM 5.

Some have thought that the whole human race would have been destroyed by the death of Adam, immediately on his first transgression, if God had not purposed, by Christ, to bring them into such a state as should make necessary provision for their deliverance from those evils to which they were subjected by his sin. Rom. v. 12—21.

LECTURE CLXXXVI.

PROPOSITION CXLIV.

To lay down the Scripture doctrine relating to the intercession of Christ.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Christ is expressly said in many places of Scripture to intercede; i. e. to plead with God in favour of his people. Rom. viii. 34. Heb. vii. 25. 1 John ii. 1.

2. The appearance of the high priest among the Jews, in the presence of God, on the day of atonement, when he presented before him the blood of the sin-offering, is at large referred to by St. Paul, as illustrating the intercession of Christ. Heb. ix. 11—14, 22—26; x. 19—21.

3. The appearance of Christ in his Father's presence, in that body wherein he suffered on the cross, though with such alterations as are suited to the heavenly state, may be considered as a virtual intercession, as the appearance of the high priest on the day of atonement, referred to above, seems to have been; for we find no form of words prescribed on this occasion, as there are upon some others, where they might seem less necessary, considering the manner in which the mind would be overawed in circumstances of such unparalleled solemnity. Vid. Lev. xvi. pass.

* Recent divines, who have gone to the height of supralapsarian Calvinism, as Mr. Brine and Dr. Gill

4. Nevertheless, it does not seem proper to take upon us positively to assert, That our Lord does never verbally intercede for his people; that being a point which Scripture does not appear to have absolutely determined either way.

5. However it be that our Lord expresses his fixed and determined desire and demand in favour of his people, we may assure ourselves, that, on the one hand, it is in a manner consistent with that dignity and authority to which he is now advanced; and, on the other, that it is always successful for the vindication and preservation of his people, and the acceptance of their services, (compare Zech. iii. 1, 2. Rom. viii. 33, 34. Rev. viii. 3, 4.) with reference to which, he is described as an advocate or patron of his own people, continually residing in the court of Heaven.

Bp. Hopk. Ser. p. 523. Christ the Med. p. 73. Scott's Chris. Life, vol. iii. p. 757.

COROLLARY 1.

It must be the duty of Christians to maintain frequent regards to the intercession of Christ in their addresses to God, and to comfort themselves with the thoughts of such a guardian and advocate, in the midst of those dangers to which they are here exposed. Lard. Serm. vol. ii. p. 287.

COROLLARY 2.

The consideration of Christ's intercession is an engagement to serious humility, faith, and fervour in prayer, peculiar to the Christian dispensation.

Law of Chris. Perfect. p. 257.

SCHOLIUM 1.

If there be any thing verbal in the intercession of Christ, there is no reason to believe that he is actually speaking to God at all times without intermission, which would be inconsistent with other things which the Scripture tells us, relating to that state of majesty and authority in which he appears. There is a sufficient foundation for saying, as the apostle does, that he makes continual intercession for us, if, perhaps, at some stated seasons of peculiar solemnity, some express declaration be made, of his habitual desire, that his people may receive the benefits purchased by his death, and of his readiness to appear under the character of their mediator and advocate, in any particular instances, as occasion may require; or even if his appearance in the body in which he suffered be intended as such a virtual declaration, though words should never be used. Compare Luke ii. 37. 1 Thess. i. 2, 3; ii. 13. v. 17. Exod. xxix. 40, 42. 2 Sam. ix. 7. Job i. 5.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It may be questioned, what end the intercession of Christ can answer. It cannot be intended to remind the Divine Being of any thing which he would otherwise forget, nor to persuade him to any thing which he is not disposed to do; but it may serve to illustrate the majesty and holiness of the Father, and the wisdom and grace of the Son; not to say that it may have other unknown uses with respect to the inhabitants of the invisible world: it is certainly a great comfort and encouragement to believers under their many infirmities; and indeed it is impossible to enter into the beauty of the Gospel scheme in general, without observing how it is accommodated to the nature and circumstances of fallen imperfect creatures.

Berry-st. Lect. vol. i. p. 391.

LECTURE CLXXXVII.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It has been urged as an objection against the Christian scheme in general, that it appoints our worshipping God through a mediator; which (say some) derogates from the divine goodness, leads us into a neglect of God, is a sort of indecency, when we consider that we are always in his presence, and may lay a foundation for many superstitions, as it is said in fact to have done in the Roman church.

To this it is replied,

1. That the goodness of God is most eminently displayed in that constitution by which his guilty creatures may be most effectually imboldened in their addresses to him, and yet at the same time reminded in every approach of their own sinfulness and unworthiness, and of the displeasure of God which is consequent upon it; which ends seem to be excellently answered by appointing his Son to be the Mediator of our approaches.

2. The Christian scheme directs us not to terminate our regards in the Mediator; but to address our petitions to God through him; and every where represents it as his office to bring us to God.

3. It is so far from being an indecency to approach a sovereign by the person he appoints to introduce us to him, that if such an appointment be made, (for which in some cases there may be an apparent reason,) it would be a great indecency to come directly and immediately to him.

4. The propensity of mankind to make use of mediators of their own choosing and inventing, which appeared among the Heathens, and still appears in the church of Rome, plainly shows how well the notion of a mediator is suited to the common apprehension of mankind; and it seems that no wiser provision could be made, to prevent their multiplying such mediators, than appointing one such illustrious person as the Scripture exhibits under this character, who consequently would be wronged by such a supposed multiplication.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is to be remembered, in all the Christian doctrine relating both to the atonement and intercession of Christ, that we are to consider him as a person graciously appointed by God to this purpose; which, if it be duly attended to, will prevent the apprehension, as if God were the less gracious, or our obligations to the Father at all diminished, by those we are under to the Son. 1 Cor. i. 30. 2 Cor. v. 18. Eph. i. 3—6, 9, 11, 12. 1 Pet. i. 2—5. Heb. v. 4, 5.

Bourn's Ser. vol. ii. p. 175.

SCHOLIUM 5.

The priestly office of Christ has generally been explained as executed in his offering himself as a sacrifice to God for us, and interceding with God upon this sacrifice; but Mr. Peirce, and most of the Socinians, suppose it only to consist in the latter; and Mr. Peirce argues from Heb. viii. 4. That the execution of it began upon Christ's entering into Heaven; but the text in question only proves that Christ, being of the tribe of Judah, could not, according to the Mosaic law, be a priest to minister in the Jewish temple, which none can reasonably maintain that he was. Compare Heb. vii. 14. Nevertheless, as the apostle often assures us that he is a priest of a higher order, all that he has done and suffered to make atonement for the sins of men, may, according to the most common acceptation of the word, be called a series of sacerdotal actions; as it is certain there were many acts of atonement performed by Mosaic priests, besides that which passed on the great days of atonement; and sacrifices were sometimes offered with acceptance by those who were not regularly priests. Compare Judges vi. 25, 26; xiii. 16. 1 Kings xviii. 33, 38.

Emlyn's Serm. p. 326.

Some have thought the comparative smallness and meanness of this earth of ours, as it appears upon the justest principles of astronomy, to be something inconsistent with the system of doctrines laid down in several preceding propositions, in which so great a person is represented as dying and suffering so much to promote our happiness. But it may be answered,

1. That we know not what influence the history of our redemption by the death of the Son of God, and salvation by his continued care, may have throughout all eternity upon the rest of God's rational creation, to whom it may be made known. Compare Eph. iii. 10. 1 Pet. i. 12. The monuments of God's displeasure against sin and compassion to sinners, will no doubt for ever remain; and perhaps the happiness of all the redeemed from among men may bear a very small proportion to the whole sum of happiness arising to other beings, from the knowledge and remembrance of it. Compare Rev. v. 11—14.

2. That if we consider, as we shall afterwards endeavour to show, that the appearance of God's own Son in the flesh is a glorious victory which he has obtained over the Prince of Darkness, the meanness of those creatures, who are made finally triumphant through Christ, as the great Captain of salvation, may render the power and grace of God in him more illustrious than it could have been, had the creatures so redeemed and delivered been originally of a nobler order, and fixed in a more considerable state and abode.

3. That if (as may hereafter be shown) the angelic order of beings are by this means confirmed in a state of indefectible happiness, and incorporated with the glorified saints in one holy and triumphant society, (Eph. i. 10; iii. 15. Heb. xii. 22—24.) it is an important circumstance added to both the former to obviate the objection, and seems to have proceeded on the same principles which determined God to choose that the Redeemer should appear in the form of a poor and destitute infant, and that of a mean man, rather than of some mighty prince, while here upon earth.

PART IX.

SURVEY OF THE DUTIES THE GOSPEL REQUIRES, AND ITS POSITIVE INSTITUTIONS; WHEREIN THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH, SACRAMENTS, AND THE CONSTITUTION OF THE CHURCH, ARE CONSIDERED.

LECTURE CLXXXVIII.

DEFINITION XC.

THE covenant which is made between God and those who believe the Gospel, whereby they declare their subjection to him, and he declares his acceptance of them and favour to them, is commonly called by divines the COVENANT OF GRACE.

DEFINITION XCI.

Any covenant, whereby God requires perfect obedience from his creatures, in such a manner as to make no express provision for the pardon of offences to be committed against the precepts of it, on the repentance of such supposed offenders, but pronounces a sentence of death upon them, may be called A COVENANT OF WORKS, whatever the particular duties required by it may be.

COROLLARY 1.

The covenant made with Adam, as described above, Prop. 134. Cor. was a covenant of works.

COROLLARY 2.

What was peculiar to the covenant made with Israel at mount Sinai, seems to have been at least in a great measure a covenant of works; for though it made some provision for purification from ceremonial pollutions, and for the pardon of the offender; i. e. for his restoration to the privileges of the Jewish republic, upon his offering the appointed sacrifices for sins of ignorance and inadvertency,—yet it pronounced sentence of death on all that presumptuously offended, appointing no sacrifice at all for such, but declaring the curse of God to be upon all that continued not in all things which were written in the book of the law to do them. Numb. xv. 30, 31. Deut. xxvii. 26. Gal. iii. 10—12. Rom. x. 5.

PROPOSITION CXLV.

To inquire into the constitution of the covenant of grace, or the mutual stipulations of it.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. God promises to believers the full pardon of all their past sins, how great and aggravated soever they may have been; the influences of his Spirit, whereby they may be enabled to resist temptations, to discharge the duties of life, and to persevere in their Christian course to the end of it. He also engages to dispose all the affairs of life for them in the most gracious manner, and at death to receive their departed spirits to a state of happiness, till at last their bodies be raised, and their whole persons made completely and eternally blessed. Heb. viii. 10—12. Jer. xxxii. 38—40. Ezek. xxxvi. 25—27. Rom. viii. 28. Psal. lxxiii. 24. Rev. xiv. 13. Tit. i. 2. John vi. 40.

2. They, on the other hand, engage that, by the assistance of his grace, they will make it their care and endeavour to render sincere and universal obedience to all the discoveries and intimations of the will of God, with regard to their duty to God, to the Redeemer, to their fellow-creatures, or to themselves, not making a reserve in favour of any sin whatsoever; and they engage to make this their main care, even to the end of their lives; and that they will openly maintain their Christian profession, whatever circumstances of danger or difficulty may arise, and how expensive soever such a series of faithful services may prove; on the whole, depending for their acceptance with God, not upon the merit of their own complete obedience, but on the riches of his free grace manifested in and by Christ. Rom. vi. 13; xii. 1. Heb. xii. 9. Tit. ii. 11—14. Matt. x. 32, 39; xvi. 24—26. Luke xvii. 9, 10. Gal. v. 4, 5. The demonstration of most of these particulars may be found in the preceding propositions, or will be more particularly exhibited in those that follow; and the whole tenor of Scripture does so plainly run this way, as to render it less necessary to attempt a full enumeration of all the passages, which may be brought to illustrate what has been asserted.

COROLLARY.

They misrepresent the nature of this covenant who consider it merely under the notion of an absolute promise on God's part, which indeed can, properly speaking, be no covenant at all, (compare Dut. 15.) and who represent all that we have to do as consisting in casting ourselves upon that promise, and passively leaving ourselves to God, to do what he pleases with us, in subserviency to his own gracious purpose concerning us. Compare

Bostock on Cov. Rams. Princ. vol. i. p. 307.

Doddr. Rise and Prog. c. xvii. p. 161.

SCHOLIUM 1.

There have been various dispensations of this covenant to the people of God in different ages of the church. Obscure intimations were given to the patriarchs, and to Israel by Moses and the prophets, as was shown above; and it seems to have been gradually opened, till at length it was fully revealed to the apostles after the effusion of the Spirit upon them, and was probably the word of wisdom in their mouths. Vid. Prop. 117. § 1. gr. 1. Perhaps the gradual openings of it are nowhere better represented than in Watts's Harm. of Div. Disp. Watson's Theol. Tracts, vol. i. p. 8.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It has been debated, whether the covenant made with Abraham, of which circumcision was the appointed token, were that covenant of grace, or merely a temporal covenant, relating to the land of Canaan, and other secular blessings to be conferred upon his seed. It seems most reasonable to conclude that it comprehended spiritual blessings,

1. Because otherwise there would not have been a proper foundation for God's calling himself their God, which must import being their friend with regard to their highest and most important interests. Matt. xxii. 32. Heb. xi. 16.

2. The apostle seems expressly to have decided this question, both when he calls circumcision a seal of the righteousness of faith, Rom. iv. 11. (i. e. the token of Abraham's being accepted with God as righteous, upon his believing;) and also, when he declares that believers are the children of Abraham, as heirs of the blessings promised to him. Rom. iv. 11—17. Gal. iii. 6—9, 14—17, 29. Compare Gen. xvii. 4—12. which contains the greatest and most excellent promises any where made to Abraham and his seed, and consequently must include spiritual blessings, if such blessings are any where included, as we have shown they are.*

Wits. Econ. Fœd. l. iv. c. iii. § 10—23.

SCHOLIUM 3.

We readily allow that there were temporal promises made to Abraham, of the multiplication of his seed, of an inheritance in the land of Canaan, and the deliverance of his descendants from the Egyptian bondage; and some of those promises were undoubtedly sealed to them by circumcision, on condition that they submitted to the particular statute law given by God to the Jewish nation: but it seems reasonable to suppose that circumcision, considering the view in which it was originally instituted, did likewise import that the infants circumcised should be considered, not as under a covenant of works, but that, on their believing, as their father Abraham did, they should also be entitled to those spiritual blessings which he by faith received; as the seeming rigour of the Sinai covenant might be intended to awaken their minds to search for those intimations of Gospel grace which were given; (though with such degrees of obscurity as suited the gradual openings of the grand scheme;) and to endear to them any such discoveries, when they were convinced of the necessity of seeking justification and life in that way of humble faith in which Abraham their father found it; and in this view they are likewise a lesson to all Christians. Rom. iv. and Gal. iii. 24, 25. Rom. v. 20, 21. And the awful solemnity with which the Mosaic law was promulgated from Mount Sinai, might not a little subserve this great purpose. Heb. xii. 18—29.

LECTURE CLXXXIX.

PROPOSITION CXLVI.

To inquire into the principal heads of Christian duty, as they are laid down in Scripture.

LEMMA

We do not intend a large enumeration of Scriptures on each head, by which it might easily be shown that all the most considerable particulars mentioned above in our ethical lectures, as branches of the law of nature, are recommended in the Old and New Testament: we shall here content ourselves with a general survey; only hinting that it might not be an unprofitable employment to add such texts of Scripture in their proper places to this lecture; to which purpose the collection in Dr. Gastrel and Dr. Wright may be very serviceable.

Wright on Virtue, &c.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. With regard to God, we are evidently required to love him above all, to consecrate ourselves entirely to his service, to submit in all things to his will, and to imitate his universal holiness; which must necessarily imply all those branches of divine virtue, mentioned Prop. 1. Matt. xxii. 37. Rom. vi. 11; xii. 1. Heb. xii. 9—11. Matt. v. 48. Eph. v. 1.

2. With regard to the Lord Jesus Christ, we are required not only to receive him by such a faith as has been before described, but to maintain such habitual regards to him, (as our instructor, atonement, intercessor, governor, guardian, strength, example, and forerunner,) as are correspondent to those relations in which he is represented as standing to us in the Scriptures, urged under preceding propositions; to which may be added, John x. 27

Phil. iii. 3. Gal. ii. 20. 1 Pet. i. 8. Heb. xii. 2. 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Eph. vi. ult.

3. As to the Holy Spirit, we are required to pray for it; to endeavour at all times to behave ourselves in such a manner as that we may not offend it, and forfeit his influences; but, on the contrary, may engage a fuller communication of them. Luke xi. 13. 1 Thess. v. 19. Eph. iv. 30; v. 18. Gal. v. 25.

4. Towards each other, we are required not only carefully to maintain a harmless and inoffensive conduct, but to take all opportunities of doing good to the bodies and souls of our fellow-creatures; and as a foundation of all friendly offices towards them, to love our neighbour as ourselves, and to do to others as we would they should do to us, and this universally to all our fellow-creatures, not excepting even the worst of our enemies. Phil. ii. 4. Gal. vi. 2, 10. Matt. xxii. 39; vii. 12; v. 43—48. Rom. xiii. 8—10. Col. iii. 12—14. Eph. v. 2. Rom. xii. ult.

5. With regard to ourselves, we are required to mortify our corporeal appetites, and so to regulate our passions, that we may not be transported into any degree of intemperance, unchastity, rash anger, excessive grief, or any other disorder of mind; but may keep ourselves in such a posture as to be always fit for the service of God in the duties of our respective stations and callings, in which we are to employ ourselves therefore with diligence and vigour, always maintaining a humble opinion of our own abilities and improvements, arrogating nothing to ourselves of merit before God, nor seeking among men our own applause and honour, dominions, or possessions, but willingly giving place to others, and in honour esteeming them better than ourselves: and as such great prospects are opened upon us in another life, we are cautioned against being excessively attached to the things of the present world, and urged to set our affections on those of a better. Eph. v. 8. Col. iii. 5, 6. Rom. xiii. 11—14. Matt. v. 27—30. Luke xii. 35. Rom xii. 11. Matt. xviii. 3, 4. Phil. ii. 3, &c. John xiii. 14. Luke xvii. 10. Matt. vi. 19, 20. Col. iii. 1, 2.

COROLLARY.

Such an evident agreement between the moral part of Christianity and the law of nature, as deduced in the preceding parts of this work, is a great confirmation of the divine original of the Gospel, especially when compared with its external evidence: and makes it apparent that neither such men nor angels would have published such a system of morality, in connexion with a fraud, most contrary to many of its fundamental branches.

Doddridge's 10 Sermons, p. 215, &c.

SCHOLIUM 1.

As image worship was expressly forbidden to the Jews, in numberless passages of their law and prophets, so it was charged as an immorality upon the Gentiles, Jer. x. 2, 3, &c. Acts xvii. 29. Rom. i. 21—25. 1 John v. 21.

Meade's Posth. Works, vol. ii. p. 181

Many have inferred from Matt. v. 33, 34. and James v. 12. that oaths are in all cases forbidden to Christians; but it is evident this prohibition can only refer to swearing in common conversation.

1. Because otherwise Christ must have charged all swearing as an immorality in its own nature; for he says, Whatsoever is more than this, comes of evil: now as swearing was in some cases expressly required by the Mosaic law, (vid. Lev. v. 1. Numb. xxx. 2. Exod. xxii. 11.) we cannot imagine that Christ would have condemned it universally in such terms as these.

2. Because Christ answered when interrogated upon oath. Matt. xxvi. 63, 64. Mark xiv. 61.

3. Because St. Paul, who must no doubt be instructed in the will of Christ, does in several of his writings make use of expressions equivalent to an oath, at least much more than yea and nay. Rom. i. 9. 1 Cor. xv. 31. 2 Cor. i. 18, 23. Gal. i. 20. Phil. i. 8. 1 Thess. ii. 5.

4. Because the lawfulness of oaths on great and important occasions seems to be granted. Heb. vi. 13—17. Compare Rev. x. 5, 6. Deut. xxxii. 40.

5. There are other passages in Christ's sermon on the mountain, which, in order to make a rational and consistent sense, must be interpreted in as great a latitude as we here suppose in that passage on which the argument against swearing is built. Matt. v. 39—42. Compare 1 Tim. v. 8.

It is debated whether those sorts of falsehoods, which are called officious lies, i. e. such as seem in their immediate consequence to tend to the advantage rather than the detriment of mankind, be forbidden in Scripture. To prove them unlawful, the following places are urged: Col. iii. 9. Eph. iv. 25. Rev. xxi. 8. Rom. iii. 7, 8. On the other hand, it is urged that some instances of such falsehood are mentioned in Scripture with approbation rather than blame. Exod. i. 19, 20. Josh. ii. 5. compared with Heb. xi. 31. Judges iv. 18, &c. compared with v. 24—26. 2 Kings vi. 19. But it may be answered, That where there does evidently appear to have been a falsehood in the preceding cases, (which perhaps in the last there was not,) it is by no means plain that the falsehood was approved by God, though the faith with which it was mixed, and which was the leading principle in the main series of action referred to, be applauded. That in some instances, persons are allowed not to have been bound by their oaths, is readily confessed; i. e. where the things which they swear to do were in themselves unlawful, or when the oath was taken by those who were not regularly in this respect sui juris, or where the oath was made on a false supposition, occasioned by the fraud of those who expected to receive advantage from it. 1 Sam. xxv. 22, 23. LECTURE CXC.

Divorce, except in cases of adultery, appears to be so expressly forbidden by Christ, Matt. v. 32. xix. 3—9. (compare 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11.) that it is strange it should ever have been disputed among Christians. To say, as some have done, that πορνεια does in the general signify any great crime, is very arbitrary; for though it is frequently put for idolatry in Scripture, it is then plainly used in a metaphorical sense, in which it is represented as a breach of something analogous to a marriage covenant between God and Israel. Compare Ezek. xvi. 8, 15. &c. Nevertheless, many divines of great note have maintained, that in case of obstinate desertion in one of the parties, the other is thereby set at liberty, since the very primary end of the marriage covenant is defeated; and have thought the case to be expressly determined by St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 10—15. But it is to be remembered, that this determination can only be applied when it is not in the power of the party injured to procure the return of the other by any legal process. It may be alleged, It is so difficult to reconcile this interpretation with the decision of our Lord, and with what Paul says, ver. 11. that perhaps it may be more advisable to understand the liberty spoken of, as relating to a liberty of continuing to live apart, without eagerly soliciting a return to the party, by whom the Christian had been on a religious account thus injuriously dismissed. But it may be replied, That ver. 11. above, determines on the case of the believing wife having voluntarily withdrawn, and not on that of her being divorced by her husband. If the party that had committed the injury married another, as that was adultery on Christ's decision, there could be no doubt, but in that case the injured party was at liberty to marry again.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It has been debated, how far polygamy was allowed in the Old Testament, or whether it were not rather condemned. Mal. ii. 14—16. has been urged in that view; and some have apprehended this to be the sense of Lev. xviii. 18. But it may be answered, That the precept of marrying the brother's widow, which was not limited to the case of the succeeding brother's being a single man, might require polygamy in some cases, and that the providing for it so expressly in others, (Deut. xxi. 15. Exod. xxi. 10.) plainly shows the law is not to be interpreted in this sense: and indeed one can hardly imagine, that had polygamy been regarded as adultery in the sight of God, he would have favoured the patriarchs who lived in it with such intimate converse and friendship; not to insist on the argument from 2 Sam. xii. 8. seeing ver. 11. may seem a difficult reply. The decision of Christ, Matt. xix. 4—6. and that of the apostle, 1 Cor. vii. 2. does indeed plainly show that it was not to be practised by Christians; and Matt. xix. 9. especially intimates it to be a kind of adultery; i. e. some breach of the seventh commandment. Compare Matt. v. 28. Nevertheless, it is nowhere expressly declared that, if a person, who before married several wives, were converted to Christianity, he must be obliged to put away all but the first: it seems that the Holy Spirit judged it sufficient to discountenance polygamy by such intimations as these above mentioned, and also by declaring those who practise it incapable of the ministerial office, which was certainly a proper brand of infamy set upon it. 1 Tim. iii. 2.

Owen's Theol. l. v. c. x. Bower's Hist. of Popes. Reflect. on Polygy. p. 7. &c.*

That incest was condemned under the old law as an immorality of the heathens, Lev. xviii. 24—27. and is also in one instance spoken of by the apostle with great abhorrence, (1 Cor. v. 1, 13.) is evident; but there is a great deal of room to debate how far those degrees of affinity and consanguinity, within which it was unlawful for the Jews to contract marriage, are to be a rule for us. The chief question is about the lawfulness of marrying a brother's wife, which the express precept for doing it in some cases proves not to be a natural immorality, though it were forbidden in others; yet, from Lev. xviii. 18. it may well be questioned whether the marrying two sisters successively, were by the Mosaic law for-bidden; though where the civil law of a country forbids such marriages, it is certainly much better to avoid contracting them.

Blount's Oracles of Reason, p. 135

SCHOLIUM 7.

It is most evident that Scripture requires obedience to governors, (Rom. xiii. 1—6. Tit. iii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14, 17.) but it has been the subject of great dispute how far these precepts extend. All grant that they cannot oblige us to do any thing in obedience to the magistrate which is contrary to the divine law; compare Acts iv. 19. but many have maintained unlimited passive obedience, and the unlawfulness of resistance in subjects upon any consideration whatsoever. The controversy is too large to be fully examined here; but the following general remarks may be of use, when inquiring into it.

1. That it is in itself very unlikely that so benevolent a scheme as that of the Gospel should be so calculated, as necessarily to destroy the civil rights of mankind, and to enslave free nations, depriving the subject of those privileges which express contract had given them, in those countries, where either a monarchy or aristocracy was limited by law; so that it may reasonably be expected, that very strong proofs be brought of this, before a thing so improbable can be admitted.

2. That there are many general prohibitions in Scripture, which common sense requires us to explain with some limitations. Vid. Schol. 2.

3. The apostles did no doubt intend to teach Christians that they ought to be very cautious how they disturb a government; and if any circumstances arise, in which it appears probable that resistance will occasion more evil than good to the public, then the texts quoted above enforce the obligation which Christians are under, by the general laws of the Gospel, as well as those of nature, cautiously to forbear it.

4. The chief argument on which the apostle insists, (Rom. xiii.) will not infer unlimited passive obedience.

5. Christianity was in the apostle's time in so weak a state, that Christians, as such, might be under some obligation to further submission than in all cases can now be required; and it would have been a hazardous matter, and perhaps liable to great abuses and scandal, if the apostles had entered nicely into various circumstances, and stated the case when resistance is, and when it is not, lawful; which, under so unrighteous and tyrannical a government as the Roman, might easily have been interpreted as sedition: it was therefore prudent to rest in such general advices and cautions to obedience, as to be sure do commonly though not universally oblige.

6. Nevertheless, if it should on the whole be acknowledged that subjects are in all cases bound to submit to the supreme power, (which is not by any means proved from the texts above quoted,) yet it would not follow from thence, that where the supreme legislative power is, as among us, divided among many persons, all the other branches of it, and all the people subject to it, must therefore universally submit to him, in whom the supreme executive power is lodged; i. e. that the king is to be obeyed, without and against the consent of his parliaments.

SCHOLIUM 8.

Few Christians have questioned the lawfulness of war; but the Quakers deny it, and urge Matt. v. 38—41. Rom. xii. 17—21. and Matt. xxvi. 52. For an answer to the first of these texts, see Schol. 2. As to the second, it is granted that revenge is there forbidden; but if any circumstances shall arise, in which we are persuaded, that by resisting evil and endeavouring to punish the aggressor, the public good will be promoted, resistance may be made, and punishment executed, without any degree of malice against the offenders. And as to Matt. xxvi. 52. our Lord cannot be understood, q. d. "they that have recourse to the sword, shall perish by the righteous judgment of God," since war had been so often undertaken, and prosecuted in its greatest rigour, by an express divine command in the Old Testament: it must therefore be considered only as a determination on this particular case, to which our Lord seems to have applied a proverbial expression among the Jews, that those who are readiest to meddle with weapons of war, are often the first that fall by them, and prove the occasion of their own destruction. On the other hand, the following Scriptures are often referred to as countenancing, if not vindicating, arms, Luke iii. 14. Matt. viii. 10. Acts x. 1, &c. But it is an argument of much greater importance, that the doctrine we have here been opposing would make every desperate villain irresistible, and consequently would give up all the property and lives in a city or province to one such person; and this, even though the person denying resistance or war should allow of magistracy; for the decree of the magistrate against such a one could not regularly take place till he has been brought to a trial, which on this hypothesis he could not be, or till he proceeded for want of such appearance to an outlawry, and then it could not be executed, without such a forcible attack upon that person as this principle opposes. The common law therefore of benevolence to society requires an assault on such a person, which does not imply any such malevolence to him as is inconsistent with the Christian temper in its greatest heights.

Grot. de Jure, l. i. c. ii. Def. of Quak. p. 212.

It must indeed be allowed, that many of the primitive Christians scrupled the lawfulness of war; but they were not uniform in their opinions about it, and if they had, no certain argument could have been drawn from thence. See what Moyle and King have written upon this subject, in the curious controversy about the Thundering Legion.

Moyle's Posth. Works, vol. ii. p. 81, &c.

SCHOLIUM 9.

The office of magistracy appears so absolutely necessary, in order to preserve the peace of society, (vid. Prop. 64, 69.) that it may justly be wondered, especially considering the passages quoted, Schol. 7. that any should have imagined it unlawful for a Christian to bear such an office. The chief texts urged in defence of so absurd a notion are, Matt. xx. 25. Mark x. 42. Luke xxii. 25. but it is plain our Lord there only intends to discourage the ambitious temper prevailing among the apostles, which inclined them to contend about that secular power which was not designed for any of them. Were the interpretation here opposed to be admitted, it would follow, either that there must be no magistrate at all in Christian countries, which would be their utter dissolution and ruin, or else that magistrates who are not Christians must be established among them, which is in itself very absurd, and directly contrary to the whole of the apostle's reasoning, 1 Cor. vi. 1, &c. Comp. Isa. xlix. 23.

Atterb. Serm. vol. ii. p. 89.

SCHOLIUM 10.

It is plain that the genius of the Gospel leads so strongly to the exercise of love and benevolence, that we can never believe that persecution for conscience sake, which seems in the nature of things so irrational and so mischievous, (Prop. 77.) should make a part of that scheme, unless it were very expressly asserted; but this is so far from being the case, that hardly so much as the shadow of an argument for persecution can be produced from the whole New Testament; and many passages of it are most directly contrary to it, Luke ix. 55, 56. 2 Tim. ii. 24—26. 2 Cor. x. 4. Isa. xlii. 3. See also Matt. xiii. 30. and it is no contemptible argument, which is drawn from the silence of the New Testament, as to any use which might be made of the secular power to enforce the truths of Christianity; for though it may be objected, That in the apostles' time few Christians were possessed of such power, yet it might have been convenient that some provision should be made against the time when that power might come into their hands, since there would otherwise be apparent danger of abusing it. To which we may add, not only that Sergius Paulus was a magistrate when converted,—but that the power of masters over their slaves was so absolute, that they might, on what penalties they pleased, have obliged them to profess their own religion; yet there is not the least intimation that Christian masters were to take any such advantages. On the other side, the arguments drawn from Luke xiv. 23. (compare Luke xxiv. 29.) and John xxi. 15. not to mention Acts x. 13. are so ridiculous, as hardly to deserve a particular examination. The chief argument from the New Testament is that drawn from the corporal severities which were sometimes exercised by the apostles. See 1 Cor. v. 5. Acts v. 5; xiii. 11. 1 Tim. i. 20. But it is evident that punishments miraculously inflicted on those that opposed the Gospel, had in their own nature such a tendency to convince men's understandings, as those inflicted by the magistrate in an ordinary way cannot possibly have. From the Old Testament, besides the argument taken from the penal laws of Moses, (which was considered above, Prop. 120. § 6.) some have urged Isa. xlix. 23. but this can only intimate that Christian princes should by all regular methods endeavour to promote the Gospel, and can never prove persecution to be one of those methods. As to the argument from Job xxxi. 28. it may be granted that Job intimates by this, that there was in his time in Arabia a law which punished idolatry, and that he approved it; at least, that he should have approved it, if such a law had been enacted; but it will not by any means follow from hence, that if there were such a law, it was of divine authority, or that if he approved of it, it was therefore right; for it is plain that, in some instances, Job had expressed himself in a very improper manner; and is not to be considered as under a plenary inspiration. As to Zech. xiii. 3. which indeed is one of the strongest texts of its kind, it may be replied, Either that the peculiar law against idolatry in the land of Israel shall still continue, after the restoration of the Jews, God being still their temporal King; or else (which I should rather think) that some converted Jews, warmed with a zeal for the Gospel, but not thoroughly instructed in the gentleness of its nature, shall be ready with their own hands to put to death their own children, if they should oppose it, upon a mistaken notion that Deut. xiii. 1, &c. would be a warrant to them in so doing; but that these converted Jews should be under an infallible guidance in all their judgments and actions, is nowhere intimated in Scripture by any argument, which would not as well prove the infallibility of the whole Christian church.

LECTURE CXCII.

PROPOSITION CXLVII.

The obligation of the precepts contained in the New Testament continues so long as the reasons on which they are founded continue, and ceases when the observation of any particular precept is inconsistent with another of a more general nature, or of greater importance for promoting the essential branches of virtue.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Many precepts are delivered in such a manner, that they must necessarily admit of some exception, in order to reconcile them with each other, and with the natural law of God, founded on the mutual and immutable relation of things. Vid. Prop. 146. Schol. 2 and 8.

2. The law of Moses, which is delivered in as general and universal a style as the precepts of Christ, was in some instances violated, without any crime, by those who were still in general under the obligations of that law. 2 Chron. xxx. 17—19. (which seems not so proper an instance as some have thought, see ver. 20.) 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10, 14. compared with Deut. xxi. 23. Matt. xii. 1—6. John v. 8, 9. Luke xiii. 15. Hos. vi. 6.

Stilling. Orig. Sac. lib. ii. c. vii. § 3.

3. When two precepts become inconsistent, one of them must necessarily lose its force; and it is plainly fit that the more particular precept should give way to the more general, and that which is of less to that which is of greater moment. Rom. xiii. 8, 9. Matt. xii. 17.

1—3. 4. Valet propositio.

Witsii Egypt. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 5.

COROLLARY.

Precepts which depend upon reasons peculiar to one age or people, do certainly lose their force in other ages, and where other people only are concerned.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this head we may properly refer the eating of blood, which was forbidden to Noah and to his descendants, Gen. ix. 4. (to which some have added ver. 5. without reason: compare Exod. xxi. 28. and Ezek. iii. 18.) and by Moses to the Israelites, Lev. xvii. 14. which prohibition, in both instances, seems to have had a view to the use of sacrifices in divine worship, and to have been intended as a mark of respect to the altar, at which the blood of every victim was presented before God as a solemn acknowledgment that he was the Lord of life; ibid. ver. 10—12. The eating of fat was also forbidden in several of the same words, and on the same principles: compare Lev. iii. 17. vii. 22—27. Blood was also forbidden to Christians in the apostles' days. Acts xv. 29. not merely as Lord Barrington, and after him Dr. Benson, have supposed, to those who before their conversion had been proselytes of the gate, a distinction, by the way, on which these authors lay a very disproportionate stress,) but to all Christians whatsoever; because the Jews had so strong an aversion to it, that they could not have been persuaded to hold civil or religious communion with those who used it, (Acts xv. 20, 21.) so that it seems even in those days (at least by any thing we can learn from any apostolic decree) had there been any Christian nation, among whom there were no Jews, since the institution of sacrifices ceased, the use of blood would have been an indifferent thing. Comp. Rom. xiv. 14. 1 Tim. iv. 4. Matt. xv. 10, 11. And should a considerable number of Jews be now kept out of the Christian church by that alone, it would still be the duty of those Christians among whom they dwelt, to forbear the use of it, on the principles stated by the apostle, 1 Cor. viii. per tot. Rom. xiv. 15—22. Many have indeed thought that there was a moral evil in eating blood, supposing that it tends to make men savage, and pleading from its being joined with fornication, which is certainly an immorality; but, not to say that πορνεια is by many supposed to signify marrying within those degrees of consanguinity, or affinity, which were prohibited by the Mosaic law,—it is plain there are some things in their own nature indifferent, from which Christians in the Jerusalem decree were required to abstain. As for things strangled, they seem to stand much on the same footing with things that died of themselves, from which the blood could not be taken, while it could properly be called the life; yet the Mosaic law expressly allowed strangers to eat of these, (Deut. xiv. 21.) which surely it would not have done, if there had been any natural immorality in it; but it is yet more important to observe, that this very decree in question joins things sacrificed to idols, in the list of what it prohibits, together with fornication, though the apostle expressly allows these, when they might be used without giving offence. (1 Cor. viii. 1—9.) The argument, from the tendency which blood has to make men savage, may be allowed as concluding against eating raw flesh; but that does not seem to be referred to in the apostle's precept under consideration, though some think it is in the precept to Noah. To say that this abstinence from blood is a little instance of mortification, which God enjoins to all Christians, in order to show his supreme power over all their enjoyments, as he forbade one tree to Adam in Paradise, is merely an arbitrary assertion, since there is not the least hint in Scripture of its being forbidden for any such reason; but other reasons are assigned, which are of much less general concern and obligation.

Spencer says blood was forbidden, in reference to some Heathen superstitions, in which, as he largely proves, it was often not only offered, but tasted, by idolaters; and that the prohibition ceases now, there being no further danger of them: but it seems the apostles themselves did not think of this reason, or lay so much stress upon it, as on the probability of offending the Jews. Acts xv. 19—21.

Hooker's Eccl. Polity, p. 188. Barr. Misc. Sac. vol. ii. Jenn. Jew. Ant. vol. i. p. 143.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The anointing the sick, commanded in James v. 14, 15. was, in the apostles' days, a symbol of miraculous healing (Mark vi. 13.); and therefore the reason of the precept ceasing,—its obligation must also cease with it.

Burnet on Art. xxv. p. 265. Whiston's Life, vol. ii. p. 473, &c.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The imposition of hands in ordination, seems also to depend upon the same foundation. It is certain that it was in the apostles' time the means of conveying some extraordinary gift (Acts viii. 18. 1 Tim. iv. 14.); but as those gifts are now ceased, the chief reason for observing this rite ceases with them. Nevertheless, as it has been an ancient rite of blessing, where no extraordinary gifts were conferred, (Matt. xix. 15. Gen. xlviii. 14.) and seems a natural way of designing or pointing out the person prayed for, it may innocently be retained as a thing indifferent; but it is by no means to be imposed, or represented as of so important and essential a nature, that the validity and usefulness of man's future ministry should be supposed to depend upon it in any degree.

Morrice's Dial. on Sac. Rel. p. 163. Kippis at Wilton's Ordination.

Some who have apprehended the precept, Rom. xiii. 1—4. did require unlimited passive obedience to magistrates, have thought it was not intended for a rule to Christians in all ages, but was peculiar to the primitive times, when the Christians were few and weak, and idolatrous princes would gladly snatch at any opportunity or excuse for inflicting punishments on the whole body of them, and would have been ready to strain any passage in the apostolic writings, to make them speak the language of sedition and treason. It must be allowed, that at least many of the primitive Christians did understand the texts as forbidding all resistance; but that will not prove that the apostles did really mean it so, it being very easy to find instances of their mistaking the original sense of Scripture, and putting some far more unnatural constructions upon it than this in question.

Tert. Apol. c. 35, &c. Baxter's Life, vol. i. p. 368. Sav. Ser. at the King's Acces. p. 13.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Dr. Clarke thinks the cautions which our Lord gave against carefulness, in his Sermon on the Mount, Matt. vi. 25, &c. belonged only to the apostles; and were intended to incline them to cast themselves entirely upon an extraordinary Providence, without any care of their own; but there is no sufficient reason to admit this interpretation, since,

1. It is probable this sermon was first preached before the apostles were chosen. Vid. Dodd. Fam. Expos. vol. i. § 53. note (a) p. 325.

2. The same caution is elsewhere given to all Christians. Phil. iv. 6. 1 Pet. v. 7.

3. It is connected with things of universal concern.

4. It is enforced by arguments common to all; and,

5. It is inferred from the impossibility of serving God and Mammon.

6. The apostles themselves were not to neglect proper means of providing for themselves, where Providence gave them an opportunity for it. Compare Luke xxii. 35, 36. Acts xx. 34.

Clarke's Posth. Serm. vol. iii. p. 116. Blair on Christ's Serm. on the Mount, vol. i.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Though there can be no good works of supererogation, i. e. which no law requires, because we are always required to do our best in religion, (Matt. v. 48; xxii. 37. 2 Cor. vii. 1.) yet there are some rules given in Scripture which admit of so many exceptions, that it was not convenient to deliver them in the general form of precepts; so that they are rather to be considered as counsels, particularly such as relate to a single life, (Matt. xix. 12. 1 Cor. vii. 26, 36, 38.) yet to those whose circumstances such passages suit, they are as obligatory as any of the most express and universal commands (compare Matt. xix. 21, 22.); to others they are not obligatory at all (Acts v. 4.); every one must therefore judge for himself in the sight of God, as to his own particular concern in such precepts; and on this principle 1 Cor. ix. 16—19. may well be explained.

LECTURE CXCIII.

PROPOSITION CXLVIII.

To enumerate the most considerable means of virtue recommended in the Scripture, or deducible from principles which are laid down there.

LEMMA.

Several of the particulars mentioned are not to be regarded merely as the means of virtue, but also as in themselves essential branches of our duty: but they are here introduced in the view of that influence they have upon other things, which is very great.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. A familiar acquaintance not only with the doctrines and precepts, but likewise with the historical part, of Scripture, will be very subservient to our improvement in virtue. Acts xx. 32. Rom. xv. 4. 1 Cor. x. 11. Jam. i. 21. 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16. Col. iii. 16. 1 Pet. ii. 2.

2. We are cautiously to avoid, not only those things which are in themselves evidently sinful, but those which have the appearance of evil, and may be the probable means of insnaring us or others. 1 Thess. v. 22. Prov. xxiii. 31. Matt. vi. 13.

3. Fervent and constant application to God in secret and social prayer. Matt. vi. 6; vii. 7. Eph. vi. 18. Phil. iv. 6. 1 Thess. v. 17, 18. 1 Tim. ii. 8. Heb. iv. 16; xiii. 15. Grove on Secret Prayer.

4. Christians are to assemble together for the public worship of God, that thereby a solemn profession of religion may be made, that their affection to each other may be testified and cultivated, and that such instructions may be given as may tend to improve their minds in knowledge and holiness, Heb. x. 25. to which may be added the Scriptures quoted under the following steps.

Holland's Sermon on Heb. x. 25. vol. i.[a]

5. It will evidently tend to render such assemblies more useful than they could otherwise be, that there should be those appointed statedly to preside over them; and who for that purpose should apply themselves with greater diligence than others to the study of divine things, and take pains to cultivate a habit of speaking concerning them in public in the most instructive and edifying manner, as well as to investigate and state the evidence of Christianity, the sense of Scripture, and particular difficulties which may occur, and occasion scruples in men's minds, either of a speculative or practical nature: not to insist upon the great advantage societies may receive by the inspection of such offices, and their fraternal admonitions, as particular occasions may require.

Leechman on the Character of a Minister.[b]

6. It is proper that such persons should in a solemn manner be set apart to this work, and recommended to the divine assistance and blessing, in their entrance upon any place in which they intend to labour, not only by the private Christians of that society, but by neighbouring ministers, as there may be opportunity, and especially by some more advanced in life and experienced in the work; which is warranted by various passages in the apostolic writings, whereby the preceding heads are also confirmed. See Rom. x. 13—17. 2 Tim. ii. 2. Tit. i. 5—9. 1 Tim. iii. 1—13. Acts xiv. 23; xx. 28. Matt. xxviii. 19. Col. iv. 17.

Savage's Intr. Disc.

7. It will conduce to the advancement of virtue that, on the one hand, great care should be taken to inquire into the character and abilities of those who are chosen to such offices, and to exclude or remove those who behave in a vicious and scandalous manner; and, on the other, when any are chosen to them, and while they behave well in them, they should be treated with all due respect, and a decent provision made for them and their families; partly as an equivalent for their labours, and for their resigning those secular advantages which learned and able men might promise themselves in other callings; and also as an encouragement to them to pursue their sacred work with cheerfulness, being freed from those distracting cares, to which they would otherwise be exposed, and animated by that token of respect and affection in those committed to their care: Phil. iv. 10, 11, 17. nor are ministers to be blamed or despised who accept such maintenance; especially since ordinarily, if left destitute of it, they would be unable to contribute to the relief of the necessitous, which they of all men (cæt. par.) ought to be most ready to do. Acts xx. 34, 35. 1 Cor. ix. 4—18. Gal. vi. 6. 1 Thess. v. 12, 13. 1 Tim. v. 17, 18. Heb. xiii. 7, 17.

Barclay's Apol. p. 329. Mandev. Free Thoughts, p. 276.

8. As the maintenance of ministers, and the relief of the poor, who belong to every society, and therefore are to be peculiarly regarded by them, will necessarily require some care and attendance, it is plainly fit that there should be some in Christian assemblies, whose peculiar business this should be: and with regard to these officers, as well as those in a superior station, care should be taken that they may be persons of blameless characters, and that they have such capacities as may fit them for the discharge of their office: respect is likewise to be shown them, proportionable to their usefulness to the societies they belong to, and to the circumstances of life in which they are. Acts vi. 1, &c. 1 Tim. iii. 8—12.

[b] The general obligations of the Christian ministry have been frequently represented in episcopal and archiepiscopal charges, and at the ordination services and charges of the Presbyterian communion. Excellent treatises on the subject are Mr Mason's Student and Pastor, and Mr Bradley's Christian Minister. Among those entered into at ordination may be mentioned Dr Lindsay's Charge at the Ordination of Mr Lindsay; Bishop Burgess's Charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of Salisbury; and Dr Kippis's Charge to Mr Rees of Rodport, Dorsetshire.

9. Hardly any thing can have a happier influence upon the improvement of a virtuous and religious life in all its branches, than a due regard to the mediatorial offices of Christ; and we are encouraged, by the example of good men in Scripture, as well as by other considerations, to pray to him for those blessings which we are sure he is, under his mediatorial character, commissioned and empowered to grant. Compare Acts vii. 59, 60. 2 Cor. xii. 8. Phil. ii. 10. John v. 23. Heb. i. 6. Rev. v. 12, 13. and in all our addresses to the Father, we are habitually to regard him as dwelling in Christ, and manifesting himself to his people in gracious dispensations through him, John xvi. 23, 24. but to address ourselves to Christ only in prayer, omitting the mention of the Father, is contrary to the precepts and example of Scripture, and indeed to the whole tenor of it; and is indeed overthrowing the whole mediatorial scheme, while the greatest zeal for it is pretended.

Emlyn's Tracts, p. 27. Clarke on Trin. Prop. 53. Burnet's Doct. Trin. p. 95.

10. It is also of great importance, in order to our improvement in religion, that we should maintain an habitual sense of the need we have of the influences of the Holy Spirit of God, which are to be sought in earnest prayer, attended with a solicitous concern to cherish those good impressions on the mind, of which we have reason to believe he is the Author. Rom. viii. 11, 13, 14. Eph. iv. 30. Gal. v. 16, 18, 25. And though there be indeed no example or precept concerning the worship of the Holy Spirit in Scripture, under a distinct personal character, yet if the preceding propositions relating to his divinity be allowed, there is evidently a foundation for it in the nature of things. Compare Matt. xxviii. 19. 2 Cor. xiii. ult.

Evans's Chris. Temp. vol. i. p. 329.

11. So far as the divine image appears in any creature, we are to express our veneration for it, as a means of promoting virtue in ourselves, as well as an immediate exercise of it; and we may allowably ask the intercession of other good men for us: but as we do not certainly know that any invisible being whatsoever, excepting God and the great appointed mediator, Christ Jesus, do hear our prayers at all times and in all places, nor can be sure of it with regard to any particular time or place, it is proper to address our prayers only to God in and through Christ, and not to any inferior invisible being, how great and excellent soever. 1 Kings viii. 39. Tennison on Idol. p. 222. Lowman on Rev. p. 231. Saul and Samuel at Endor, c. iv.

12. The worship of images has been recommended by many, as a proper means of raising devotion: but images representing God do naturally tend to debase our ideas of him; and images of Christ may easily lay a foundation for idolatry in weak and ignorant minds. The worship of saints and angels by images is superseded in the preceding step;—and most of those apologies which the Papists make for their image worship, seem to have been borrowed from some of the more intelligent of the heathen writers, who could not be stupid enough to imagine that the images themselves were divine, though they did suppose the extraordinary presence of some invisible agent in them or near them, and apprehended that the peculiar favours of that invisible agent would be conferred upon those who honoured the image for his sake.

More's Theol. p. 420. Tenn. on Idol. p. 269.

13. As natural reasons mentioned above recommend fasting in some circumstances and on some occasions, so many passages in the Old Testament expressly require it, and that on principles common to all nations. Joel ii. 12, &c. Jon. iii. pass. It is likewise favoured by Matt. vi. 16. where Christ seems to take it for granted that his disciples would practise it; as also 1 Cor. vii. 5.

Bennet's Christian Orat. vol. ii. p. 18.

LECTURE CXCIV.

SCHOLIUM 1.

That form of prayer, commonly called the Lord's Prayer, seems to have been given, in our Lord's sermon on the mount, Matt. vi. as a directory; whereas (Luke xi. 1.) Christ seems, in compliance with the request of the disciples, to have given it as a form. Some have urged that the second and fourth petition of that prayer could be intended only for temporary use: but it is most evident that such a sense may be put upon those petitions as shall suit all Christians in all ages; for it is always our duty to pray that Christ's kingdom may be advanced in the world; and to profess our daily dependence on God's providential care. Nevertheless, there is no reason to believe that Christ meant to enjoin it so absolutely upon all his disciples, that they should be obliged constantly to use this form, or even to dispose their prayers in this method; and that great zeal, which is to be found in some Christians, either for or against it, is to be lamented as a weakness; and it will become us to do all that we can, to promote on each side more moderate sentiments concerning it. The omission of the name of Christ in that prayer, compared with John xiv. 13, 14. shows that this prayer is not to be ordinarily used alone, without either introduction or explication. If the conciseness and variety of the expressions be, as some have thought, an objection against the use of it, this objection might have taken place from the beginning; nevertheless, it is a good argument why those who use it, should attentively study it, and why it should be often reviewed and explained. Perhaps it can nowhere be viewed to greater advantage than in the pious Archbishop Leighton's explication of it, or in the Assembly's Catechism, in proportion to the number of words used.

Hebden on the Lord's Pr. Watts on Prosper. Hallet on Scrip. vol. iii. p. 20. West on the Lord's Prayer.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is evidently reasonable and important, that when we pray, it should be with a firm persuasion of the goodness of God, as well as his power, and with a dependence upon the truth of his promises: but as for that firm persuasion of obtaining the particular blessings we ask, which some have called a special faith in prayer, it might indeed be an essential condition of the miraculous effects of prayer in the early ages of Christianity; but it is very difficult to determine how far it may now be rational and well grounded, when we are asking for blessings which are merely of a temporal nature, and which God has not by the tenor of the covenant of grace obliged himself to grant to all his people: at least it cannot be matter of universal duty, and can only take place in correspondence to some extraordinary impressions made on the mind, the nature and kind of which are perhaps intelligible only to those who have experienced them. Vid. Prop. 140. Schol. 7. and the references there. Vid. Mark xi. 24. James i. 6. 1 Tim. ii. 8.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is debated, Whether public liturgies ought to be established for the use of Christian assemblies? Some have pleaded for it as necessary, and urged Christ's concurring in those forms of prayer which were offered in the Jewish synagogue, as an argument for men's submitting to them. To what was said above, Prop. 76. Schol. 3. we may add the following remarks:

1. It appears, in fact, by the manner in which the worship of God is discharged in those Christian congregations where liturgies are not used, that it may generally be expected (through the common assistance of the Spirit of God, in consequence of proper care and application on the part of ministers) that the church is never likely to be destitute of teachers, who may carry on that part of worship in a decent and edifying manner, especially when due care is taken in the education of those that are intended for the service of the sanctuary.

2. Nevertheless, as it may so happen that some persons may be employed in the ministry who may not have a talent and capacity for extemporary prayer, it is not at all improper that some forms should be provided for the use of such, if they choose to have recourse to them.

3. But to impose any particular form of prayer upon all ministers, and upon all congregations, without regarding their abilities on the one hand, or their sentiments on the other, is certainly putting a great hardship both on ministers and private Christians; and those who do it had need produce strong evidence that they are the appointed legislators in the church of Christ, if they expect unlimited submission to them.

4. To confine ministers to a form, so as to exclude their offering any prayers but those prescribed, is so apparently absurd, that it has not (that I know of) been practised, at least in any Protestant church.

5. As for the Jewish prayers now used in the synagogues, there is no reason to believe they are so old as our Lord's time; and it is certain that some of them are such as he could not concur in, even though we should grant him to have been present in places where they were used; and all that can be inferred from hence seems to be this, That the use of a form of prayer is not alone a sufficient reason for Christians to separate from such assemblies, which will be readily granted; and it is very hard if no allowance is to be made for a more abundant effusion of the Spirit of God under the Gospel, than under the Mosaic law. Rom. viii. 2.

Bennet, Robinson, and Clarkson on Liturgy. Prince's Vind. c. iv. Predeaux's Con. vol. i. p. 374. Le Clerc on Matt. vi. 7.*

Bishop Bull, and some others, have urged the probability of liturgies being of apostolic institution, and 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. is produced very weakly for this purpose, since it may so well be interpreted as a general direction for prayer; and it is certain the quotation from Prosper cannot prove the contrary. What looks most specious for this purpose, is the agreement of many ancient liturgies in the sursum corda, the exhortation to give thanks to God, with the responses, and the doxologies to Father, Son, and Spirit, together with what he calls the prayer of oblation of the Christian sacrifice in the holy Eucharist, the ανοναξις, or renunciation of the flesh, the world, and the devil, in baptism, with the συναξις, or joining ourselves to Father, Son, or Spirit; which harmony it is said there could not have been, if there were not some general foundation in apostolic appointment; but to this it is answered,

* This subject has not unexpectedly been discussed since Dr. Doddridge's Lectures were written. Dr. Taylor's Scripture Account of Prayer, and a tract entitled Public Prayer, are in opposition to liturgies. In favour of them is A Letter to a Dissenting Minister on the Unreasonableness of Forms. This pamphlet was answered by Mr. Jay. A pamphlet under the title of Liturgies according to the Dissenters, or a second letter to a dissenting minister on prayer. What the author proposes is, that students before the ministry occasionally be composed, and delivered by the minister as he does his sermon.

1. That the antiquity of all these liturgies is very dubious: nay, several of them are most evidently spurious; and it is certain, if they were forged, many of them might come from the same hand.

2. That the agreement in many of these things is not so entire as is here supposed.

3. That where there is indeed an agreement, it might be derived from primitive custom, though there were no liturgies.

4. That the extraordinary degree in which the primitive Christians were assisted by the Spirit, made it less necessary there should have been any.

5. That several directions given by St. Paul to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xi. 14. make it probable there were none; and that he did not think it necessary there should be any.

6. That the silence of the apostles as to this important fact, supposing it were a real fact, is surprising.

7. It is highly improbable that a diversity of liturgies should have been made in the ancient church, if they had any composed by the apostles.

8. That many passages in ancient writings seem to intimate the contrary practice to have prevailed early, particularly the expression of ὅση δυναμις, and sine monitore; and Basil, to whom a liturgy with a prayer of consecration for the Eucharist has been ascribed, declares that no such form was, or ever ought to be, composed.

LECTURE CXCV.

DEFINITION XCII.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST is a society, consisting of all those who profess to believe in him as a teacher sent from God, and to form their worship and conduct according to what they apprehend to be his institutions.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The church of Christ here defined, is that which is commonly called the catholic, and consists of many smaller societies, all agreeing in the general profession of subjection to him, though greatly diversified as to the particular forms of worship and discipline.

SCHOLIUM 2.

The word ECCLESIA, used to express church, both in the Latin and Greek languages, does in the general signify any assembly of men, and sometimes is applied even to such assemblies as were not in a regular manner called together, though its etymology expresses being called out from others, as indeed assemblies generally are, either more or less expressly. Acts xix. 32, 39, 41. It generally signifies, in the New Testament, "A number of Christians met together in one place;" and sometimes "The whole body of the faithful." Matt. xvi. 18; xviii. 17. Acts viii. 3. ix. 31. xx. 28. Eph. v. 23, 25, 29, 32. Rom. xvi. 16. 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

Collins on Free-thinking. Bentley on ditto.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Divines have often distinguished between the visible and the invisible church. All those, and only those, belong to the visible church, who submit to the Christian institutions, worship in Christian assemblies, professing their faith in Christ, or are descended from such as do, and are yet in their infancy; though upon this foundation it must be allowed there are various degrees of visibility in church-membership; but the invisible church consists only of those who are true believers in Christ, according to Def. 82. or, as perhaps some would choose to state it, who have such habits and dispositions as are necessary, in order to their preparation for future happiness, whether they be or be not regularly gathered into the church.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It evidently appears from the preceding definition and scholia, that the supposition of a visible head, with whom all the members are to hold communion, is by no means necessary in order to constitute such an unity as is essential to the church of Christ; their professed union to Christ is as real a bond of unity as a professed union with and subjection to any living man could be; and is that upon which the apostle makes it evidently to depend. Eph. iv. 16. Col. ii. 19. Gal. iii. 28.

PROPOSITION CXLIX.

To take a more particular survey of the various kinds of public officers, which are, according to the institution of Christ, appointed in his church.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. It has generally been acknowledged, and was more particularly proved, Prop. 148. gr. 5, 6. that Christ has appointed certain officers, whose business it is to instruct his people, and to direct them in their spiritual affairs; with respect to which office they are frequently called pastors, or shepherds. Acts xx. 28. Eph. iv. 11, 12. 1 Pet. v. 2, 4.

2. These officers are frequently called Elders and Presbyters, as the Jews used to call those who presided in their ecclesiastical or civil assemblies; and from their office of overseeing the people, the name of επισκοποι, or Bishops, was also given them; and whatever alteration might afterwards be made in the sense of that word, and whatever distinction might early be introduced between bishops and presbyters, as signifying two different ranks of ministers, (of which hereafter,) it is certain that, in the New Testament, the words are used promiscuously.* Vid. Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. 1, &c. compared with Tit. i. 5—7. Acts xx. 17, with 28. 1 Pet. v. 1, 2. Bishop Hoadly and Dr. Hammond do both of them allow this; and it is Dr. Hammond's opinion that there were only presbyters (or bishops) and deacons in each church at first; i. e. one overseer, called a presbyter, in each, to whom assistants and inferior officers were afterwards added; who in process of time took the name of deacons, while the presidents were, by way of distinction, called bishops. But this does not agree with Acts xiv. 23; xx. 17. Tit. i. 5. which prove there were several elders in a place; and this indeed has been generally granted to have been the case at first; but it has been asserted that the apostles, in their last visitation, settled one of the presbyters or bishops of a place over the rest: but whether they at that time, or ever at all, established such a distinction of names and offices, as had not before been known, will be afterwards inquired.

Boyse's Works, vol. i. p. 81. Hoadly on Episc. p. 383. Hammond on Acts xi. 30.

3. It appears that another kind of officers, called deacons, were used in the Christian church, by the appointment of the apostles: and a parity of reason, at least in some degree, will require that the Christian church should have some such officers among them still, whether they be or be not called by the same name, which plainly signifies servants of the church. Matt. xxii. 13. John ii. 9. (Greek.) Vid. Prop. cxlviii. gr. 8. Acts vi. 1—8. 1 Tim. iii. 8—13. Collins on Free-thinking, p. 93.

4. There are some circumstances in the primitive church which have made it peculiarly proper that there should be some women appointed to take care of the entertainment of strangers, to attend the sick, and assist at the baptizing of women; these were generally at least widows, (1 Tim. v. 9—11.) and seem to have been called Deaconesses, Rom. xvi. 1. (Greek). This office is not altogether so needful now as it was then; and whether the office or name should be retained, is to be referred to the judgment of particular societies, upon a view of their own circumstances.

Collins on Free-think. p. 93. Bingham's Ant.

SCHOLIUM 1.

There were in the succeeding ages of the Christian church many new officers introduced into it, whose very names were unknown in the most primitive times; which were, for instance, Patriarchs, Exarchs, Archbishops or Metropolitans, Archdeacons, Subdeacons, Acolyths, (a kind of vergers to the bishops,) Exorcists, Catechists, Singers, Doorkeepers, the capitata or fossarii, who had the care of funerals, the parabolani, who took care of the sick, the defensores and œconomi, a kind of churchwardens, of which the first took care of land and houses; the latter of money appropriated to charitable uses: to which we may also add the cellulani. Concerning most of them, see Bower's Hist. of Popes, vol. ii. Bingh. Antiq.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Of the manner in which the hierarchy was formed under Constantine, during the pontificate of Sylvester, agreeably to the civil polity then established in the empire, and the civil dioceses into which he divided the four prefectures, see Bower's Hist. of the Popes, vol. i. p. 99—110.

Geddes's Tracts, vol. iv. Essay 2.

DEFINITION XIII.

Those are said to maintain the DIVINE RIGHT of DIOCESAN EPISCOPACY, who assert that Christ has appointed an order of ministers in his church, superior to the pastors of particular congregations, who are to exercise the highest acts of jurisdiction, especially ordination, excommunication, and confirmation: these they suppose to be, properly speaking, the successors of the apostles, in such a sense as no other ministers are; to whose authority therefore neighbouring churches with their pastors are to submit themselves, in all matters which are not apparently contrary to the will of God.

Bingh. Orig. l. ii. c. iii.

SCHOLIUM.

Those who hold every pastor to be so a bishop or overseer of his own congregation, as that no other person or body of men have by divine institution a power to exercise any superior or pastoral office in it, may, properly speaking, be called (so far at least) congregational: and it is by a vulgar mistake that any such are called Presbyterians: for the presbyterian discipline is exercised by synods and assemblies, subordinate to each other, and all of them subject to the authority of what is commonly called a General Assembly.

Scottish Confess. and Directory, c. xxxi.

LECTURE CXCVI.

PROPOSITION CI.

To propose and consider the principal arguments which are brought in defence of diocesan episcopacy, both from the Scriptures and the primitive fathers.

SOLUTION.

SECT. I. The arguments from Scripture.

1. Some argue that the nature of the office which the apostles bore was such, that the edification of the church would require they should have some successors in those ministrations which are not common to Gospel ministers. It is answered, That as their office was such, as to require extraordinary and miraculous endowments for the discharge of many parts of it, it is impossible that they can have any successors in those services who are not empowered for the execution of them, as the apostles themselves were: and it is maintained, that so far as ordination, confirmation, and excommunication may be performed without miraculous gifts, there is nothing in them but what seems to suit the pastoral office in general, unless further arguments can be brought to prove that Christ has limited them to some superior order of ministers. Vid. Prop. 117. Cor. 4.

* See on this subject Dr. Stevenson's Sermon at the ordination of Mr. Moses Alway.

Boyse of Episc. p. 270. Barr. W. vol. i. p. 595.

2. It is pleaded, that Timothy and Titus were bishops of Ephesus and Crete, whose business it was to exercise such extraordinary acts of jurisdiction as are now claimed for diocesan bishops, 1 Tim. i. 3; iii. pass.; v. 19—22. 2 Tim. ii. 2. Tit. i. 5. &c. iii. 10. (not to mention the postscripts of these epistles, which are evidently spurious.)—To this it is answered, That Timothy and Titus had not a stated residence in these churches, but only visited them for a time: 2 Tim. iv. 9—13. Tit. iii. 12. It also appears from other places, in which the journeys of Timothy and Titus are mentioned, that they were a kind of itinerant officers, called Evangelists, who were assistants to the apostles; for there is great reason to believe the first epistle to Timothy was written prior to those from Rome in the time of Paul's imprisonment, as some think the second was also. To which we may add, that it seems probable at least that they had very extraordinary gifts to furnish them for their superior offices: 1 Tim. iv. 14. Eph. iv. 11. 2 Tim. iv. 5. And though Timothy was with Paul when he took his leave of the elders of Ephesus, (Acts xx.) the apostle gives not the least hint of any extraordinary power with which he was invested, nor says one word to engage their obedience to him; which is a very strong presumption that no such relation did subsist, or was to take place: at least, it is a certain proof that Paul did not think it was necessary to leave a bishop in a place, when making his last visitation to it; for that he at least thought that this would be his last visitation at Ephesus, is undeniably plain, from Acts xx. 25, 38. Comp. Rev. ii. 4, 5.

Owen's Serip. Ord. p. 11. Hoare's Epis. p. 15.

3. Some have argued from the mention of angels, i. e. as they understand it, of diocesan bishops, in the seven churches of Asia, particularly the angel of Ephesus, though there were many ministers employed in it long before the date of that epistle: Acts xx. 17, 18. But it is certain, that for any thing which appears in our Lord's epistles to them, (Rev. ii. and iii.) they might be no more than the pastors of single congregations, with their proper assistants. Some have urged the use of the word αποστολοι, 2 Cor. viii. 23. (Greek) compared with Phil. ii. 23. (Greek); but it so plainly refers to their being sent by some churches upon a particular occasion, that it is strange any stress should be laid upon it. Compare 1 Kings xiv. 6. Septuagint.

Hoare's Episcopacy, p. 45.

4. It is urged that some of the churches, which were formed in large cities during the lives of the apostles, and especially that at Jerusalem, consisted of such vast numbers, as could not possibly assemble at one place. Compare Acts xxi. 20. It is answered, 1. That the word μυριαδες may only signify great numbers, and may not be intended to express that there were several times ten thousand in an exact and literal sense. Compare Luke xii. 1. (Greek.) 2. That no sufficient proof is brought from Scripture of there being such numbers of people in any particular place as this supposes; for the myriads of believing Jews, spoken of in the preceding text, as well as the numbers mentioned Acts ii. 41; iv. 4. might very probably be those who were gathered together at those great feasts from distant places, of which few might have their stated residence in that city. Compare Acts viii. 1. 3. If the number were so great as the objection supposes, there might be, for any thing which appears in Scripture, several bishops in the same city, as there are among those who do not allow of diocesan episcopacy several co-ordinate pastors, overseers, or bishops: and though Eusebius does indeed pretend to give us a catalogue of the bishops of Jerusalem, it is to be remembered how the Christians had been dispersed from thence for a considerable time, at and after the Roman war, and removed into other parts, which must necessarily very much increase the uncertainty, which Eusebius himself owns there was as to the succession of bishops in most of the ancient sees.

Euseb. Eccl. Hist. l. ii. iii. Grot. on Acts xviii. 17.

Sect. II. Arguments from antiquity.

1. The assertors of Diocesan Episcopacy plead,

1. That Clemens Romanus intimates this, when he recommends to the Corinthians the example of the Jewish church, where the high priest, ordinary priests, and Levites, knew and observed their respective offices. To this it is answered, That the high priest may signify Christ; else this parallel would rather imply that the Christian church must be subject to some one visible head as the Jewish was, and then presbyters and deacons may answer to priests and Levites. This interpretation is the more probable, as Clement never expressly mentions presbyters and bishops as distinct, nor reflects the contending Corinthians to any one ecclesiastical head, as the centre of unity, which he would probably have done, if there had been any diocesan bishop among them; nay, he seems evidently to speak of presbyters as exercising the episcopal office. See the 39th section of his epistle.

Howe's Episcopacy, p. 107—116.

2. As for Irenæus, I meet with no passage produced from him, to prove that bishops and presbyters were distinct. The word presidency or presbyter is evidently used to signify the highest officer in the Roman church, in a noble fragment preserved, Euseb. Eccles. Hist. l. v. c. xxiv. p. 248. He does indeed mention the succession of bishops from the apostles, which is reconcilable with the supposition of their being parochial; nor altogether irreconcilable with the supposition of joint pastors in those churches. Iren. l. iii. c. iii. p. 232.

Howe, ibid. p. 132—136.

3. Ignatius is much insisted upon as a most express witness. It is allowed, that in many places he expressly distinguishes between bishops and presbyters, and requires obedience to bishops from the whole church (presbyters not excepted) in very strong terms: but as he often supposes each of the churches to which he wrote to meet in one place, and represents them as breaking one loaf, and surrounding one altar, and charges the bishop to know all his flock by name, not excepting even the servants of it, it is most evident that he must speak of a parochial and not a diocesan bishop.

Howe, ibid. p. 122.

4. Polycarp exhorts the Christians at Philippi to be subject to the presbyters and deacons; he urges the presbyters to impartial judgment, &c. but says not one word of any bishop as being then at Philippi, nor gives any directions about choosing one; so that it should seem this church, as well as that at Corinth, was governed by joint presbyters, or copastors.

5. Justin Martyr certainly speaks of the president, whom we may allow to have been distinguished from the presbyter, though Justin does not mention that distinction; but he represents this president as present at every administration of the Eucharist, which he also mentions as always making a part of their public worship; so that the bishop here intended must have only been the pastor of one congregation.

6. Tertullian speaks of approved elders, as presiding in Christian assemblies, and glories over the Marcionites, that they could not produce a catalogue of their bishops in a continued succession from the apostles, as the orthodox Christians could: but it cannot be proved that he speaks of a diocesan, since all that he says might be applied to a parochial bishop.

Howe, ibid. p. 136.

7. Clemens Alexandrinus says, "That the order of bishops, priests, and deacons, is according to the rank and dispensation of angels:" but as he mentions only angels and archangels, without descending into any more subordinations, it is not easy certainly to determine how far he intended to assert the power of the bishop over the presbyter; much less can it be inferred from hence, that the bishops of whom he speaks were any thing more than parochial.

8. Origen speaks distinctly of bishops and presbyters, but unites them both, as it seems, under the common name of priests, saying nothing of the power of bishops as extending beyond one congregation, and rather insinuates the contrary, when he speaks of offenders as brought before the whole church to be judged by it.

9. The Apostolic Constitutions do indeed very frequently distinguish between bishops and presbyters, and assert the subjection of the latter to the former, as a matter of divine institution: but not to insist upon the evidence there is, that these constitutions were at the earliest a forgery of the fourth century, (vid. Prop. 103. Schol. 5.) there are many passages in them which show that the bishops there spoken of could not stand related to a great number of churches; for they expressly decree, "That the deacons give nothing to the poor without the bishop's consent," and "that the bishops should see to it, that the same person did not receive charities twice in a week, unless the case were very urgent:" they also refer continually to the bishop's assembling with his people in acts of joint devotion; and the liturgies contained in these constitutions generally suppose the bishop present, and assign him some peculiar office in each service, and especially in the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

10. Cyprian does indeed speak of the bishop as joining with and presiding over the bench of presbyters, in giving judgment in cases in which the church was concerned; but though he himself was a person of such distinguished sense, and though we have so many large epistles, wherein he gives directions about the manner in which the church under his care was to be managed in his absence, as well as relates several occurrences in which he was concerned while he was at Carthage,—yet it is remarkable, that he gives no intimation of his having had the charge of more than one congregation. He speaks of two readers, whom he alternately employed, which were capable of being heard by the whole church; and he expressly mentions his people as joining with him in acts of communion and discipline, not by representatives, but in their own person.

11. It is allowed, that in succeeding ages the difference between bishops and presbyters came to be more and more magnified, and various churches came under the care of the same bishop; nevertheless, Jerome does expressly speak of bishops and presbyters as of the same order; and Gregory Nazianzen speaks of the great and affected distinction made between ministers in prerogative of place, and other tyrannical privileges, (as he calls them,) as a lamentable and destructive thing.

King's Const. of the Ch. part i. Bayse on Episc. c. ii. Milton's Prose Works, p. 285. Mem. of Emlyn, p. 132.*

COROLLARY 1.

The distinction between bishops and presbyters does not appear of earlier date than the time of Ignatius, § 2. gr. 1 and 2.

COROLLARY 2.

This distinction does not appear to have been of divine institution; and Dr. Hammond in effect allows this, as was observed Prop. 149. gr. 2.

COROLLARY 3.

There was little or no conformity between primitive episcopacy, even as it was in the second and third centuries, and that diocesan episcopacy which is established in the Church of England, and in Popish countries.

COROLLARY 4.

Those reformed churches abroad which have not diocesan, may, notwithstanding, retain the true primitive, episcopacy; nevertheless, it is to be observed that they have superintendents, and some of still a superior order, nearly answering to our bishops and archbishops, but with this difference, that it is not pretended their authority is of divine original, nor their existence by any means essential to that of a church; but they are acknowledged to be a kind of officers, set over the church by the civil magistrate; and indeed the constitution of the Church of England is such, that its bishops are properly the king's officers; and it is not in the power of any number of them to make another without him.

Towgood's Append. to his Letter to Whitef.

COROLLARY 5.

The main and most important controversy relating to episcopacy, is that which concerns the extent of the bishop's charge.

COROLLARY 6.

To assert in the general that diocesan bishops have such a right to determine all indifferent matters in the church, that private Christians and ordinary ministers must in conscience submit to their dictates, how contrary soever they may be to their own relish and sentiments, and that none may preach who are not authorized by them, is building a vast superstructure upon a very weak and precarious foundation.

COROLLARY 7.

The dissenting churches in this realm are to be justified in the liberty which they take of forming themselves into separate congregations, independently on the authority and jurisdiction of that diocese within whose province they live; especially when submitting to them must in effect be attended with this important additional circumstance, of owning them to be instituted by Christ, as well as with a conformity to certain rites and ceremonies, and forms of discipline, which in themselves considered, separately from any supposed authority appointing them, appear less expedient, though they should not be urged as absolutely unlawful.

Howe's Episcopacy, p. 148.

LECTURE CXCVII.

SCHOLIUM 1.

There seems reason for saying, (as in the last corollary,) that the established Church of England demands that the diocesan bishops should be owned in effect as officers instituted by Christ; for though this be not asserted in the articles of the Church of England, yet in the book of ordination (to which assent must be declared, as well as to the common prayer) it is expressly said, "That it is evident to all men diligently reading the Holy Scriptures, &c. that from the apostles' time there has been this order in Christ's church, bishops, priests, and deacons, as several officers;" and it is sufficiently plain from the whole system of ecclesiastical government, that bishops must here signify diocesan bishops, and not merely pastors of a particular congregation.

Calamy's Abridg. of Baxter's Life, vol. i. p. 222.

It is easy to apprehend how episcopacy, as it was in the primitive church, with those alterations which it afterwards received, might be gradually introduced. The apostles seem to have taught chiefly in large cities; they settled ministers there, who preaching in country villages or smaller towns, increased the number of converts: it would have been most reasonable that those new converts, which lay at a considerable distance from the large towns, should, when they grew numerous, have formed themselves into distinct churches, under the care of their proper pastors or bishops, independently on any of their neighbours; but the reverence which would naturally be paid to men who had conversed with the apostles, and perhaps some desire of influence and dominion, from which the hearts of very good men might not be entirely free, and which early began to work, (3 John 9. 2 Thess. ii. 7.) might easily lay a foundation for such a subordination in the ministers of new-erected churches to those which were more ancient; and much more easily might the superiority of a pastor to his assistant presbyters increase, till it at length came to that great difference, which we own was early made, and probably soon carried to an excess; and if there was that degeneracy in the church, and defection from the purity and vigour of religion, which the learned Vitringa supposes to have happened between the time of Nero and Trajan, it would be less surprising that those evil principles which occasioned episcopal, and at length the papal, usurpation, should before that time exert some considerable influence.

* For a consideration of several of the subjects that are spoken of in hundred and forty ninth, and hundred and fiftieth propositions, recourse may be had to Dr. Benson's Dissertation concerning the first state of the Christian Churches, and concerning the public worship of the Christians, whilst the spiritual gifts continued. See his Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles, vol. i. p. 578. second edit.

† That body of Protestant Dissenters who go under the denomination of General Baptists, have three distinct orders in their churches, answering to bishops, priests, and deacons. They are separately ordained. To the highest order they give the name of Messengers, and to the second that of Elders. The third order is that of Deacons, in the sense of the word as used in the New Testament. See Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Mr. Wm. Whiston, part iii. p. 468.

Vitrin. Obs. lib. iv. c. vii. viii.

It might be very expedient, upon the principles of Christian prudence, that, where it can be accomplished, every pastor of a large congregation should still have assistant ministers; and some presidents among the pastors of different congregations, when they are meeting about any public business, is what common sense dictates in such circumstances; and if instead of a chairman chosen for that particular time and occasion, some person of experience, of approved fidelity and ability, should be appointed to exercise some stated oversight over a few of the neighbouring congregations, it might perhaps be attended with such consequences as would render such a sort of discipline not only tolerable, but eligible. Something of this kind was projected in Archbishop Usher's plan for the reduction of episcopacy, by which he would have moderated it in such a manner as to have brought it very near the Presbyterian government of the Scottish church; the weekly parochial vestry answering to their church-session; the monthly synod, to be held by the Chorepiscopi, answering to their presbyteries; the diocesan synod to their provincial, and the national to their general, assembly. The meeting of the dean and chapter, practised in the Church of England, is but a faint shadow of the second,—the ecclesiastical court, of the third,—and the convocation, of the fourth.

It seems there was not a perfect uniformity among all the primitive churches in this respect; the power of the bishops seems to have prevailed early in Rome; that of the presbytery at Alexandria; and at Carthage, such a discipline as comes nearest to that which is now called Congregational.

SCHOLIUM 5.

It seems to be solidly argued from 1 Tim. v. 17. that there were in the primitive church some elders who did not use to preach. Nothing very express is said concerning them; only it seems to be intimated in James v. 14. that they prayed with the sick. It may be very expedient, even on the principles of human prudence, to appoint some of the more grave and honourable members of the society to join with the pastor in the oversight of it, who may constitute a kind of council with him, to deliberate on affairs in which the society is concerned, and prepare them for being brought before the church for its decision, to pray with the sick, to reconcile differences, &c.; but there does not seem any sufficient warrant for making them a kind of judicatory, to whose decisions the rest of the society is to submit; and those rules relating to presbyteries, classes, provincials, and general assemblies, which are determined by the constitution of the Church of Scotland, most evidently appear to be at best merely matters of human discretion, and to have no express foundation in the word of God; nor can we trace the existence of such ruling elders higher than Constantine's time.

Maurice Social Rel. p. 143. Whit. on 1 Tim. v. 17. Blond de Jure Pleb. Thornton on Relig. Assemb. p. 96.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It is a very precarious and uncomfortable foundation for Christian hope, which is laid in the doctrine of an uninterrupted succession of bishops, and which makes the validity of the administration of Christian ministers depend upon such a succession, since there is so great a darkness upon many periods of ecclesiastical history, insomuch that it is not agreed who were the seven first bishops of the Church of Rome, though that church was so celebrated; and Eusebius himself, from whom the greatest patrons of this doctrine have made their catalogues, expressly owns that it is no easy matter to tell who succeeded the apostles in the government of the churches, excepting such as may be collected from St. Paul's own words. See Euseb. quoted Prop. 150. § 1. No. iv. Contested elections in almost all considerable cities make it very dubious which were the true bishops; and decrees of councils, rendering all those ordinations null, where any simoniacal contract was the foundation of them, makes it impossible to prove, at least on the principles of the Romish Church, that there is now upon earth any one person who is a legal successor of the apostles; and renders hereditary right as Calamy's Life of Baxt. vol. i. p. 122. Chand. ag. Popery, p. 34. Howe's Episc. p. 174.

SCHOLIUM 7.

Mr. Jones has undertaken to prove at large, that the ordination of our English bishops cannot be traced up to the Church of Rome as its original; that in the year 668, the successors of Austin the Monk, (who came over A. D. 596) being almost entirely extinct, by far the greater part of the bishops were of Scottish ordination, by Aidan and Finan, who came out of the Culdee monastery of Columbanus, and were no more than presbyters; though, when the princes of the northern nations were converted by them, they made them bishops, (i. e. gave them authority over the clergy,) and took other bishops from amongst their converts. So that denying the validity of Presbyterian Ordination, shakes the foundation of the Episcopal Church of England.

It is the duty of Christians to observe one day in seven, and the first of the week, as a day of religious rest, and public worship.

DEMONSTRATION.

Prop. 76. gr. 6. 1. Natural religion requires that there should be certain seasons of solemn public worship, universally agreed upon among the members of the same society; but it does not determine how often they should occur, nor what proportion of our time should be employed in them.

2. Were there no intimation from the word of God upon this head, it would, nevertheless, be decent to pay some regard to the laws and usages of our country, so far at least as to abstain from such public labours as they forbid, and to assemble at some place of public worship; and (cæt. par.) at times so recommended, rather than at other times; which will afford one evident reason for the observation of the first day of the week among us.

Wright on the Sabbath, p. 165.

3. God appointed for the Jews the observation of a weekly Sabbath, (Exod. xvi. 23; xx. 8—11.) and the rest there appointed, is said to be in commemoration of God's having rested the seventh day from his work of creation.

3. 4. This may be considered by us as an intimation of the proportion of time to be given by us to a religious rest; and so much the rather, as the observation of one day in seven seems to have been appointed to Adam in innocence, (Gen. ii. 3.) which is unnatural to understand by way of prolepsis. Comp. Heb. iv. 3, 4.

Wotton's Misc. vol. i. p. 201.

Nor is it improbable that this might lay a foundation for dividing time into weeks, as so many of the ancient nations did. Compare Gen. viii. 10, 12; xxix. 27; l. 10. See the references to Grotius and Selden, under Prop. 109. gr. 2.

Strauch. Chronol. lib. ii. c. ii. § 13. Allix on Scrip. vol. i. p. 25. Watts on Holy Times, p. 5. Kennicott's Dissert. p. 157.

5. The peculiar place which this command had in the Mosaic law, as being a part of the ten commandments delivered by God's own voice from Mount Sinai, and written as with his own hand on tables of stone, among moral precepts of the highest importance, may further recommend it to some distinguishing regard.

1, 2, 4, 5. 6. It seems expedient that we in this country, and other Christians, should observe one day in seven to the religious purposes above mentioned; and so much the rather, as our engagements to the service of God are so great, and we are excused from those solemnities which the Jews observed at the Feast of the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, besides other sacred times.

7. The apostles, who bore such eminent offices in the church, and were the appointed interpreters of the will of Christ, though they did observe the Jewish Sabbath, resting, that they might not give offence, as well as for the opportunity of meeting and preaching to the Jews attending in their synagogues, (Acts xiii. 14, 15, 42, 44; xvi. 13; xviii. 4.) did also observe the first day as a day of religious worship, which (waving John xx. 19, 26.) appears from Acts xx. 7. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Hence this was called the Lord's Day, (Rev. i. 10.) as it might very properly be, since on this day Christ rose from the dead, and the Spirit probably descended on the apostles. Dr. Whitby also contends for that argument from Heb. iv. 3. (vid. Whitby in Loc.) but it seems not convincing.

8. The most ancient writers in the Christian church agree in assuring us, that the observation of the first day prevailed early and constantly in it. Ignatius calls this the Queen of Days. Melito wrote a book concerning it. Justin Martyr and Tertullian, in their Apologies, speak very expressly of stated Christian assemblies held on this day; not to mention Clemens Alexandrinus, and many more: and Pliny likewise speaks of it as the sacred day of the Christians, a very few years after the death of St.

John. Now we can hardly imagine that such an observation should so early and so universally have prevailed (for we find not that it was ever disputed) had not the apostles directed to it.

9. There is no command in the New Testament whereby Christians are obliged to observe the seventh day; but, on the contrary, the apostle plainly intimates that it is abolished. Col. ii. 16.

7, 8, 9. 10. There is reason to believe that the weekly sabbath now to be observed by Christians, is not the seventh day, but the first. Compare gr. 2. 6. 10. 11. Valet propositio.

LECTURE CXCIX.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Against the fourth step of the preceding demonstration it is pleaded, That we do not find that the Sabbath was observed by the patriarchs; and some have thought that when it is mentioned, (Exod. xvi. 23.) it is intimated that it was before unknown by the Israelitish nation, ibid. ver. 25—27. It is answered, 1. That the texts quoted above will not prove that the Israelites knew nothing of the Sabbath; but, on the contrary, they rather seem to refer to it as a thing known. 2. That if the Israelites in Egypt had neglected the Sabbath, as it is probable (through the oppression of their enemies) they were forced to do, yet the patriarchs might have observed it, though that circumstance in their lives be not mentioned; and the Israelites might remember it, and esteem it a circumstance peculiarly grievous in their oppression, that they were forced to work on a sacred day:—a consideration which would tend to perpetuate its remembrance, if it were ever known. 3. The observation of the Sabbath is said by some to have been one of the seven precepts of Noah, though the authority of those from whom the account of these seven precepts is derived, must be acknowledged so dubious, that no great stress can be laid upon them, especially as some do not reckon the Sabbath among those precepts. Seld. de Jure, lib. i. c. x. p. 116.

4. The Sabbath might be observed as a day of some extraordinary devotion, though not as a day of such strict rest as was afterwards enjoined to the Jews.—5. Supposing the silence of Moses, in the very short account he gives us of the ancient patriarchs, to be ever so entire upon this head, no certain argument can be drawn from thence; for upon this principle we might argue, That the patriarchs had no stated time for the worship of God, which is very incredible; and also that the Jews did not observe the Sabbath from Moses to David, since, in the history of all that time, there is no mention of that day; as in the fifteen hundred years between the birth of Seth and the Deluge, no mention is made of sacrifices; and yet we have reason to believe they were practised in that period. —6. If it should be granted, That the observation of the Sabbath was disused among the antediluvian patriarchs, it cannot be argued from thence that it was not instituted at the Creation. The heads of the Abrahamic family were so remarkable for their devotion, that the strict observation of the Sabbath in their days might be the less necessary.

Patriar. Sab. Heyl. Hist. of Sab.†

SCHOLIUM 2.

Against the argument drawn from the fourth commandment, gr. 5. some have argued, That the pronouncing those words from mount Sinai, with an audible voice, was no proof of their extraordinary and universal obligation, since God seems to have intended to have spoken the whole law in that manner, had not the terror of the people prevented (Exod. xx. 18, &c. Deut. v. 23—28); but it is answered, 1. That God's beginning with those precepts was some intimation of their importance, especially as he well knew the fears of the people would prevent his going on to utter more in this audible manner; and indeed Deut. xi. 22. intimates a pause immediately after the uttering those words, otherwise there would have been no decent room for the people to have spoken as they did. 2. His engraving those ten commandments on tables of stone in a miraculous manner, and ordering them to be laid up in the ark, is a plain intimation of their peculiar weight, and a singular distinction worthy our regard. 3. The connexion in which this precept stands with others, which all allow to be of the highest moment and universal obligation, is to be considered as an argument that it is not merely ceremonial. Hallet on Scrip. vol. i. p. 152.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Nevertheless, we allow that the observation of the Sabbath is not to be urged as of universal obligation, merely because it is to be found in the Jewish decalogue, and that its place there only obliged the Jews, since, in the preface to those ten commandments, their deliverance from Egypt is urged as a reason for observing them; and the fifth commandment is enforced by promises peculiar to the Jews; not to insist on the addition, (Deut. v. 15.) which is probably to be considered as the words of Moses, not of God, and a comment on the fourth commandment, rather than a part of it.

See also Dr Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, vol. ii. book ii. ch. 4. There are many low Grub-Street cavils against the Antediluvian Sabbath, which are rendered by the obligation of observing the seventh day. A treatise in support of this doctrine, was published by Mr Cornthwaite, in 1730.

Hallet, ib. p. 161. Baxt. W. vol. iii. p. 778, &c.

Mr. Joseph Mede conjectures, that the day of the Jewish Sabbath was changed in the wilderness; which he endeavours to prove, by showing that they travelled on the seventh day before the first of those Sabbaths which we find they observed, (compare Exod. xvi. 1, 22—26.) and some have taken occasion from hence to assert, That the Patriarchal Sabbath was different from the Jewish, supposing Monday to be the day on which God began the creation; which, if it were, the Patriarchal Sabbath will be the same with what is now the Christian. But to this argument it is answered, 1. That the sixth day, spoken of in the fore-cited text, is not the sixth from the fifteenth of the month; but from the day on which the manna began to fall, which might be the first in the week, or in general that it might signify the sixth of the week, whenever the manna began to fall; and, 2. That allowing it were (as Mede supposes) the sixth from their journey on the fifteenth, it will not prove a change in the Sabbath; but only that before the giving the law on mount Sinai, a greater liberty of travelling, on necessary occasions, was allowed on the Sabbath; not here to insist on the possibility there is that the journey they took on the fifteenth day of the month might be only the beginning of their march from Elim to Sinai; and perhaps no more than would, after the giving of the law, have been allowed; not to urge that, upon the signal given by the cloud, they might have marched on any future Sabbath; as by special command sacrifice was offered in places not generally allowed by the law.

SCHOLIUM 4.

That the Sabbath is an institution peculiar to the Jews, some have argued from Deut. v. 15. Exod. xxxi. 13—17. Ezek. xx. 20. Neh. ix. 13, 14. Dr. Wright has endeavoured to prove, from Luke xxiii. ult. That it was also intended to oblige Christians; but he seems to forget that the persons spoken of there were then Jews.

Wright on the Sab. p. 29.

SCHOLIUM 5.

The rigour of the Jewish Sabbath is by no means to be brought into the Christian constitution, since there is such a silence in the New Testament upon that head. Watts's Works, vol. ii. p. 401.*

SCHOLIUM 6.

Some have insisted on an observation both of the seventh and the first day, as imagining that the fourth commandment, in its most literal sense, designing the particular time, as well as the proportion, is obligatory upon all Christians; but it has been answered, That in arguing thus, they are but little consistent with themselves, since that commandment requires six days of labour, as well as one of rest. Compare Schol. 3. and Dem. gr. 9.

Baxt. Works, vol. iii. p. 803.

SCHOLIUM 7.

It signifies little at what hour the Sabbath is begun, if one day be allotted to it. It is plain from Jerome, that some ancient Christians (as some foreign Protestants now do) returned to their secular employments and diversions on the evening of the Lord's Day; but then they began their Sabbath on the Saturday evening; and we are the less to wonder if the primitive Christians took some liberty this way, since they had public worship three days in the week besides, viz. Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Wright on the Sab. p. 10.

SCHOLIUM 8.

As it is impossible certainly to determine which is the seventh day from the creation, and as (in consequence of the spherical form of the earth, and the absurdity of the scheme which supposes it one great plain,) the change of place will necessarily occasion some alteration in the time of the beginning and ending of any day in question, it being always at the same time, somewhere or other, sun-rising and sun-setting, noon and midnight,—it seems very unreasonable to lay such a stress upon the particular day, as some do, or to require any stronger argument than those assigned above, gr. 7, 8, 9. for the change of it from the seventh to the first. It seems abundantly sufficient, that there be six days of labour, and one of religious rest, which there will be upon the Christian as well as the Jewish scheme.

Wallis on Sab. p. 79. Peter à Bles. Gener.

SCHOLIUM 9.

One reason why the abolition of the [illegible] and observation of the first day is no more plainly declared in the New Testament, might be out of regard to the Jewish Christians, who could not, without great difficulty and inconvenience, have come immediately into a total change, or strictly have observed

LECTURE CC.

DEFINITION XCIV.

Those rites of the Christian institution, which were intended to be solemn tokens of our accepting the Gospel covenant, peculiar to those who did so accept it, and to be considered by them as tokens of the divine acceptance, on that supposition may properly be called SEALS OF THE COVENANT.

PROPOSITION CLII.

The law of Christ requires that all who believe the Gospel should be baptized, i. e. should be separated from unbelievers, and joined to the visible Christian church, by being solemnly washed with water; which washing is, on the one hand, to signify their faith in Christ and resolution of holy obedience; and, on the other, to confirm their faith in the Gospel promises of pardon, sanctification, and eternal life.

The proposition is to be understood only as speaking of persons as yet unbaptized; and it will afterwards be inquired, Whether it extends to those to whom this rite, in its main parts at least, has been already administered, whether in infancy, or upon a false pretence of faith at riper years?

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Our Lord expressly appointed that believers should, in a solemn manner, be washed with water (Matt. xxviii. 19. Mark xvi. 16.); to which there may also be some allusion in John iii. 5. This is further confirmed by Acts ii. 41; viii. 12, 37; xxii. 16.

2. That this is to express faith in Christ in those who are baptized, and solemnly to declare their resolution of openly professing his religion, and cultivating real and universal holiness, (their obligation to which is hereby confirmed,) appears from Rom. vi. 3, 4. 1 Pet. iii. 21. Eph. v. 26.; and Tit. iii. 5. has generally been added to this catalogue, as referring to baptism;—but of that, more hereafter.

3. That God did hereby give to believers a token of the forgiveness of their sins, according to the terms of the Gospel covenant, does also appear from Acts ii. 38; xxii. 16. Tit. iii. 4—7.

1, 2, 3. 4. It appears that Christ instituted such an ordinance as baptism, for the purposes mentioned in the proposition, to those who should believe his Gospel.

5. There is no reason to apprehend that this was peculiar to the apostolic age, since the reasons on which it is founded are common to all ages; and our Lord seems to intimate its perpetual continuance in the church. Matt. xxviii. 20.

4, 5. 6. Valet propositio.

Baxt. Inf. Church Memb. p. 341.

COROLLARY 1.

It is evidently a prostitution of the ordinance of baptism, to administer it to any adult person who does not make a credible profession of his faith in Christ and subjection to the Gospel.

COROLLARY 2.

It is the duty of those by whom baptism is to be administered, to make diligent inquiry into the character of those whom they admit to it;—whether they have a competent knowledge of the Gospel, and give reason to believe they will behave in a manner becoming members of the Christian church.

COROLLARY 3.

It is fit that baptism should be administered only by the teachers and ministers of the church, where their assistance can be had; not only because it appears that these were the persons by whom it was administered in the New Testament, but because (cæt. par.) they must be most capable of judging who are the fit subjects of it. Vid. Cor. 2.

COROLLARY 4.

There is a sense in which baptism may be called a seal of the covenant of grace; for though the benefits of the covenant are secured to every believer by the death of Christ, which was the great foundation of it,—yet baptism plainly appears by the proposition to answer to Definition 94. which is the sense in which circumcision is called the seal of righteousness of faith, by the apostle, Rom. iv. 11. and God's covenant in the flesh, Gen. xvii. 13.

Baxt. and Bedford's Lett. p. 347.

COROLLARY 5.

Baptism is not to be repeated, since it is a right of initiation into Christ's church; and though it will afterwards appear that vicious members are to be cast out,—yet there is no hint in Scripture, that when re-admitted they are to be baptized again. Compare 2 Cor. ii. 6—8. Nevertheless, consistently with this, those persons might be baptized in the name of Jesus, as the Messiah already come, who had before been baptized by John and his disciples into general expectation of a Messiah shortly to be revealed. Comp. xix. 5.

Wall on Inf. Bapt. part ii. c. v. Bens. Prop. Christ. vol. ii. p. 142. Foot on Baptism.

Though it be allowed not essential to baptism, that the names of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost should be expressly pronounced, since sometimes mention is only made of baptizing into the name of Christ, as above,—yet considering how express Matt. xxviii. 19. is, it seems highly expedient these names should generally be used; and the forecited text (Acts xix. 2, 3.) seems plainly to prove that the name of the Spirit was generally, at least expressly, mentioned in Christian baptism; and it seems essential to the ordinance, that every adult person receiving it should be instructed in the distinct characters of each of these sacred persons in the work of our redemption, and should solemnly profess a correspondent regard to each.

Tillot. Works, vol. i. p. 513.

COROLLARY 7.

The naming of the baptized person is by no means any part of this institution; and when it is used, is to be considered as an address to the person, calling him by his name, rather than as the manner of giving a name to him; though it is very probable, the custom of naming a child at baptism might arise from the practice of the Jews at their circumcision. Luke i. 59—63; ii. 21.

LECTURE CCI.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The Quakers assert, That water baptism was never intended to continue in the church of Christ, any longer than while Jewish prejudices made such an external ceremony necessary; which they argue from that passage, in which one baptism is spoken of as necessary to Christians, (Eph. iv. 5.) which, say they, must be a baptism of the Spirit. But from comparing the text mentioned above, it will plainly appear that water baptism was instituted by Christ in more general terms than will agree with this explication: that it was administered to all the Gentile converts, and not confined to the Jews, appears from Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. compare Acts x. 47. that the baptism of the Spirit did not supersede water baptism, appears to have been the judgment of Peter, and those that were with him; so that the one baptism spoken of seems to be that of water, the communication of the Holy Spirit being only called baptism in a figurative sense. As for any objection which could be drawn from 1 Cor. i. 17. it is sufficiently answered by the preceding verses, and all the many texts in which (in epistles written long after this) the apostle speaks of all Christians as baptized; and argues from the obligation of baptism, in such a manner as we can never imagine he would have done, had he apprehended it was the will of God it should be discontinued in the church. Compare Rom. vi. 3, &c. Col. ii. 12. Gal. iii. 27.

Gale's Serm. vol. ii. Lett. betw. Bp. Clayton and Penn on Baptism.

Mr. Emlyn, and several of the Socinians, have maintained, That baptism was and is only to be used by those who are converted to Christianity from a different profession, the pollutions of which are considered as washed away by it; and they assert, That though the children of such converts were to be baptized with their parents, all that descended from them after they were initiated into the Christian church were to be considered as baptized in them; and the practice of proselyte baptism among the Jews is urged, as what must direct the apostles to such an interpretation of the words of Christ. Matt. xxviii. 19. It is answered,

1. That the antiquity of this practice of proselyte baptism among the Jews is a matter of considerable debate; yet, upon the whole, there is so much probability on the side of the fact, from the tenor and genius of the Mosaic law, as well as from some incontestable passages in very early Jewish writers, that this answer is hardly to be supported.

2. That supposing it to be older than our Saviour's time, the apostles might not know all the rules relating to it, any more than common mechanics amongst us know the laws of the naturalization of foreigners, especially considering the afflicted state of the Jews at that time, which was such as would not be likely to invite strangers to incorporate with them; so that perhaps instances of this seldom occurred; and the many washings among the Jews might make this rite, as applied to proselytes, less taken notice of, especially as it might seem so very inconsiderable, when compared with the circumcision of males, which also necessarily attended their proselytism. What the rabbies say of the extraordinary solemnity with which this rite was to be administered, is far from being authentic evidence.

3. It is probable some of the rules of proselyte baptism did not prevail among them so early, particularly that which supposed that all natural relations were cancelled by it. It may therefore be difficult certainly to determine what was exactly the custom in this respect; and if we were to allow it to be such as the rabbies in after ages describe it, then it can never be imagined that our Lord would direct his apostles in all respects to conform themselves to it; and if not in all, who can say exactly in how many?

4. Though it is acknowledged, That we do not meet with any instance in the earliest primitive antiquity, in which the baptism of any child of Christian parents, whether infant or adult, is expressly mentioned,—yet it is certain that Christians in general have always been spoken of, by the most ancient fathers, as baptized persons; and the apostles, when writing to Christian churches, planted many years before the date of their respective epistles, argue with the members of them from the obligation which their baptism brought upon them, in such a manner as would lead us to conclude that they were baptized in their own persons: and it is also certain that, as far as our knowledge of primitive antiquity reaches, no unbaptized person received the Lord's supper; which yet was an ordinance, none will deny, that the descendants of Christians received. Dr. Benson adds, That on this supposition genealogies would be of great importance in religion, contrary to what St. Paul intimates; nor can we reasonably think that God would put our right to Christian communion upon a fact, the evidence of which might sometimes be so obscure as the baptism of some remote ancestor.

Whist. Life, vol. i. p. 367. Cornish on Bapt. p. 54. Jenn. Jew. Antiq. vol. i. p. 133.*

SCHOLIUM 3.

Mr. Joseph Mede supposes, not without some considerable appearance of reason, that baptism has a reference to washing a new-born infant from the pollution of the birth. Compare 1 Pet. iii. 21. Tit. iii. 5. compare Ezek. xvi. 4, 5.

Mede's Diat. on Tit. iii. 5. p. 63.

SCHOLIUM 4.

As to the necessity of baptism, some seem to have laid too great a stress upon it, as if it were absolutely necessary in order to salvation, grounding their argument chiefly on John iii. 5. Mark xvi. 16. nevertheless, it will be readily allowed, that for any to abstain from baptism, when he knows it is an institution of Christ, and that it is the will of Christ that he should subject himself to it, is such an act of disobedience to his authority, as is inconsistent with true faith.

Wall on Inf. Bapt. c. vi. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. lib. v. Cornish on Baptism, p. 86.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Some have supposed that God has connected with the administration of baptism some certain degree of the effusion of his Spirit, which the person baptized (cæt. par.) would not otherwise have received, and which always remains with the baptized persons till forfeited by some act of wilful sin: but the proof from Scripture seems very deficient on this head. The effusion of the Spirit on the baptized seems chiefly, if not only, to refer to some miraculous gift conferred upon them, not always attended with saving grace: and all that we can reasonably promise ourselves from such an institution is, that on complying with this, as with any other evangelical precept, we may more cheerfully expect the blessing and presence of God with us in our Christian course; nevertheless, God does not seem to have bound himself to this or any other ordinance whatsoever, in such a manner that extraordinary immediate influences should necessarily and inseparably be connected with it.

Clarke on Bapt. p. 11. Bennet's Christian Orat. vol. i. p. 326.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Mr. Dodwell carried the notion mentioned above so far, as to suppose that there goes along with the administration of baptism, if the person administering it be duly ordained, a certain immortal seminal spirit; whereas persons dying unbaptized are not immortal: and though Mr. Hallet does not assert it in express terms, he seems to intimate something very like it, when he expressly says, "That circumcision was that which gave the infant a right to immortality and eternal life; and that baptism in this very respect comes in the room of circumcision; yet that no infants are miserable in a future state."

Doctr. Script. Acc. of Rewards. Hallet on Script. vol. iii. p. 299.†

SCHOLIUM 7.

Upon the principles of the third and fifth Schol. above, many have maintained that baptism is the Christian regeneration, urging for that purpose John iii. 5. Tit. iii. 5. and the use of the word in primitive Christian authors, where it is certain it has that sense: but we answer,

1. That if by regeneration we are to understand that which makes a man a child of God, an heir of eternal life, according to the promises of Scripture, it is certain from the whole tenor of Scripture (vid. Prop. 137 and 145.) that baptism alone is not sufficient for this purpose: and it is plain in fact, that persons may be baptized, while they continue unrenewed and liable to divine condemnation.

2. That the utmost which the forecited text in John can signify is, that a person, in order to being a regular member of the Christian church must be baptized, having received the purifying influences of the Spirit: and if λουτρον παλιγγενεσιας in Titus, be rendered of the laver of regeneration, and explained of baptism, it can only signify the laver in which the regenerate are to be washed; and it would be as absurd to say Christians are regenerated by that, as it would be to say Christians are generated or born in the water with which the pollution of the womb is washed away.

3. That on this principle, regeneration in adult persons is a necessary preparatory to baptism, (as it is certain holiness is by the argument in the pro-

* Mr. Wakefield, in his Short and Plain Account of the Nature of Baptism, according to the New Testament, has supported the same opinion which was advanced by Mr. Emyln. On the other hand, the perpetuity of the institution is maintained by Mr. Joshua Toulmin, in his Short Essay on Baptism.

† The notion advanced by Mr. Dodwell produced a considerable controversy, which so far as related to that author's peculiar opinion concerning the efficacy of baptism, was of no consequence. But some divines were taken from new principles to discover the primitive doctrine of a future state, and the original immortality of the soul. The writers who have the principal part in the debate are Dr. Samuel Clarke and Mr. Anthony Collins. Some account of the controversy, which is now published, may be seen in the Biographia Britannica, vol. iv. p. 265. vol. v. p. 20. vol. vi. p. 370. to which, under the respective articles of Clarke, Collins and Dodwell position,) and therefore must be something different from it.

4. That nevertheless, as in the earliest days of the primitive church, persons being brought to embrace Christianity were immediately baptized, the time of their baptism and that of their conversion being spoken of as one, and as the time when they were born as it were into a new world, and joined to the family of God's children, it is no wonder that the action, by which they testified that change so lately made, should sometimes be put for that change itself: and thus illuminati also signifies the same with baptized persons; not that they were illuminated by baptism, but because they were generally baptized as soon as enlightened with the knowledge of Christianity; and it is plain that the word παλιγγενεσια is often put for any great change.

PROPOSITION CLIII.

To inquire whether the immersion of the whole body be an essential circumstance in baptism, or whether it may be administered by sprinkling, or pouring on water.

SOLUTION.

1. In favour of immersion it is pleaded, That the word βαπτιζω, being derived from βαπτω, properly signifies to plunge. On the other hand, it is urged, that in this diminutive and derivative form, it may signify any method of washing, and is sometimes used in Scripture for washing things which were not dipped in water, but on which it was poured. Compare Luke xi. 38. Mark vii. 4. and those Scriptures in which the pouring out of the Spirit is called baptism. Acts i. 5, 8; xi. 15, 16, et sim. to which some add 1 Cor. x. 2. and observe that βαπτω is never used for baptism.

Dr. Dan. Scott on Matt. xxviii. 19.

2. It is pleaded, That plunging alone represents our being buried with Christ in baptism, and consequently that this ceremony is essential. Compare Rom. vi. 4. Col. ii. 12.

Ans. It is allowed that there is in this passage an allusion to that mode of baptism which then generally prevailed; but in the institution of that ordinance, there is no declaration that it was chiefly designed to represent this; and persons were baptized, before it was generally known that Christ should die and arise from the dead. Our being cleansed from sin, seems the thing primarily intended; which may well be represented by pouring on water: and as this more naturally represents the pouring out of the Spirit, the sprinkling us with it, and the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus, it may answer as valuable purposes as that mode which more expressly represents a death and a resurrection.

3. The most considerable argument in favour of immersion is, that it was practised in the primitive ages. Several texts in the New Testament plainly declare this: Matt. iii. 6, 16. John iii. 23. Acts viii. 36—39. and it appears by the fathers, that this was at least generally retained till clinic baptism, i. e. a baptism of the sick in their beds, took place.— To this it has been answered, (waving Mr. Maurice's and Mr. Hebden's attempt to prove that baptism by immersion was never certainly used in any one instance,) 1. That though immersion might generally be used, there are some cases in which it is dubious whether the persons were plunged or sprinkled: such great numbers were converted and baptized at the day of Pentecost, that some think it would have been almost impossible to have plunged them all: nor can it be supposed, that being many of them strangers, and far from their own habitations, they had that change of raiment with them which decency, conveniency, and safety would have required on that supposition. The jailer and his family were baptized in the night. Compare Acts xvi. 33; x. 47. 2. As some circumstances attending the institution of the passover, not being essential, were afterwards varied, Exod. xii. 11. and as some who insist on immersion, allow a change in some circumstances as to the administration of the Eucharist, both as to time and gesture, and the form of the elements, we may on the same principles allow of some variation here from what was generally practised at first, especially as the coldness of the climate, and the general disuse of bathing among us, seems to require it.

It will appear hence, that they who practise baptism by immersion, are by no means to be condemned on that account, since, on the whole, that mode of baptism is evidently favoured by Scripture examples, though not required by express precept.

COROLLARY 2.

Nevertheless, considering how little stress is laid on what is merely ceremonial and circumstantial in the Christian dispensation, considering how effectually the main ends of the ordinance may be secured without immersion, and how weak some of the arguments for its universal obligation are, those who approve and practise it ought at least to be candid towards those who differ from them; and act without sufficient warrant, if they separate from such acts of communion with them, as they might otherwise esteem proper expressions of mutual love, and of their common hope in the Gospel.*

SCHOLIUM.

In answer to the argument hinted at above, from the coldness of our climate, it has been urged, That, till within these few centuries, baptism by immersion was the general practice here in England, as it is to this day in Russia: and where any particular case required such a precaution, warm water might be used instead of cold.

LECTURE CCIII.

PROPOSITION CLIV.

To give a brief view of the chief arguments for and against infant baptism; i. e. applying that external rite described Prop. 152. to infants, so far as they are capable of receiving it.

SECT. I. The arguments for it are chiefly these:—

Arg. I. The precepts of Christ concerning baptism, were to be explained by the custom prevailing among the Jews in his time. Now, as when proselytes came over to the Jewish religion, the children were baptized with the parents, the apostles would naturally conclude that children were included in the general commission. Matt. xxviii. 19.—It is answered,

1. That there is some uncertainty, Whether proselyte baptism were used by the Jews in our Saviour's time. On the whole, if infant baptism were used in proselyting persons to Judaism, it might be natural for the apostles to think of it in making proselytes to Christianity; and though it should be acknowledged, that at first they might not certainly know whether the children born after their parents' baptism should or should not be baptized, (it not being a point wherein their duty was immediately concerned,) it might, nevertheless, be afterwards revealed to them, as contained in that commission they then received, as we know the preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles was, though they did not at first know that their commission extended to it.

2. That if it did prevail, on the principles of the pædobaptists, it could not be intended as an entire model for baptism,—since it would then dissolve the nearest relations contracted before baptism, and would render it unjustifiable to baptize the children born after their parents' baptism.—It is replied, It might be a model in the leading circumstances, though not in others of a more minute kind.

Arg. II. The apostles are said to have baptized whole families, (Acts xvi. 15. 33. 1 Cor. i. 16.) and therefore probably infants among the rest.—It is answered,

1. That it is not certain there were any infants in those families.

2. If there were, it is reasonable to believe, that when it is said whole families were baptized, it is only meant that the ordinance was administered to those of the family that were the proper subjects of baptism; and it is the more reasonable to acquiesce in this interpretation, because whole houses also are said to believe. Acts xvi. 32, 34.

Arg. III. Our Lord says, Mark x. 14. speaking of infants, Of such is the kingdom of Heaven: which some understand, q. d. the rights and privileges of the Christian church belong to such.—It is answered, The word τοιουτων, there used, may signify, not those that are infants in age, but persons who in the temper and disposition of their mind resemble the simplicity and innocence of children, which the connexion seems to favour.

Henry on Christ's Favour to little Children.

Arg. IV. Circumcision, as applied to Abraham, was a seal of the righteousness of faith, (Rom. iv. 11.) or a token of his being accepted of God as righteous upon his believing; and confirmed a covenant, by which spiritual and eternal blessings were promised to him, as our Lord argues, Matt. xxii. 31, 32. and the apostle, Heb. xi. 16 in both which places it is strongly declared, that for God to call himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, implies his providing for them the blessing of a future state. The apostle does also expressly assert that Christians are the children of Abraham, as they are heirs of the blessings promised to him, Rom. iv. 11—17. Gal. iii. 6—18, 29.—Now, forasmuch as the seal of this covenant was by God's express command to be applied to infants, (Gen. xvii. 1—4.) it not only shows that there is no absurdity in supposing the seal of the covenant of grace to be so supplied, but lays a foundation for a strong presumption that the children of believers under the Christian dispensation should not be cut off from this conditional, though not absolute, token of the divine favour to them, at least without some express declaration in the New Testament for that purpose; yet we are so far from finding any declaration, that the contrary seems to be strongly intimated, (Acts ii. 39. and Rom. xi. 17, &c.) where the apostle, representing the Gentiles as grafted upon the stock of the Jewish church, and the Jews as hereafter to be grafted on their own stock, seems likewise further to imply that the privileges of the seed of believers were still the same. Some also urge Jer. xxx. 20. and Isa. lxv. 23. as expressly declaring that children should be put upon the same foundation under the Gospel as under the law; which indeed the passages do appear to intimate.—To this it is answered,

* See Mr. Bickersteth's Two Discourses on Catholic Communion; relating in particular to the reciprocal Sentiments of Churchmen and Dissenters respecting Baptism. Dr. Foster has also a discourse on the same subject.

1. That circumcision was to the seed of Abraham only a seal of a temporal covenant; but this is sufficiently confuted by what has been already observed. So that, on the whole, it appears, as circumcision sealed to Jewish infants their inheritance in the land of Canaan, and title to the peculiar privileges of the Jewish nation, on condition of their observing the Mosaic law,—so it likewise assured them that if they imitated the faith of Abraham, they should, though they had no perfect righteousness of their own, be finally accepted of God, as their father Abraham was; which was not a promise of the Mosaic law, though (as the apostle justly argues in the above-cited Gal. iii. 17.) that law could not abrogate it. See John vii. 22.

2. It is pleaded, That the Jewish dispensation, being more imperfect, is not to be made the model of the Christian; but it is replied, We ought to have strong reason to believe the latter less favourable than the former, before we grant that in any article it is so. If it be objected that infant baptism is no benefit, it will be considered afterwards.

3. To this argument, drawn from Acts ii. 39. it is replied, That the words may be understood, q. d. "Your seed in every generation shall, on their believing, receive those spiritual blessings which are now by the Gospel offered to you; and your sons and daughters shall at present receive the extraordinary communications of the Spirit, foretold by Joel, and displayed in us." But the latter part of this paraphrase does not seem to suit with what is added, to all those that are afar off, which some would explain, "Even to all those (i. e. of your descendants) that are at the remotest distance;" though I should rather think it signifies, "To those among the Gentiles who shall be converted, as well as to you." It is also to be considered, what interpretation a Jew would naturally put on these words. Much the same reply and remarks may be applied to the other texts. Some urge Gal. iii. 28. as a further illustration of this argument; supposing it a clear proof that baptism came directly in the room of circumcision; that being the only instance, except the priesthood, (from which women are by the Gospel excluded, 1 Cor. xiv. 34. 1 Tim. ii. 12.) in which there was a distinction made between persons of different sexes; and Col. ii. 11, 12. has also been urged, as expressly asserting that baptism is Christian circumcision; but it may be replied, It only signifies that baptism obliges us to that mortification, which is the true Christian circumcision.

Watts's Harm. p. 29. Foot on Baptism, p. 41.

Arg. V. The words of the apostle, 1 Cor. vii. 14. are pleaded, as having a direct reference to infant baptism; since holy often signifies those that might be admitted to sacred rites;—and unclean, those that were to be excluded from them. Exod. xix. 6. Lev. xxi. 6, 7. 2 Chron. xxiii. 6. Ezra ix. 2. 1 Sam. xxi. 5. compared with Exod. xix. 15. Lev. xi. 24, 25. and the sense will be, q. d. "Were not the matrimonial converse of a believer and unbeliever lawful, the church would not encourage the bringing such children to be baptized, which yet we know it does;" but other interpretations are brought; particularly,

1. That holy may signify legitimate; and unclean, bastards; but this, besides that it is an unusual sense of the words, would make the argument very weak, and be almost proving idem per idem.

2. That it may intimate the prospect of the conversion of the unconverted parent, and consequently of having the children bred up Christians; but they might be so educated, even though the Heathen parents were not converted; which would entirely enervate this answer. Hallet, vol. iii. p. 325.

LECTURE CCIV.

Arg. VI. Some have apprehended, that they have been able to trace such intimations at least of infant baptism, in the earliest ages of the church, as may to a high degree of probability prove it an apostolic, and consequently divine, institution.

1. Hermas says, "The baptism of water is necessary to all."

Ans. The Pastor of Hermas is a visionary book, the genuineness of which is far from being certain; but allowing it to have ever so much weight, this will only prove that baptism is necessary to those who are the proper subjects of it; but cannot determine that infants are so.

Wall on Inf. Bapt. part i. c. i. Mosh. de Rebus.

2. Irenæus (adv. Hæret. lib. ii. c. xxxix.) mentions infants among the regenerate, i. e. the baptized, as the word generally signifies in his writings.

Ans. We have only a Latin translation of this work; and some critics have supposed this passage spurious; or, allowing it to be genuine, it will not be granted that to be regenerate, always in his writings, signifies baptized; nor is it certain how far the fathers extended the period of infancy; but this last answer can be of no avail, as he distinguishes infants from parvuli and pueri.

Wall, ibid. c. iii. Gale against Wall. Up. c. i. Wallis's Def. c. xii. p. 282, &c.

3. Justin Martyr speaks of some "Who had been made disciples from their infancy," but this may only refer to their having been early instructed in the principles of the Christian religion.

Justin Martyr's Works, p. 62.

4. There is indeed a remarkable passage in The Questions and Answers to the Orthodox. (Quæst. lvi. p. 424.) which most evidently mentions infant baptism in as express terms as possible, inquiring into the different states of those children who were, and who were not, baptized at the general resurrection; but though these questions are ascribed to Justin Martyr, and are no doubt of considerable antiquity, there is no evidence that he was the author of them; nor can their age be so exactly ascertained as on this occasion, and many others, one could desire.

5. It is allowed there are many passages in Origen that expressly refer to infant baptism; but they are chiefly to be found in those translations of his Greek works which were done by Ruffinus and Jerome, who made some very bold alterations according to their own judgment and taste; but this is not applicable to all the passages brought from him; and it is to be remembered, that he was born of Christian ancestors; and his father having been martyred in the year 202, when Origen himself was 17 years old, the remoter Christians of his family must probably have been nearly contemporary with the apostles. It may be added, that the translations of Jerome, which are often referred to on this occasion, were by no means so lax as those of Ruffinus.

Wall's App. p. 11. Wall's Def. p. 372.

6. Cyprian is allowed by all to speak expressly of infant baptism as generally used in the church; but it is justly answered, That he speaks as expressly of infant communion in the Eucharist; and consequently that the divine original of the latter may as well be argued from him as that of the former; yet almost all pædobaptists allow that to be an innovation.

7. Tertullian advises parents to defer the baptizing of their children, except where their lives were in danger; which plainly shows it was used in his time. This the antipædobaptists allow, and suppose the practice arose first in Africa, and then came generally to prevail elsewhere, from the mistaken apprehension that baptism was absolutely necessary to salvation.

8. In the Apostolic Constitutions, which are allowed to be an ancient, though not a divine, book, there is express mention made of infant baptism, as commanded by Christ, in Matt. xix. 14.

Apost. Const. lib. vi. § 16. p. 364.

It is replied, That so many superstitions are introduced in this book, that there is no reason to rely much on its authority; and that in the ritual of baptism, lib. viii. § 8. there is no rubric for infant baptism, nor any form to be used in performing that office; but it is answered, This being only the rubric for weekly worship, there is no rule for baptizing, any, the prayers relating only to those already baptized, and those words of the deacon, § 12. Let the mother receive the infant, make it plain that at least communion, as well as infant baptism, was then used; which indeed enervates any arguments that are brought from the supposed antiquity of these Constitutions.

SECT. II. Arguments against infant baptism.

Arg. I. It is pleaded, That infants are incapable of complying with the terms required, in order to baptism, i. e. repentance and faith, and of receiving those instructions which Christ directed as previous to it. Matt. xxviii. 19. Compare 1 Pet. iii. 21.

It is answered, That those instructions and conditions were only required of those who were capable of them: thus, had Christ sent his apostles to proselyte men to the Jewish religion, he might have said, "Go, proselyte all nations, circumcising them in the name of the God of Israel, and teaching them to observe all things which Moses had commanded." As for the word μαθητεύσατε, which some understand of preaching previously to baptism, it may signify make disciples, and that infants may be comprehended under that name, some have argued from Acts xv. 10.

Gale ag. Wall. Whit. on Matt. xxviii. 19. Cornish on Baptism, p. 165.

Arg. II. It is said that infants are incapable of receiving any benefits by baptism, and consequently that the ordinance is exposed to contempt by applying it to them.

It is answered, 1. That it may be on many accounts both useful and comfortable to the parents, for whose sake it might perhaps be chiefly ordained. 2. That it may lay a foundation for serious and affecting addresses to the children, as they grow up (compare Deut. xxix. 10, 11); and, by the way, we may observe the difference between the expression there, and those used Neh. x. 28. which seems to have its foundation in the particular engagements relating to marriage, and in those relating to the one-third part of a shekel, which they seemed voluntarily to impose upon themselves as an annual tribute; on which account it was natural to assemble the adult only. 3. That being thus entered into Christ's visible church, they have a share in the prayers offered for that church in general; to which some have added, that it is proper the ministers and elders of each respective society should maintain some particular inspection over the children belonging to it, to which inspection their being baptized may give them some additional title; but it is by a very particular turn of thought that Mr. Morrice, in his Dialogues, argues that such relation to the church may bring them within the reach of its censures, in case of gross misbehaviour, which, if allowed, may be a considerable benefit; but perhaps it may be urged, that the counterpart to this is admitting them to the Lord's table, if they do nothing to deserve censure. 4. That considering circumcision as a seal of the covenant of grace, both this and the preceding argument would have lain as strongly against applying that, as applying baptism to infants; and indeed it is plain from that institution, as also from Christ's being baptized himself, that an ordinance may be sometimes administered to those who are not capable of all the purposes for which it was originally instituted, and which it may answer to some others.

Calv. Inst. l. 4. c. xix. Towg. Inf. Bap. p. 48.

Arg. III. The silence of the New Testament upon this head, is further urged as an argument against infant baptism,—it being said to be improbable that, if Christ had intended it, he should not have commanded it as expressly as Moses commanded circumcision.

It is answered, That consequential arguments are to be allowed their weight, as appears from our Lord's proof of a resurrection (Matt. xxii. 31, 32.); and it has been pleaded on the other side, that had Christ intended to have cut off the infant seed of believers under the Christian dispensation from any privileges which they enjoyed under the Mosaic, he would have expressly declared it, or at least would have guarded against any thing that looks like an encouragement to expect and claim them; which, from § 1. it evidently appears he has not.

Foot's Letters, No. 2.

Arg. IV. The silence of the primitive fathers upon this head has been much insisted upon; and it is said that some passages in them strongly oppose infant baptism, particularly that of Justin Martyr; in which he says, That a profession of faith is necessary in order to baptism; which notion gave occasion to the use of sponsors, when infant baptism was introduced.

It is replied, That Justin speaks of the adult, or may consider the confession of the sponsor as the child's, being made in his name; which is the more probable, as subsequent fathers use the same language, long after infant baptism was confessedly the prevailing practice.

Wall's Def. p. 101. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. p. 335.

Tertullian is known to have declared against infant baptism, except in case of danger. Gregory Nazianzen advises to defer it till three years old. Basil blames his auditors for delaying it,—which implies there were then many unbaptized persons among them; but these might not perhaps have been the children of Christian parents; which answer may also serve to the argument brought from the case of those who, like Constantine, deferred baptism to their death, on a foolish apprehension that all sins committed after it were unpardonable. It is indeed surprising that nothing more express is to be met with in antiquity upon this subject; but it is to be remembered, that when infant baptism is first apparently mentioned, we read of no remonstrance made against it as an innovation; and that as we have no instance of any persons expressly asserted to have been baptized in their infancy, so neither of any children of Christian parents baptized at years of discretion; for it is certain Constantine's father did not profess himself a Christian till long after he was born.

Whist. Bapt. Gale. Epist. ix. Wall on Inf Bapt. part i.

COROLLARY.

Since there is so great an obscurity on the question, and so many considerable things may be advanced on both sides, it is certainly very reasonable that Christians, whose persuasions relating to infant baptism are different, should maintain mutual candour towards each other, and avoid all severe and unkind censures on account of such difference.

Berry-st. Lec. vol. ii. p. 206. *See Wall, Gale, Rees, Stennett, and Baxter, on Baptism.

SCHOLIUM.

A further question, distinct from any yet handled, may arise concerning baptism, i. e. Whether it is to be repeated, if it have been received by those who were not the proper subjects of it? It seems that it should not: since it is evident, that when persons have been cast out of the Christian church for their immoralities, the apostle, in the directions

* The question concerning infant baptism has been treated by so many learned writers, that it is impossible for the author to refer to them all; many references may be found in the controversies upon that subject mentioned in the margin. We should recommend a list of such writers to the notice of students, but for the want of our knowledge. Limborch and the generality of the Arminians are very favourable. he gives concerning their re-admission on repentance, does not direct their being rebaptized: nor does Peter hint any thing of that kind to Simon Magus, Acts viii. 20, &c.; and perhaps had the contrary principle been admitted, and encouraged in Scripture, difficulties might have arisen, which it was best to avoid, and too great a stress have been laid on what was merely ritual. As for the argument urged from Acts xix. 1—5. it is certain it cannot authorize the repetition of Christian baptism, since that of John could not be so called; and it is certain that the person there spoken of had not been baptized so much as by John the Baptist himself, or in a manner agreeable to the exact tenor of his baptism. Whist. Life, vol. ii.

LECTURE CCVI.

PROPOSITION CLV.

The law of Christ requires, That Christians, throughout all ages of the church, should in a solemn manner eat bread and drink wine in their religious assemblies, as a commemoration of his death, and a token of their engagements to be imparted to them, and a badge of their mutual affection to each other.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. Christ did in a solemn manner set apart bread and wine after the paschal supper, distributing each to his disciples for the purposes afterwards to be mentioned. Matt. xxvi. 26—28. Mark xiv. 22—26. Luke xxii. 14—20. 1 Cor. xi. 20, &c. compare Acts ii. 42, 46.

2. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and Paul, in the forecited places, agree that this rite was intended for a commemoration of Christ, and a representation of his body broken and his blood shed; which must intimate that we are hereby publicly to own that we are not ashamed of avowing ourselves the disciples of a crucified Master, and that we desire to impress our minds with a scene of such great and awful importance.

3. As the above-mentioned writers agree that Christ, in delivering the cup, declared it to be the new covenant of his blood, or a token and representation of that covenant which was established by his sufferings, this must imply, that those who would attend the institution aright must consider the nature of this covenant, must consent to the demands of it, and in so doing, may cheerfully expect the blessings communicated by it.

4. As eating and drinking together is a social action, and as, by the preceding step, eating and drinking in this ordinance represents our common relation to Christ, it does, by consequence, remind all Christians of their intimate relation to each other; and the apostle also represents it in this view. 1 Cor. x. 16, 17.

Elsner's Obs. vol. ii. p. 106. Whitby in Loc. Chandler's Serm. vol. iv. p. 351.

5. That this rite was intended for continued use in the Church of Christ, appears from the early testimonies of Pliny, Justin Martyr, Ignatius, and all the oldest writers, which assure us that it was in fact practised even from the apostles' time; as also from St. Paul's declaring that hereby we show forth the Lord's death till he come (1 Cor. xi. 26.) and it may further be urged, from the ends of the ordinance specified above; for if it were necessary for those that saw Christ suffer, or lived in the age when that great transaction passed, thus to commemorate his death, and in this solemn manner to renew their engagements, when the assistances and evidence arising from the extraordinary communications of the Spirit were so peculiar; if it were necessary by this token to express and cherish their mutual love, when there were such peculiar bonds of endearment, arising from their being a little number so severely suffering in the same cause, it is certain that we, who do not enjoy any of their advantages, must much more need it for the like ends.

COROLLARY 1.

There cannot be a change of the elements of bread and wine into the substance of Christ's body and blood, as the Papists maintain; because, waving all the absurdity with which such a doctrine is pregnant, and the many instances in which a thing is said to be, what it is only intended to represent, (see Gen. xvii. 10; xli. 26. Ezek. v. 5. Dan. vii. 23. John xv. 1; x. 9; 1 Cor. x. 4. Rev. xvii. 9.) if these elements were the very body and blood of Christ, they could not be the commemoration of it, which nevertheless we have shown above that they are. Hoadly, p. 24.

[*] A very large controversy concerning the nature and design of the Lord's Supper having been published since Dr. Doddridge's Lectures, a few tracts of a smaller size may be mentioned. Dr. Taylor of Lowestoft opposed to Dr. Sykes's Principles in Defence of the Scripture Doctrine of Atonement, &c. Dissertation the Second, by Mr. Taylor, the Doctrine of Atonement, &c. Dissertation the Second, by Mr. Taylor, the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper, by the learned Dr. Owen Ashton in Defence of the Scripture Doctrine of Atonement, &c. Dissertation the Second, by Dr. Doddridge, and the Preliminary Dissertation Answered. But the most elaborate work upon this point is Dr. Bell's Address to Dissenters and Churchmen, the Authority, Nature, and Design of the Institution of Christ, commonly called the Communion, with Dr. Lardner's Sentiments. Different extracts of this work were given by Rational Reader, in the Letter to Dr. Bell. A recommendation to the perusal of Dr. Bell's publication. An Inquiry, in which many Doctrines relating to the Nature and Effects of the Lord's Supper, are severely examined by the Doctrines of our Lord, contained in the words of Institution of the Gospel of St. James's. An appendix to Dr. Cardale's Answer to the Dissertation concerning the Holy Nature of the Lord's Supper, and other works which have appeared in defence of the Scripture Doctrine by Mr. Wilkes, Dr. Worthington, Rational Worshipper, and Dr. Cramer. See their publications on the subject. An answer to Dr. Worthington appeared in Remarks upon the Scripture. Dr. Cardale's Hypothesis has been supported by Dr. Bell.

COROLLARY 2.

There cannot be a propitiatory sacrifice offered to God in this ordinance; because it is the commemoration of that sacrifice which is frequently said to be offered once for all. Heb. ix. 26—28; x. 10, 14.

Hoadly, p. 47. Bret against Hoadly, p. 69.

COROLLARY 3.

Considering the ends for which this ordinance was instituted, it is plain that it ought to be approached with great solemnity and serious consideration: and though the charge of examining themselves, given to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xi. 27, 28. does indeed refer peculiarly to the gross immoralities which prevailed among them in this respect, —yet the words are expressive of a general duty: but the Gospel lays down no directions as to the time to be spent in preparation, which to be sure in different circumstances may and ought to be different; nor does it appear that any Christian, who in the general behaves agreeably to his profession, need scruple to use this ordinance on a few minutes' recollection, when he has an opportunity to do it.

Burnet's 4 Disc. p. 327—329.

COROLLARY 4.

Those who are guilty of such scandalous immoralities, that we cannot reasonably believe they are in good earnest in their Christian profession, ought not to be encouraged to approach this ordinance, till they have discovered the sincerity of their repentance by the reformation of their lives.

Burn. on the Art. p. 289. Humphries's Free Admission, &c.

COROLLARY 5.

It follows from the preceding corollary, that those who behave in so profligate a manner, as to bring a disgrace upon their Christian profession, ought on proper conviction to be excluded, by the society to which they belong, from the participation of this holy ordinance, till they give sufficient proof of their repentance. By this means they may perhaps be reformed, others warned, the honour of religion secured, and a friendly communion of Christians in this institution promoted. Accordingly, we find that this has been customary among the churches from their earliest foundation; and is evidently countenanced, and indeed in effect required, by the following Scriptures, 1 Cor. v. 3—7, 9—13. 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14. 1 Tim. i. 20. 2 John v. 10, 11. It is allowed indeed, that the delivering to Satan, mentioned 1 Cor. v. 5. may probably refer to some diseases inflicted by a miraculous power (compare Prop. 117. No. ii. § 1.); but the apostle's general rule in the concluding verses of that chapter, must by a parity of reason prevail, where the extraordinary power is ceased.

COROLLARY 6.

Any constitution, by which any member of the Christian church, how great soever his rank may be, shall be rendered incapable of being excommunicated if he behaves amiss, is inconsistent with the Scripture plan; and any constitution, by which temporal punishment shall be inflicted upon those who fall under the censure of a church, in consequence of such censure, must in like manner be an incumbrance, rather than advantage for the proper exercise of discipline.

COROLLARY 8.

The Church of Rome has been guilty of a most sacrilegious usurpation, in denying the use of the cup to the laity in this ordinance.

Burr. View of Pop. p. 76.

COROLLARY 9.

Solitary Masses, i. e. the celebration of the Lord's Supper in secret by the priest alone, are to be condemned as inconsistent with one part of the design of this ordinance, i. e. its being a pledge of mutual love among Christians. (Vid. gr. 4.) Nevertheless, if a few should join with a sick person in receiving it in private, in some cases it may be very allowable, as not liable to this objection.

Cas. Consult. p. 218.

COROLLARY 10.

To make the receiving this ordinance a qualification of admittance to any office in or under the civil government, is evidently a profanation of the ordinance itself: not to insist upon the natural iniquity of excluding peaceable and loyal subjects from places of trust and profit, merely on account of their religious opinions.

COROLLARY II.

The custom of administering the Lord's Supper to condemned criminals just before their execution, is both absurd and dangerous; as there is generally little room to imagine they can be suitably qualified for it: and it is natural for them to consider it as a token that they are already in a state of pardon and acceptance with God; which may prevent their employing the few remaining moments of life in a manner suited to their circumstances, and may harden others in such vain and presumptuous hopes. Old Whig, No. lxv.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It plainly appears from the most credible account of the primitive church, that the Lord's Supper was used much more frequently among them than with us; and that it made a part of their public worship every Lord's Day.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some have objected against our translation of Matt. xxvi. 26. (compare Mark xiv. 22.) where we render εὐλογήσας, blessed it, whereas they suppose it signifies Christ's giving thanks to God when he brake the bread, compare Luke xvii. 22. 1 Cor. xi. 24. whence they infer that the consecration of the elements has no foundation in the original institution. As for the text in question, it must be allowed to be ambiguous; but as the word [it] must be understood after [brake] though it be not expressed, there is the less reason for censuring our translation; especially since the apostle so expressly speaks of our blessing the sacramental cup 1 Cor. x. 16. which cannot without great violence admit of Bishop Hoadly's interpretation, q. d. "The cup over which we bless or adore God." That may with great propriety in the language of Scripture be said to be blessed, which is in a solemn manner set apart from a common to a sacred use, Gen. ii. 3. and we may be said to bless it, when we solemnly pray that God may attend it with such influences from above, as may make it the occasion of edification to our souls. Compare Mark xi. 9—11.

Hoadly's Plain Acc. p. 32. Brett against Hoadly, p. 19. Howe's Episcopacy, p. 107.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is greatly to be lamented that Christians have perverted an ordinance, intended as a pledge and means of their mutual union, into an occasion of discord and contention, by laying such a disproportionate stress on the manner in which it is administered, and the posture in which it is received. As to the latter, a table posture seems most eligible, as having been used by Christ and his apostles, and being peculiarly suitable to the notion of a sacred feast, in which as children we are invited to attend the board of our heavenly Father, and feast, as it were, upon the great sacrifice: and kneeling, which was never introduced into the church till transubstantiation was received, may prove an occasion of superstition. Nevertheless, provided it be not absolutely imposed as a term of communion, it will be the part of Christian candour to acquiesce in the use of it in others by whom it is preferred. It appears that standing was at least frequently used in the Christian church, viz. always on the Lord's Day, and between Easter and Whitsuntide.

Pierce's Vind. of Diss. p. 489. Burn. Dict. p. 321. Hooker's Eccles. Polity, p. 244.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Whether the Lord's Supper should be administered at noon, or in the evening, is a question of very small importance. It is true our Lord instituted it in the evening; but probably later than our assemblies are ordinarily held. The primitive Christians often communicated in the morning before day; the reason of which probably was, that they made it the last act of their worship, and assembling by night, for fear of their persecutors, and spending most of the night in reading, preaching, prayer, and singing, the celebration of the Eucharist would naturally be driven off till morning. This shows, however, that they did not lay any great stress upon the time. Some urge that dinner-time, being our chief meal, answers to the supper among the Jews. Perhaps the evening suits best with the convenience of religious retirement immediately after it. But it is most reasonable to

SCHOLIUM 5.

Mr. Peirce has at large contended for the admission of infants to this ordinance, pleading the use of it even unto this day among the Greeks, and in the Bohemian churches, till near the time of the reformation; but especially from the usage of the ancient churches, as it appears from many passages in Photius, Augustin, and Cyprian. His proof from the more ancient fathers is very defective. His arguments from Scripture chiefly depend upon this general medium, that Christians succeeding to the Jews as God's people, and being grafted upon that stock, their infants have a right to all the privileges of which they are capable, till forfeited by some immoralities, and consequently have a right to partake of this ordinance, as the Jewish children had to eat of the passover and other sacrifices; besides this, he pleads those texts which speak of the Lord's Supper as received by all Christians.

The most obvious answer to all this is, that which is taken from the incapacity of infants to examine themselves, and discern the Lord's body: but he answers, That this precept is only given to persons capable of understanding and complying with it, as those which require faith in order to baptism, are interpreted by the Pædobaptists.

As for this argument from the Jewish children eating the sacrifice, it is to be considered that this was not required, as circumcision was;—the males were not necessarily brought to the temple till they were twelve years old, (compare Luke ii. 42.) and the sacrifices which they ate of were chiefly peace-offerings, which became the common food to all that were clean in the family, and were not looked upon as acts of devotion, to such a degree as our Eucharist is, though indeed they were a token of their acknowledging the divinity of that God to whom they had been offered, (compare 1 Cor. x. 18.) and even the passover was a commemoration of a temporal deliverance; nor is there any reason to believe that its reference to the Messiah was generally understood by the Jews.

On the whole, where infant baptism appears dubious, it ought certainly to be an argument against infant communion; because the objections that are made to the former, lie with yet greater weight against the latter; and because the disuse of infant communion prevents many of the inconveniences that may be apprehended from the practice of baptizing infants. It is certain there would be more danger of a contempt arising to the Lord's Supper, from the admission of infants, and of confusion and trouble to other communicants; so that not being required in Scripture, it is much best to omit it. When children are grown up to a capacity of behaving decently, they may soon be instructed in the nature and design of the ordinance; and if they appear to understand it, and behave for some competent time of trial in a manner suitable to that profession, it would probably be advisable to admit them to communion, though very young; which, by the way, might be a good security against many of the snares to which youth are exposed.

SCHOLIUM 6.

The foundation of the practice mentioned in the preceding scholium, seems plainly to have been a mistaken apprehension of the absolute necessity of this ordinance, in order to salvation; which doctrine was built upon an erroneous interpretation of John vi. 53. which, with the preceding and following passages, we have not quoted above, for the explication of the Scripture doctrine of the Lord's Supper, since they will make so good a sense, if we suppose them only to relate to believing regards to Christ, as the great support of the spiritual life. Compare John vi. 63.†

SCHOLIUM 7.

Many have stated the doctrine of this ordinance so as to represent it as if it were a kind of charm, and have supposed that some extraordinary communications of divine influence are universally annexed to it, or at least to a regular and serious attendance upon it; which has been grounded in a great measure on John vi. 54, 55. together with some very high things which the fathers have said of the efficacy of it: but if we follow Scripture alone, it will only appear to be an instituted means of our communion with God, in a regular attendance on which we may hope that God will meet us and bless us, as in other ordinances of divine institution; but cannot say that he has invariably tied himself up to it; nor does experience agree with such a notion. SCHOLIUM 9.

When the Scripture doctrine relating to baptism and the Lord's Supper is attentively considered, it will appear that there is no foundation for drawing any objection from them against the truth of Christianity,—since the rites themselves are so simple, and their natural tendency to promote good impressions on the mind so obvious; and it is greatly for the credit of the Gospel that these, in their Scriptural simplicity, should be compared with the rituals of other religions, as delivered to us by the most authentic writers (Prop. 96. Cor.); as it is also to the credit of the Protestant cause, that they should be compared with those numerous, perplexing, absurd, and idolatrous additions which the Church of Rome has made to them, whereby each of them is rendered the least part of itself.

DEFINITION XCV.

The ordinances which were instituted by Christ, to be used by all Christians as seals of the covenant of grace, (Def. 94.) may properly be called SACRAMENTS.

COROLLARY.

Baptism and the Lord's Supper are sacraments. Comp. Prop. 152. Cor. 4. Prop. 155. Cor. 7.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The controversy, Whether there be any more sacraments than these, is evidently a question about words. If our definition of it be admitted, it is certain that neither holy orders, (as they are called,) nor matrimony, nor extreme unction, are Christian sacraments, since all allow that at least the two former were not intended for all Christians; and there is no proof that the anointing the sick was to continue longer than the gifts of healing; nor was that, properly speaking, extreme unction, which is a ceremony merely of human device.

The cross in baptism, as some have stated it, seems to have much of the nature of a sacrament, only that it wants a divine institution.

Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. v. § 65. p. 226.

The definition of sacrament which some have given, i. e. "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace," is very obscure, unless it supposes some divine influence of an extraordinary nature inseparably annexed to the outward sign; and if this be the meaning of it, there is reason to question whether there be any sacrament at all. Comp. Prop. 152. Schol. 5. Prop. 155. Schol. 7. Limb. Theol. l. v. c. 66.

SCHOLIUM 2.

When the doctrine of confirmation, as stated by the Church of England, is compared with their definition of a sacrament, it must be acknowledged to be one, distinct from baptism and the Lord's Supper; for the laying on the hands of the bishop upon a person professing to take his baptismal covenant upon himself, is a visible sign of his receiving the Holy Ghost, which must be an inward and spiritual grace; and it agrees with all the parts of our definition, excepting that it is not an institution of Christ; for the imposition of the apostle's hands, by which the visible gifts of the Spirit were communicated, (Acts viii. 14—18.) is something of so different a nature, that it can never be made a just foundation for continuing this rite in the view in which it is practised.

Clarke on Confir. p. 40. Hoadl. on Conf. p. 74. Calam. Def. vol. ii. p. 268. Picart's Relig. Cerem. Howe's Episc. p. 167.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The popish doctrine of penance depends entirely upon a supposition that there is a certain order of men, who, by virtue of an authority derived from the apostles, and so from Heaven, may efficaciously absolve men from the guilt of sin, appointing such a punishment to satisfy divine justice as they shall think proper; on the penitent's submitting to which the sentence of absolution is passed, and the favour of God sealed to him, as his repentance has been expressed by it. This would indeed be a sacrament, were it of divine institution; but it is built chiefly on absurd interpretations of Matt. xviii. 18. and John xx. 23. of which see Prop. 117. Cor. 1 and 5; and by what authority such absolutions are pronounced, as the English liturgy prescribes, it becomes those who venture to act upon it very seriously to consider; as also how such a practice can be reconcilable with the essential principles of the protestant religion.

Scudder's Chris. Daily Walk. p. 42. Mandev. Free Thoughts. p. 118.

Some have thought that Christ, in washing his disciples' feet, instituted a Christian sacrament, taking the word sacrament not strictly in our sense, but in general for a religious rite instituted by Christ; and have urged John xiii. 13—15. as express words of institution; but they may be fairly understood as a general declaration of the obligation which Christians are under to condescend to each other; and it is to be considered, that, in cold countries, the washing each other's feet would be a troublesome rather than friendly office; nor are any traces of such a religious rite among Christians to be found in the New Testament, or the most primitive writers (comp. 1 Tim. v. 10.); which plainly intimates this office was not performed by all, for then it would not have been made a distinguishing character.

LECTURE CCIX.

DEFINITION XCVI.

One person, or event, or institution, in the divine dispensations, of which an account is given us in the word of God, may be said to be TYPICAL of another and greater person or event, afterwards to appear, when there is a remarkable resemblance between the former and the latter, whether that resemblance be or be not known by the manifestation of the latter. This may be called the theological sense of the word, and τυπος has sometimes that signification in Scripture, though it is there used in some variety of senses,—sometimes expressing a model of a thing exhibited before the thing itself, whose type it is; and sometimes the copy made from thence; and sometimes simply a resemblance, without determining it to either of the former senses. Compare John xx. 25. Rom. v. 14. Acts vii. 43, 44. 1 Pet. iii. 21. 1 Cor. x. 11. Heb. viii. 5. Phil. iii. 17.

COROLLARY.

It evidently appears from the reasoning of the apostle in his epistle to the Hebrews, and from comparing the history and economy of Moses with the whole New Testament, that there were many things in the Jewish dispensation which were in this sense typical of Christ and Gospel blessings. How far the resemblance might be revealed to some saints under the Old Testament, we cannot certainly determine; but the observation of that resemblance may be a confirmation of our faith, as it is a proof of the unity of design running through the Old Testament and the New, as was observed above, Prop. 97. gr. 5. Prop. 112. Cor. 1.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It may be an agreeable employment to the pious mind, to trace out the resemblance between Christ and several persons mentioned in the Old Testament, and to observe how the deliverances brought to the people of God by them are exceeded by those brought by Christ; though there should be no apprehension at all that any of the Jews were before Christ's appearance taught to look on such persons as types of him. Doddr. 10 Serm. No. 1. ad fin.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Considering how expressly St. Paul says that the Holy Ghost signified spiritual blessings by some of the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, (Heb. ix. 8.) and comparing it with several of those passages in the writings of Moses, Isaiah, and other prophets, which refer to the Messiah, and the spiritual blessings to be obtained by him, it will appear probable that the evangelical references of several Old-Testament types might be revealed to them; which might probably be one great foundation of that exalted pleasure which they found in their public ordinances and Scriptures. Compare Psal. xxv. 14; cxix. 18. 1 Pet. i. 10, 11.—compare also John viii. 56. which will be to the present purpose, whether Dr. Warburton's peculiar interpretation of the words, hinted at Prop. 120. Sol. gr. 1. be or be not admitted.

Scott's Chris. Life. Sykes on Chris. Lamb. Collat. Scrip. Jenn. Jew. Ant. vol. ii. p. 3.

PROPOSITION CLXI.

No one is by the Christian dispensation obliged to obey any part of the Mosaic law, as such, any more than he would have been if that law had never been given.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. The greatest part of the Mosaic law appears to have been of a temporary nature; part of it being intended to typify the Messiah and his kingdom (Def. 96. Cor. and Schol. 2.); many of its precepts being of a local nature, which could not be observed any longer than the temple of Jerusalem was standing, and the Jews inhabited their own land; partly as a great multitude of their laws were peculiarly suited to their particular circumstances, and intended (as was observed before) to prevent the danger of idolatry, which they might otherwise have learnt from their neighbours (Prop. 122. Sol. § 1.); to all which we may add, That it would have been impossible that all the nations of the earth, or even such distant nations as those already constituting the Christian church, should obey some of the Mosaic precepts, particularly those relating to their yearly feasts, to which some have supposed the apostle refers, Gal. iv. 26, 27.

Sykes on Chris. p. 179. Witsii Ægypt. lib. iii. c. 14. Warburt. Julian.

2. The ancient prophets foretold that the Messiah, when he appeared, should introduce a new dispensation and more perfect law, and should abrogate that of Moses. Compare Jer. xxxi. 31, 32. with Heb. viii. 6—13. Dan. ix. 27. Jer. iii. 16. Psal. cx. 4. Heb. vii. 11—19. To which we may add all those texts which declare that, under the Messiah, the Heathen nations should be incorporated with the Jews, and live under the same gracious institution; which could not possibly be effected without an alteration in the Mosaic law, as was observed in gr. 1.) Compare Isa. xix. 19. 21. Jer. xii. 17. Mic. iv. 2. Mal. i. 11. to which we may add that celebrated text Deut. xviii. 18. 19. which seems to express that a new legislator should arise.

3. The apostle expressly asserts the abolition of the Mosaic law. See the whole epistles to the Galatians, Romans, and Hebrews; as also Rom. xiv. 14. 2 Cor. iii. 9—11. Eph. ii. 14, 15. Col. ii. 14—17. 1 Tim. iv. 4; and Christ also intimated it. Compare Matt. xv. 11. John iv. 21. 23. 24.

4. The destruction of the temple, and its lying so many hundred years in ruins, whereas even the Babylonish captivity was in comparison so short, and the worship at Jerusalem even then not totally interrupted, while the temple continued desolate (compare Isa. xli. 1—5. with 2 Kings xxv. 8, 9.); together with the loss of the Jewish genealogies, and their ignorance of the signification of some words in their own law, especially the names of some of the unclean animals, may afford a probable argument that their law is abolished.

COROLLARY.

Those precepts which were delivered by the Jewish prophets, and perhaps also all kinds of positive laws instituted before the Gospel, are as much abrogated as the law given by Moses himself. Vid. Matt. xi. 13.

SCHOLIUM 1.

To this it is objected, That there are several Scriptures of the Old Testament, in which the perpetuity of the Mosaic law is asserted in the strongest terms; v. g. Gen. xvii. 13. Exod. xii. 14, 17, 24; xxxi. 16, 17. Deut. xxix. 29. and a multitude of the like texts; to which may be added Jer. xxxviii. 17—22.

To this it is replied, That the Jews must and do allow that the phrases there made use of and rendered for ever, often signify a limited duration; v. g. 1 Sam. i. 22. (compared with Num. iv. 3, 23, &c.) Deut. xv. 17. and Exod. xxi. 6. (compared with Lev. xxv. 41.) Jer. ii. 20. (compare 1 Mac. xiv. 41.), and לעולם may be rendered for the age, i. e. so long as this age or dispensation shall continue, supposing it distinguished from the age to come, or the Messiah's kingdom. Compare Matt. xii. 32. Heb. ii. 5. to which we may perhaps add Isa. ix. 6. It is certain the Jews themselves cannot vindicate some of these prophecies as true, without having recourse to such solutions as may be sufficient to answer this objection. Compare Mal. i. 11.

Berrim. at Boyle's Lect. vol. ii. Serm. 18.

It has also been objected, That Christ directly declares against a purpose of abrogating the Mosaic law, even in its least precepts. Matt. v. 17.

It is answered, That the law and the prophets sometimes signify the moral precepts (compare Matt. xxii. 40.); and as to the rest, Christ could not properly be said to destroy those institutions, which he so fully answered, as to set the purpose and wisdom of them in the most advantageous light, though, having fulfilled them, they were of course superseded.

Limb. Collat. Resp. ad Scrip. iii. p. 202.

SCHOLIUM 3.

The apostles indulged the Jews in the observation of the Mosaic law, and thought it proper themselves, in some instances, to conform to the institutions of it; but they did it upon prudential considerations, not allowing the necessity of it in order to salvation, but strongly contending for the liberty of Christians in this respect (see Acts xvi. 3; xxi. 20—29. compare Acts xv. 29.), to which we may add, That while the temple continued standing, and before the destruction of Jerusalem, the ceremonial and political law were so interwoven with each other, that it was undoubtedly expedient for converted Jews, dwelling in Judea, to comply with and observe those institutions; and the apostles' compliance with sacrifices in particular might be owing to this view of them, as a kind of tribute paid to God, under the character of their King; and was perfectly consistent with what the apostle so often declared, concerning the freedom of the Gentiles from this yoke, and the absolute necessity that Jews and Gentiles should seek their justification and salvation by Christ alone; so that the great clamour which Morgan raises upon this head, as if Paul and Barnabas on the one side, and all the rest of the apostles on the other, preached a different and inconsistent Gospel, seems very unreasonable.

Both maintained the Mosaic law to have been of divine authority, and recommended a prudential regard to it in some instances and degrees; but neither maintained its absolute necessity, nor directed to a dependence upon it for righteousness, as appears from the whole tenor of the epistles.

THE Scripture assures us, there are many created spirits distinct from men, who have a permanent existence, and who from their office are called angels; some of whom are and will continually be holy and happy, whereas others are in a state of apostasy and misery.

DEMONSTRATION.

1. That there are many spirits, who have a permanent existence, and from their office are called angels, appears from Matt. xxiv. 36; xxvi. 53. Acts xxiii. 6—8.

2. That these spirits are distinct from men, or from human souls, appears from Job xxxviii. 7. Psal. viii. 5. Heb. xi. 22.

3. That some of these spirits are and will continue in a state of holiness and happiness, appears from Matt. xviii. 10; xxv. 31. Luke ii. 13, 14; xv. 10; xx. 36.

4. That others of them are in a state of apostasy and misery, is evident from Matt. x. 1; xxv. 41. Mark v. 8, 9. John viii. 44. James ii. 19. 2 Pet. ii. 4. 1 John iii. 8. Jude 6.

Casmanni Angelogr. p. 23, &c. Farmer's Diss. on Mir. ch. iii. Introd. to Anc. Univ. Hist. p. 101.

SCHOLIUM 1.

As it was observed above, Prop. 86. gr. 3. Schol. 1. That the Heathens had among them some notion of the existence of benevolent spirits superior to men,—so it seems, from some passages cited there, that they were also persuaded of the existence of evil demons: and indeed many of those deities which they worshipped were, according to their own mythology, so vicious and so malignant, as to resemble devils, rather than good angels. See the references under the scholium quoted above.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is certain that the word αγγελος, in the New Testament, does not always signify one of those beings which we call angels; but that it frequently imports no more than messenger; and is on this account applied to men (James ii. 25. Luke vii. 24; ix. 52.); to which many commentators think Acts xii. 15. should be added; and Mr. Gough contends that the word is to be taken in this sense in that celebrated text, 1 Cor. xi. 10. which he supposes to refer to the spies who were sent into Christian assemblies by their enemies, who would severely expose any indecencies observable among them.

Gough's Dissert. in Loc.

In like manner the word διαβολος does sometimes signify a false accuser, or a wicked person of the human species (2 Tim. iii. 3. Tit. ii. 3. John vi. 70.); to which may perhaps be added 1 Tim. iii. 7. but Jude 6. is by no means to be added to the instances above, as some have supposed.

Hutchins. of Witchc. p. 252.

SCHOLIUM 3.

It is a singular notion of Mr. Lowman, that, according to the Hebrew language, not only intelligent beings or spirits are called angels, but every thing that either notifies any message from God, or executes his will, and in particular all visible appearances in material symbols, as fire, air, winds, and storms (Psal. civ. 4. Compare Exod. iii. 2, 4; xiii. 21; xix. 19.); whence, by the way, he observes, that it is not necessary to suppose that Jehovah and the angel of Jehovah, mean two distinct spirits,—the one God, the other a ministering spirit (compare Gen. xlviii. 15, 16.); but the last of these texts very ill agrees with his hypothesis: for, surely, Jacob would not pray that the flame of fire might bless his grandchildren; and the apostle's quotation of Psal. civ. 4. in Heb. i. 7. determines it to a sense different from what this learned writer could give it.

Lowm. Civ. Gov. of the Heb. p. 45.

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is a very peculiar conjecture of Mr. Fleming, but it seems by no means to be sufficiently supported, that all the good angels, who have ever been employed as messengers of God to the inhabitants of earth, had been the spirits of departed saints; and particularly, that the angel who appeared to the shepherds (Luke ii. 3, &c.) was the spirit of Adam, attended by all those of his race who were then in a state of glory, who constituted the heavenly choir there spoken of, and who sung that sublime anthem on the Redeemer's birth. It is true that the Jews had a notion among them, that the departed spirits of good men officiated as angels; which may perhaps be referred to in the forementioned Acts xii. 15. (vid. Philonis Jud. Op. p. 131 and 286. and Fam. Expos. vol. iii. in Loc. and Waterland's Serm. vol. ii. p. 90, 91.) but Heb. i. 14. compared with Matt. xxv. 31. where all the angels are so expressly distinguished from the whole human race, then brought to their final judgment, plainly demonstrates this author to be in a great mistake when he carries this peculiar thought to such an extravagant height.

Flem. Christol. vol. i. p. 78.

SCHOLIUM 5.

The Scripture does not particularly inform us what was the sin by which Satan and his confederates fell from their original state of holiness and happiness. Some have conjectured that it might be their aspiring to some higher dignity than God had assigned them, and think that, on that account, they are said, in the place cited above, not to have kept the state or principality they were under την αρχην εαυτων; and for this reason pride may be called the condemnation of the Devil, supposing the Devil there to be signified (1 Tim. iii. 6.); and forasmuch as it is hardly to be imagined that they would dispute the throne with God, some have conjectured, that their crime might be refusing that homage to the Logos, which God required of the angels (Heb. i. 8.); and they have pleaded, that this supposition illustrates the harmony and beauty of the divine conduct, in making use of Christ as the great agent in destroying Satan's kingdom among men, and finally in condemning Satan to that punishment, to which he and his confederates are reserved.

PROPOSITION CLVIII.

To enumerate the chief properties of good angels mentioned in the Scriptures.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. They are immortal, and do not propagate their species. Luke xx. 36.

Baxter's Works, vol. ii. p. 189.

2. They are in a state of being superior to that of man, even in his original dignity and glory. Psalm viii. 5.

3. They are endued with extraordinary degrees of knowledge and wisdom, which are no doubt continually improving by their long experience. 2 Sam. xiv. 20.

4. They are endued with extraordinary power. Psal. ciii. 20. 2 Thess. i. 7. Compare Gen. xix. 11. and 2 Kings xix. 35. (which is strangely interpreted by Sir Isaac Newton, as referring to Tirshakah, king of Ethiopia. Vid. Newt. Chron. p. 282.); besides many other instances of the like kind mentioned in Scripture.

5. They have not such gross bodies as ours. Compare Luke xxiv. 39. with Heb. i. 7. 1 Cor. xv. 50. compare Dan. ix. 21, 23.

6. There are various orders of angels. Jude 9. 1 Thess. iv. 16. Dan. x. 13. Rev. xii. 7. Compare Eph. i. 21. 1 Pet. iii. 22. Col. i. 16.

Baxter's Works, vol. ii. p. 192. Burn. Archæol. p. 410.

SCHOLIUM 1.

Mr. Joseph Mede argues, from Zech. iv. 10 Rev. i. 4; iv. 5; v. 6; viii. 2. that there are seven archangels; but the passages referred to rather afford an occasion of conjecture than a foundation of clear and convincing argument. Compare Job xii. 15. Zech. vi. 5. Mede's Diat. on Zech. iv. 10.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Whether angels be or be not entirely incorporeal, is a question which we are not capable of determining; many have thought that it is the prerogative of the Divine Being alone to be wholly separate from matter; and some have urged, that the manner in which Christ, the Lord of angels, is confessedly united to it, affords a probable proof that they have some body. The offices assigned them at the judgment-day do likewise favour this hypothesis, and especially the forming the blessed, after the resurrection, into one society with them. Compare 2 Kings ii. 11; vi. 17.

Cleric. Pneum. § 11. c. i. Burn. de Stat. Mort. p. 170.

It is exceedingly probable that angels were created before the earth; which seems strongly to be intimated in Job xxxvii. 4. 7. The arguments brought to prove the contrary from Gen. ii. 1. and Exod. xx. 11. are sufficiently answered by observing that the heavens there spoken of may be supposed only to signify the atmosphere, or at most the luminaries of the firmament. It is also urged, that things done before the creation of our world are represented as eternal; but the limited sense of the word eternal is a sufficient reply. Compare Prop. 156. Schol. 1.

Angelogr. p. 48. Whist. Theory, p. 9. Bull's Ser. vol. ii. p. 447. *Fawcett's 4th Dial. on the other World.

PROPOSITION CLIX.

To enumerate the chief properties of wicked angels, which are mentioned in Scripture.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. That they are spirits of a very impious and malignant character, and the inveterate enemies of God and mankind, appears from the whole series of Scriptures relating to them, particularly those enumerated above.

2. Nevertheless, that they retain some considerable traces of their former knowledge, appears from 2 Cor. ii. 11; xi. 3, 14. Eph. vi. 11. Rev. ii. 24. and no doubt their skill in all the methods of deceit and mischief must be vastly improved by so long experience.

3. They are likewise possessed of considerable degrees of power, though still under a divine restraint, Matt. iv. 5—8; xii. 29. Mark v. 4—13. Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12.

4. It appears there are various orders of evil angels, who are united under one head, from the malignity of his nature called Satan and the Devil, Matt. xii. 24; xxv. 41. Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12. Col. ii. 15. Rev. xii. 7.

Gilpin on Tempt. p. 19. Bulk. Gosp. Econ. iv. 2.

COROLLARY 1.

There is great reason to adore the goodness of God in setting such bounds to the operations of these potent and malevolent spirits, as to prevent their doing that mishief to which they are naturally inclined, and which might otherwise soon turn the earth into a chaos and field of blood. Compare Job i. and ii. Matt. viii. 31.

COROLLARY 2.

Seeing there is something in the thought of such agents as these, which tends to impress the imagination in a very powerful manner, great care ought to be taken that children, from the first notice they have of the existence of such beings, be taught to conceive of them as entirely under the control of God. Watts's Catech. p. 109.

COROLLARY 3.

We may infer, that they are most certainly mistaken, who maintain that all the texts relating to the Devil are to be interpreted in so figurative a sense as to signify merely the irregular propensities of men's minds, denying the real existence of any such malignant invisible beings as are commonly supposed; to which hypothesis the story of Christ's temptation is alone an apparent and sufficient answer; not to mention the many texts, in which opposition to Satan is represented as the great design of Christ's appearance. Compare Wisd. ii. ult. Dodd. Fam. Exp. vol. i. p. 211.†

SCHOLIUM 1.

Bishop Sherlock thinks that the design of several passages in the book of Job, is to assert the superiority of God to Satan, the great principle of evil; and thus in particular he beautifully explains Job xii. 16. and xxvi. 13. Compare the Septuagint. προσαγματι δε εθανατωσε δρακοντα αποστατην.

Sherlock on Proph. p. 242. Warb. Occas. Rem. p. 66. Patrick on Job, p. 88.

SCHOLIUM 2.

As to the manner in which God cast the devils out of Heaven, there is no express account of it in Scripture. What is said in the preceding passage of Daniel and the Revelations, of an opposition between angels, particularly those of Michael and the Dragon,—has led some to imagine that God made use of the agency of good angels in expelling the evil: but if he did so, we cannot imagine any such resistance on the part of evil angels, as would occasion any pain or terror to those who, on this hypothesis, were the executioners of divine vengeance upon them.

PROPOSITION CLX.

To inquire how far good angels are concerned in human affairs.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. They are in the general the holy ministers of

* For a general dissertation on the nature and condition of angels, see Bishop Newton's Works, vol. iii. p. 538—588.

† The literal history of our Lord's temptation, and the actual operation of Satan in that transaction, are treated of by Bishop Newton, in his essay on the subject. See his Works, vol. iii. p. 92—104. On the other hand, for explanations which exclude the literal sense, reference may be had to Mr Farmer's Dissertation on the Nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness. To the Appendix to the Inquiry, to Mr Dixon's Apology of the Devil's Administration vindicated, and to Dr Fleming's Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, a Proof of a divine Mission, with a previous Dissertation upon the Proosopeion, or personalizing figure. In answer to Mr Farmer was published a tract, entitled Christ's Temptations real Facts: or a Defence of the Evangelic History; showing that the Lord's Temptations may be fairly and reasonably understood as a Narrative of what was really transacted. Concerning the Angels that sinned and the Angels that kept not their first Estate, spoken of by St. Peter and St. Jude, Mr. Henly has published a Dissertation, in which he has endeavoured to prove that these passages relate to an apostasy and rebellion upon earth, which was carried on by the sons of Cuus, under the leader Nimrod. There has lately been printed a tract, by Mr. Ashdowne, entitled An Attempt to show that the Opinion concerning the Devil, or Satan, as a fallen angel, and that he tempts men to sin, hath no real foundation in Scripture.

Divine Providence with regard to the children of men, Zech. iv. 10; i. 10. (Compare Rev. v. 6.) Dan. x. 13, 20; xi. 1. 1 Thess. iv. 16.

2. They are in a peculiar manner the guardians of the saints; and are not only the means of preserving them from danger, but likewise the instruments of conferring many blessings upon them. Heb. i. 14. Psal. xci. 11, 12; xxxiv. 7. to which add many historical passages in the Old and New Testament. See gr. 4, 5.

3. It seems that the care of angels over good men extends beyond this mortal life, and that they are appointed to conduct their separate spirits to their seats of future glory. Luke xvi. 22.

4. They have often been made use of as the instruments of inflicting judgments upon wicked men. Gen. xix. 11. Psal. lxxviii. 49. (Compare Exod. xii. 23.) 2 Sam. xxiv. 15—17. 2 Kings xix. 35. Acts xii. 23.

5. The Old Testament gives us an account of the appearance of angels to Abraham, Lot, Jacob, Moses, Gideon, Manoah, David, Elijah, Elisha, Daniel, and other prophets. In the New Testament we read of their appearance to Zachariah, Joseph, Mary, to the shepherds, to Christ, to Mary Magdalen, and the other women at Christ's sepulchre; to Peter, Paul, Cornelius, John, &c. in most of which cases they seem to have presented themselves and disappeared on a sudden: but the manner in which they now interpose in human affairs is by an invisible agency; and perhaps much may be done by the changes they produce in the weather, and by the impressions they may be enabled to make on our nerves and animal spirits, whereby such thoughts may be suggested, and such affections excited or moderated, in the mind as may greatly promote the happiness of good men, and subserve the schemes of Divine Providence.

Burnet on Art. p. 32. Hallet on Script. vol. ii. p. 258. Jennings's Abridg. of Mather's Life, p. 105. Boyse on the Ministry of Angels.

6. It seems to be intimated, that they are present in Christian assemblies, 1 Cor. xi. 10. to which some add 1 Tim. v. 21. Some also argue this from the representation of angels in the ornaments of the tabernacle and temple, Exod. xxvi. 31. 1 Kings vi. 23—26, 35. and from Eccles. v. 6. Compare Luke xv. 10. and Eph. iii. 10. but this last text may much more properly be understood of the observations which angels make on God's dealing with the church in general, than on what they can be supposed to learn from the discourses of those that officiate in its public offices.

Mede on Eccles. p. 345. Tillot. Works, vol. ii. p. 157. Doddr. and Guyse in Loc.

COROLLARY 1.

It hence appears that angels must have a very extensive knowledge of human affairs; but we cannot conclude that they are capable of certainly discerning our thoughts: it seems the peculiar prerogative of God fully to know them. Nevertheless, angels may, from external circumstances, and perhaps in particular from the alteration of the countenance, if not a view of what passes in the brain and animal spirits, be able to form very probable conjectures.

Gilp. on Temp. p. 25. Goodw. Child of Light, p. 65.

COROLLARY 2.

It appears, from comparing this proposition and the 157th with several passages in Plato, Strabo, Tully, Seneca, Plotinus, Maximus Tyrius, Hierocles, Jamblicus, and Plutarch, besides some other Heathen writers, chiefly of the Platonic sect after Christ's time, that the Heathens had a notion of the nature and offices of their inferior deities, very nearly resembling the Jewish and Christian doctrine of angels; and indeed the name of angels, and even of archangels, sometimes occurs in their writings; and it seems probable that the wiser part of their philosophers, who believed the existence of one supreme God, possessed of infinite perfections, made themselves the easier in conforming to and encouraging the popular superstition, under an apprehension that, on the one hand, there were some beings in nature and office something resembling those whom the people worshipped, (though they held their tales of them to be idle and vain,) and, on the other, apprehending that it might be very dangerous to the political interest of states to have endeavoured entirely to change their religious views; from which the fate of Socrates, and the sentence passed on Alcibiades, might also do much to deter them, out of regard to their own personal security. Compare Rom. i. 20, &c.

Cooper's Life of Socr. p. 166. Knowl. of Div. Things by Rev. only, p. 239.*

Some have thought that not only every region, but every man, has some particular angel assigned him as a guardian, whose business it is generally to watch over that country or person; and, besides general arguments from the passages quoted above, in the second step of the preceding solution, they especially urge Matt. xviii. 10. Acts xii. 15. but the argument from both these places is evidently precarious; and it seems difficult to reconcile the supposition of such a continued attendance with what is said of the stated residence of these angels in Heaven, and with Heb. i. 14. where all the angels are represented as ministering to the heirs of salvation; though as there is great reason to believe the number of heavenly spirits is vastly superior to that of men upon earth, it is not improbable that they may, as it were, relieve each other, and in their turns perform these condescending services to those whom the Lord of angels has been pleased to redeem with his own blood; but we must confess that our knowledge of the laws and orders of those celestial beings is very limited, and consequently that it is the part of humility to avoid dogmatical determinations on such heads as these. Compare Col. ii. 8.

* See particularly Apuleius, in his treatise de Deo Socratis, apud Opera, 1688 quarto, tom. ii. p. 624, 684, &c. and 630, &c. where he gives a clear and methodical explication of Plato's doctrine of demons or rather of the three Platonic doctrines of demons, their nature and offices. Apuleius assigns, as others have done, a demon to every man, which demon is in Vita eventûs Cautes et Testis.

LECTURE CCXIII.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is questioned how far angels may be instrumental in working miracles; and when they are so, how far they may be said to work them by their own natural power. That God used the ministration of angels in several of the miracles wrought by Christ, may perhaps be intimated (John i. 51.); but supposing this, and also supposing that on these occasions they only exerted a power equal to what was naturally their own, these events would nevertheless be truly miraculous, because they acted out of their own ordinary sphere, and interposed in circumstances in which God does not commonly allow them to interpose. Prop. 90. § 3.

Gilpin on Tempt. part i. c. v. § 34. Chandler on Mir. p. 17.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Some have thought that angels may have some concern in suggesting extraordinary dreams; many instances of which there are undoubtedly in Scripture (compare Matt. i. 20; ii. 13, 19.); and some remarkable instances have occurred in latter ages, mentioned by very credible authors; among which see Wotton's Life, p. 10. Walton's Lives, p. 95. Baxt. Immat. of the Soul, vol. ii. p. 17.*

SCHOLIUM 4.

It is likewise questioned, How far departed saints may be employed in services to our world, like those which the angels perform, and how far they may be acquainted with the concerns of the church here. Some suppose that acquaintance to be very considerable, and argue from Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 9; vi. 9, &c. To the two former texts it is answered, That the words may be rendered, q. d. "I am thy fellow-servant, and the fellow-servant of thy brethren;" to the latter, that there is no intimation that the spirits of the martyrs were particularly acquainted with what then passed on earth, but only that they were waiting for some singular triumph of the divine vengeance over the enemies of the church, not yet discovered to them. It may indeed make it probable that some great events relating to the church are revealed to them; though whether by immediate revelation from God, or the report of angels conversant with our world, and the spirits of the faithful more lately departed from it, we do not certainly know; however, it by no means amounts to a proof of such a circumstantial knowledge as will warrant our address to them in prayer; against which Protestants have frequently urged Isa. lxiii. 16. though the context proves the argument from thence very inconclusive. It is enough that there is no foundation for such addresses, though it should be granted there is no particular prohibition of them.

PROPOSITION CLXI.

To enumerate the chief of those instances in which evil spirits concern themselves with human affairs.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Urged by a principle of enmity to God, and envy and malice against mankind, they do their utmost to seduce men into sin; and for that purpose are no doubt employed in studying men's tempers, and making accurate observations on the various circumstances and occurrences of their lives. 2 Cor. ii. 11; iv. 4; xi. 3, 14, 15. Eph. ii. 2; vi. 11, 12, 16. 1 Thess. iii. 5. Matt. xiii. 19. 2 Thess. ii. 9, 10. 1 Pet. v. 8. Luke xxii. 31. (compare 1 Chron. xxi. 1.) Zech. iii. 1, 2. Acts v. 3. John xiii. 2, 27. (compare 1 Thess. ii. 18.)

2. They are sometimes made use of as the instruments of Divine Providence, to inflict calamities on the children of men; but all these their malicious attempts are overruled by the superior wisdom and goodness of God, to answer the purposes of his government. † Liberal views of the agency of evil spirits is carried a great way by Mr. Burgh, in his Crito. His opinion is, that all the evil, both moral and natural, which prevails in the world, is the effect of the tendency of powerful, malignant, spiritual beings, and that Christianity by the deliverance of the human species from their presence and consequent distress, as an enslaved nation is by a particular law, answered to a tyranny. See Crito, or Essays on various Subjects, vol. i. Essay the third, vol. ii. Essay the fourth.

secret and invisible manner, something correspondent to that in which good angels carry on their purposes of benevolence and friendship.

Gilp. on Temp. c. ix.

4. Nevertheless, they sometimes interpose in a more open and apparent manner; or at least in times past they have been permitted to do so; particularly in the instance of demoniacal possessions, oracles, magic, witchcraft, and violent suggestions, of which we shall more particularly speak in the following scholia.

LECTURE CCXIV.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It has been an opinion generally received, That the Devil has sometimes entered into the bodies of men, and afflicted them in a severe and dreadful manner, by a supernatural agency upon them; and it is evident that many passages in the New Testament, taken in their most obvious sense, appear greatly to favour such a notion; but Mr. Joseph Mede and Dr. Becker have long since pleaded that these demoniacs were only lunatics or epileptics; and a learned author, generally agreed to be Dr. Sykes, has lately revived the notion, in a discourse entitled An Inquiry into the Demoniacs mentioned in the New Testament; which has occasioned a great deal of debate; and the late celebrated physician, Dr. Mead, has since declared himself on that side of the question, in his late book on the diseases mentioned in Scripture. It seems therefore not improper to give a brief review of the most considerable arguments which are urged on both sides the question.

SECT. I. In defence of Mr. Mede's opinion, it is observed and pleaded,

1. That the word demon, as used among the ancients, properly signifies the soul of a dead person. Now, it would be palpably absurd to suppose that the departed spirits of wicked men are permitted to perform such operations as are pretended in this case. It is granted that the word has sometimes this signification; but it is plain, and Mr. Mede allows it, that it is not universally so, as was observed above; nor indeed is this by any means its most common sense; for though those whom the Heathens worshipped were dead men, yet their worshippers did not generally acknowledge it, but looked on the assertion as Atheism, or at least great impiety. (Prop. 86. gr. 3. and Schol.) Vid. Cypr. Op. p. 12. Ed. Fell.

Mede's Diatr. No. vi. Peggi's Exam. of Sykes's Inquiry, p. 4.

2. That among the Heathens, lunacy and epilepsy were ascribed to the operation of some demon upon such patients, who therefore were called from thence Cerriti and Larvati; but it is answered, That the question is, Whether the Heathens did not in the general represent the matter as it really was, though they might err as to the particular agent by whom they might suppose such persons to be agitated!

3. That it is not only probable, but certain, that the Jews had the same notion; for which the case of Saul when melancholy is urged, and those known passages from Jos. Ant. lib. viii. c. ii. § 5. and Bell. Jud. lib. vii. c. vi. § 3. Hudson's edit.; to which are added Matt. xi. 18; xvii. 14, 15. John vii. 20; viii. 48, 52; x. 20. where demoniacs and lunatics seem synonymous terms. The same also is urged from the account given of those said to be demoniacs, whose symptoms are the same with lunacy and epilepsy; but it is answered, That where lunacy and being possessed with the Devil are here mentioned as the same thing, it is perfectly consistent with the notion that some peculiar kinds of lunacy, and those on the whole the worst, were the effect of diabolical operation.

4. That it was by no means necessary for Christ to change the usual language, and correct these mistakes in philosophy, any more than those relating to the Ptolemaic system in astronomy.*

5. The miracle of a cure by speaking a word, was as really great and valuable in one case as in the other.

6. That it is advantageous to the Christian cause to interpret these histories thus,—because we can give no account why there should have been more demoniacs just in the age in which Christ lived, than at any other time. Mede's Diatr. No. 8.†

SECT. II. In defence of the common notion, it is answered and pleaded as follows:—

1. That the foundation of the contrary scheme, § 1. gr. 1. is entirely precarious; as it is certain the Heathens had a notion among them of evil spirits distinct from human souls; and if they had not, it would be very unreasonable to make their notion of demons the standard, by which to interpret the sense of the word in the New Testament, especially since the passages quoted from the Old Testament make very good sense on the common interpretation. Compare the Greek translation of Deut. xxxii. 17. Psal. xci. 6, xcvi. 5; cvi. 37. Isa. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 14; lxv. 11. See Peggi, ubi supra, and Trommii Lexic. in verb. DAIMONION.

* See particularly on this head, Dr Arthur Young's Dissertation on the Gospel Demoniacs.

† Two writers of eminence have more recently appeared on this side of the question. These are Dr Lardner and Mr Farmer.—See Dr Lardner's Case of the Demoniacs mentioned in the New Testament, in four Discourses upon Mark v. 19. with an Appendix. Works, vol. i. p. 429. See also his Remarks upon Dr Warren's Dissertations on it. Works, vol. xi. p. 269. Mr Farmer has written yet more copiously on the subject, in his Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament, and in his letters to the Rev. Dr Worthington in answer to his late publication, entitled An impartial Inquiry into the Case of the Gospel Demoniacs.

2. It is plainly the doctrine of the New Testament, hinted at also in the Old, that there is a number of apostate spirits, who fell from Heaven, under Satan their leader, who makes it his great business, probably in concurrence with them, to do all the mischief he can, both to the bodies and souls of men. Vid. Prop. 157. gr. 4. Prop. 159. and 161. gr. 1, 2.

3. That the demons spoken of in Scripture as possessing the bodies of men, are there represented also as the associates of Satan; and Christ's triumph over the demons is continually represented as a triumph over Satan. Matt. xii. 24—27. Luke x. 17, 18; xiii. 16. Acts x. 38. Jam. ii. 19. Rev. xii. 7, 9; xvi. 13, 14; xx. 2.

4. Such facts are recorded concerning the demons mentioned in the New Testament, as could not possibly have been true on the contrary hypothesis; v. g. their owning Christ to be the Messiah, beseeching him not to torment them, breaking chains, and especially driving the swine into the sea, which there is no reason to believe that two madmen would have attempted, or could possibly have effected.

Dodd. Fam. Exp. vol. i. § 70. p. 428.

5. The manner in which Christ speaks to them, plainly shows they were really demoniacs; not only rebuking them, (which indeed is also said of fevers and winds,) but calling them unclean spirits, asking them questions, commanding them to come out, &c. It is very mean and unworthy to suppose him merely to have humoured madmen in any case, and much more in this; and the answer, § 1. gr. 4. is by no means sufficient, because this is supposed by those on the other side the question to be a mischievous notion; yet it is plain his own apostles were suffered to continue in it, even after the descent of the Spirit; for they expressly assert the person in question to have been actually and really possessed; nor can one imagine how they could assert this in plainer and less ambiguous terms.

6. It is not allowed to have been so singular a case as the objection supposes, considering the account which has been given of possessions by many credible persons, especially the writers of the primitive church. See Prop. 144. Dem. gr. 5. and Schol. 4. and the references there.

Whist. on Demon. Hist. Surry Demon.

7. We can conjecture some probable reasons why more frequent possessions might be permitted in Christ's time than were known before or since; v. g. to punish the Jews, who were addicted so much to magic (comp. Acts xix. 13, 18, 19.); to convince men of the reality and malice of evil spirits, that they might be alarmed at their danger, and so prepared for the Gospel; to illustrate the power of Christ in his triumph over them; and to give a convincing specimen of his future complete victory. Prop. 150. Cor. 3.

8. Nevertheless, were the cause utterly unknown to us, it would not become us for that reason alone to deny the fact. Who can say why Satan is permitted to have so much power over men's souls, as many of the forecited Scriptures do plainly express?

SCHOLIUM 2.

We readily allow that there might be a great deal of artifice in the oracles of the Heathens, so much celebrated by their writers; which appears from the dubious language in which they were often delivered,—from the instances in which clearer predictions were contradicted by the event,—from the apparatus made use of in consulting many of them, whereby the imagination of the suppliant or inquirer was greatly disordered,—and from the servile flattery they used to princes and conquerors, and the machinery and contrivance in some of the scenes and images whence the oracular voice proceeded: concerning all which, consult Vandale on all these subjects, or Fontenelle's elegant abridgment of him; and there is great reason to believe that the ignorance or superstition of the populace would make them an easy prey to artifices of this kind. Nevertheless, considering how expressly devils are said to have been worshipped by the Gentiles, 1 Cor. x. 20, 21. and how supposable it is that many of them might, by their extraordinary sagacity and experience, form probable conjectures with regard to future events, and discern present things at such a distance as they could not be known by the inquirer; and likewise considering the circumstances recorded by some credible historians, for which none of the opposite particulars recorded by Vandale can fully account, it seems reasonable to believe that, in some of those oracles, there was a supernatural interposition of evil spirits, (compare Acts xvi. 16—18.) especially when we compare what is said of demoniacal possessions under the former scholium, and of magical operations under the next.

Those were Dr. Worthington's Impartial Inquiry into the Case of the Gospel Demoniacs, the same gentleman's Further Inquiry, and Mr. Peirce's Demoniacs, An Inquiry into the Heathen and the Scripture Doctrine of Demons.

Yet we cannot, without stronger proof than can be pretended, suppose that God would frequently permit these interpositions to be apparently miraculous, considering how great a confirmation they would give to idolatrous worship; and it is plain, in fact, that after Christianity appeared, they were in very little credit; and both Tully and Plutarch assure us that they began to decline before that time. SCHOLIUM 3.

Many have rejected all stories of magical operations, performed by a combination with the infernal spirits, or of diabolical appearances, as being either the dreams of a disordered imagination, the contrivance of art, or the vain fictions of those who aimed at nothing but imposing on mankind. There is great reason to believe this to have been most frequently the case; yet it must be acknowledged, that some stories of this kind come attended with evidence which it is difficult to answer; particularly the dying confession of some, said to have been concerned in them; and it is strange to observe what an agreement there is in many circumstances, among those who have believed and reported such facts, where the scenes have been most distant, and the persons in education and religion most different from each other. It is however certain, that Satan appeared in a visible form to Christ, and that he animated the body of a serpent in the first temptation; it is also exceedingly probable there was some supernatural appearance to Saul, (1 Sam. xxviii.) notwithstanding the solution which some have endeavoured to find, in the supposed artifice of throwing the voice, which we can hardly suppose to have been common to all the ἐγγαστρόμυθοι. The main objection against the supposed reality of such phenomena is, that being miraculous they would establish the worship of the Devil, on the principles laid down above; but no proof can be brought that such facts were ever done in attestation of a falsehood; the utmost they can be supposed to prove is, that the devils are beings of great power and knowledge, not that they are the proper objects of our worship, dependence, and obedience; and it may be added, that the purposes to which they seem to have interposed have generally been so malignant, as sufficiently to prove they are evil demons, and as such to be denounced and detested; and such appearances, where Christianity is known, should be considered as confirming rather than weakening it; since the existence, power, and malice of Satan make so great a part of the Christian scheme. Where the Gospel is unknown, natural religion might teach men that there is a Sovereign Almighty Being, of the most benevolent nature, and consequently that these mischievous beings were to be detested as his enemies, whatever power they might have; from which he would not fail to protect those that should faithfully serve him. Compare 2 Thess. ii. 9—12.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The Scripture doctrine of Satan makes it probable that many of those horrible thoughts, which sometimes come with an almost irresistible impetus into the minds of pious persons, are of diabolical original; which is in some measure confirmed by what has been observed of the subtilty with which atheistical and sceptical arguments have sometimes been presented to the mind, even beyond the natural genius of the person assaulted by them.

Gilpin on Tempt. Burn. Spir. Life, p. 139.

SCHOLIUM 5.

There is no greater evidence of the degeneracy which a rational mind, even with great degrees of sagacity and ability, is capable of, than the implacable malice of those wicked spirits, and the obstinate malignity with which they are opposing the cause of God in the world, though they are sure that opposition will end in their own confusion and ruin. Dodd. Fam. Exp. vol. i. p. 115.

SCHOLIUM 6.

Those who professed magical arts, under the various forms of them, were by the law of Moses condemned to death (Exod. xxii. 18. Deut. xviii. 9—11.); and as idolatry was generally the foundation of these professions, there were some reasons for their being punished peculiar to the Jewish dispensation; and indeed it seems fit that in Christian communities, persons making such pretensions should be discouraged, since they have an evident tendency to take off men's minds from a dependence upon God, to indulge malignant passions, and at best to fill them with vanity and superstition; but it may be questioned how far the professors of such arts are to be punished by the magistrate. We allow that it is not his province to punish offences against God as such (Prop. 77.); and consequently a contract with Satan, considered merely in this view, is not by human laws to be made penal; but if it be proved that real mischief, either to the persons or properties of men be done in consequence of such a contract, the person who can be proved to have done such mischief is certainly answerable for it; and if (which is generally the case) those predictions are only artifices to impose on simple people, and get money from them, the idle pretenders are plainly a pest to society, and may as justly be punished as those who keep gaming-houses, brothels, &c. Vid. Prop. 50. Cor. 3.

Hutch. on Witchc. p. 147.

SCHOLIUM 7.

Certain vain ceremonies, which are commonly called charms, and seem to have no efficacy at all for producing the effects proposed by them, are to be avoided; seeing, if there be indeed any real efficacy in them, it is generally probable they owe it to some bad cause; for one can hardly imagine that God should permit good angels in any extraordinary manner to interpose, or should immediately exert his own miraculous power on trifling occasions, and upon the performance of such idle tricks as are generally made the condition of receiving such benefits. More's Immort. of the Soul, c. xii.

PROPOSITION CLXII.

To inquire into what shall pass at the end of this world, so far as Scripture gives us an account of it.

SOLUTION.

1. The Lord Jesus Christ shall descend with visible pomp and majesty, attended by the blessed angels, who will probably be employed as the instruments of some loud and extraordinary sound, called the trump of God, or voice of the archangel. This appearance shall be attended with the resurrection of the dead. Matt. xxiv. 30, 31; xxv. 31, 32; xxvi. 64. John v. 28, 29. Acts iv. 2; xxiii. 6; xxiv. 15. 1 Cor. xv. 12, &c. 1 Thess. iv. 14—16.

2. In this resurrection, the bodies of the saints shall in a glorious though unknown manner, be transformed into the resemblance of the glorified body of Christ; shall be raised above those miseries and temptations to which, by virtue of their constitution and situation, they are now exposed, and rendered fit to serve the soul in all the entertainments and employments of the heavenly state. Matt. xiii. 43. 1 Cor. xv. 42—49. Phil. iii. 21.

3. Those saints who are found alive at this appearance of Christ shall be caught up with those newraised to meet him; and their bodies shall undergo a change correspondent to that of those who are dead. 1 Cor. xv. 50—54. 1 Thess. iv. 17.

4. All mankind, both good and bad, shall in a solemn manner appear before Christ, that their lives and characters may undergo a strict examination, in order to determine their final state. Acts xvii. 31. Rom. ii. 16. 2 Tim. iv. 1. 2 Cor. v. 10. et sim.

5. The consequence of this judgment will be a sentence of absolution to all the righteous, and condemnation to all the wicked; (in which latter sentence the evil angels shall also be included;) and this on each side will be succeeded by the immediate execution of it, the righteous being received into a state of complete and everlasting happiness, and the wicked cast down to everlasting misery. Matt. xxv. 31—46. Mark ix. 43—49. Rom. ii. 5—10. 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18. 2 Thess. i. 7—10. 2 Tim. iv. 8. 1 Pet. i. 4—7; iv. 13; v. 4. 1 John iii. 2.

Amory's Serm. on the Last Judgment.

COROLLARY 1.

There is great reason to believe that the saints will be made perfect in holiness; without which we cannot conceive how they could be completely happy: and indeed the perfection of their character in their final state is expressly asserted. Eph. v. 27. Col. i. 22. Heb. xii. 23. Jude ver. 24.

Watts's Death and Heaven, Disc. ii. § 2.

COROLLARY 2.

It plainly appears from the passages referred to above, and especially gr. 5. that the complete happiness of the saints is to commence from the resurrection; as also the complete punishment of the wicked: but how far there is reason to believe that the one and the other are immediately after death in a state of happiness or misery, far below what they are then to receive, we shall inquire below, Schol. 9.

SCHOLIUM 1.

There are many passages in the Old Testament, which either obscurely hint at the resurrection of the body, or immediately refer to it; v. g. Job xix. 23—27. Dan. xii. 2. to which many have aded Isa. xxv. 8; xxvi. 19. Hos. vi. 2; xiii. 14. Compare Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14. To these texts Dr. Hodges has added several others, which he interprets as referring to the resurrection, particularly Job xiv. 14; xxi. 30—32; xxix. 19, 20; xxx. 22, 23. But all his efforts will only at best prove these words may be so rendered and explained; whereas they all make very good sense upon the common interpretation. See Hodges's Elihu, c. iv. pref. p. 212—214, 230—240.

Sherl. on Proph. p. 255. Birch's Life of Boyle. Peters on Job.

Some have not only doubted whether these texts express the resurrection of the body, but whether there be any where in the Old Testament any reference to a future state at all. The case, in a few words, appears to be this:—The Mosaic covenant contained no promises directly relating to a future state: probably, as Dr. Warburton asserts and argues at large, because Moses was secure of an equal Providence, and therefore needed not subsidiary sanctions taken from a future state, without the belief of which the doctrine of a universal Providence cannot ordinarily be vindicated, nor the general sanctions of religion secured: yet, as real piety must imply some views to such a state, it seems evident that good men, even before Moses, were animated by them, (Heb. xi. 13—16.) as he himself plainly was (ibid. 24—26.); and that the promises of heavenly felicity were contained even in the covenant made with Abraham (which the Mosaic could not disannul) we have shown before. (See Prop. 154. § 1. gr. 4.) Succeeding providences also confirmed the natural arguments in its favour, as every remarkable interposition would do. And when general promises were made to the obedient, and an equal providence relating to the nation established on national conformity to the Mosaic institution, and not merely to the general precepts of virtue (which must always make a nation happy); as such an equal providence would necessarily involve many of the best men in national ruin at a time when, by preserving their integrity in the midst of general apostasy, their virtue was most conspicuous,—such good men in such a state would have vast additional reasons for expecting future rewards, beyond what could arise from principles common to the rest of mankind; so that we cannot wonder that we find in the writings of the prophets many strong expressions of such an expectation, particularly Gen. xlix. 18. Psal. xvi. 9—11. (Compare Acts ii. 25—31.); xvii. ult. xxiii. ult. xxxvi. 9; xlix. 14, 15; lxxiii. 17—27. Prov. x. 2, 28; xi. 7; xii. 28; xiv. 32; xv. 24; xxi. 16. Eccles. iii. 15, 16, 17, 21; vii. 12, 15; viii. 12—14; xi. 9; xii. 7, 13, 14. Isa. iii. 10, 11. Ezek. xviii. 19—21; to which catalogue may be added the texts quoted above, Schol. 1. The same thing may also be inferred from the particular promises made to Daniel, Dan. xii. 13. to Zerubbabel, Hag. ii. 23. and to Joshua the high priest, Zech. iii. 7. as well as from those historical facts recorded in the Old Testament; of the murder of Abel, the translation of Enoch and Elijah, the death of Moses, the story of the Witch of Endor; and from what is said of the appearance of angels to, and their converse with, good men. Vid. Prop. 149. gr. 5.

Against this interpretation of the preceding texts it is objected, That bringing life and immortality to light was the peculiar glory of Christianity. Compare 2 Tim. i. 10. with Dr. Hodges's explication. (Elihu, p. 252.) But waving this interpretation, we answer, 1. That many of the passages above are ambiguous, though most reasonably explained of a future state. 2. That in others there might be room to doubt whether they express any thing more than the hope these good men in fact had, without determining that it was built on any express revelation. 3. That where there was an express message from God, the consequence, as including a future state, was to be inferred from comparing the inequalities of present providences with that general declaration. 4. That no such passages contain a promise of final, everlasting, and immutable happiness, even to the spirits of good men; 5. Nor a resurrection to their body: nor, 6. Does it at all affect any but the Jews; so that when Christ in his own person, and that of the apostles, declared a future state of endless happiness or misery of the whole person, awaiting all men, it may well be called bringing life and immortality to light, when compared with any former dispensation.

Lel. ag. Morg. vol. i. p. 338. Warb. Div. Leg. vol. ii. p. 553.*

Those who have thought that the resurrection of the body might be demonstrated, as at least probable, from natural principles, have pleaded,

1. That considering, on the one hand, the immortality of the soul, and on the other, that the body was originally designed to make up a part of the man, it would seem improbable that one part should be utterly destroyed, especially after so short a duration, shorter indeed than the period of many other animal and vegetable bodies. But those that insist upon this argument seem to have forgotten that the sentence of death, introduced by sin, has changed the original state; not to insist upon it, that from the light of nature we might perhaps apprehend the union of our souls to these bodies a punishment.

2. They plead that a more glorious display of the divine justice will be consequent upon a resurrection than can otherwise be supposed. But it is certain, the almighty power of God might without this make it apparent to all human creatures, that virtue was universally rewarded, and vice proportionably punished; and none can pretend to say how far the honours of the divine judgment would necessarily require a more public and sensible triumph.

3. Many have urged the reasonableness of making the body partake of rewards and punishments, as it has partaken of duty or guilt. But it is only in a figurative sense that it can be said to be the subject either of virtue or happiness.

* Bishop Warburton's opinion has been attacked in various publications, among which it may be sufficient to mention Mr. Peter Croal Dissertation on the Book of Job, and Remarks on Dr. Warburton's Account of the Sentiments of the early Jews concerning the Soul: Views of things different from those maintained by Warburton are advanced by Dr. Addington, in his Dissertation on the Religious Knowledge of the ancient Jews and Patriarchs, containing an Inquiry into the Evidences of their Belief and Expectation of a Future State. This is the case likewise with Dr. Leland, in some parts of his works. A zealous advocate for Dr. Warburton was the author of A free and candid Examination of the Principles advanced in the —— Bishop of London's Sermons. Sherlock's—and in his—Discourses on Prophecy, and of a Critical Inquiry into the Opinions and Practices of the Ancient Philosophers. These performances were written by the Rev. Mr. Towne.

4. The fathers commonly argued from the succeeding daily and yearly resurrection to be observed in the natural world. This was indeed a very just proof to the Heathens, with whom this controversy chiefly lay, that a resurrection from the dead was possible; and the fabulous story of the phœnix was as fine an illustration of it as can be imagined. Vid. Solinus, cap. xxxiii. p. 63. with Salmasius's notes, vol. i. p. 548, &c. But we cannot certainly infer from thence that God will effect it: so that it seems to be peculiar to a divine revelation to give convincing evidence of the resurrection of the body. SCHOLIUM 4.

It is much debated, how far the body to be raised will be the same with that laid in the grave; and it is a question of much greater difficulty than importance. It may be observed,

1. That the raised body cannot be entirely the same mass, i. e. cannot consist just of the same particles without either addition or diminution. The continual changes that pass in the body during life would render this body of a monstrous size, if all those particles that had ever been vitally united to it, i. e. had made a part of it while living, were then to be restored; which yet might seem as necessary as that just that number should be restored which were laid in the grave: and besides this, the different state of bodies laid in the grave, some vastly overgrown, others much emaciated, others only of infants, others maimed, i. e. deprived of some of their limbs and members, would occasion such a diversity of size and forms at the resurrection, as there is no reason at all to imagine, and it would be insufferable to suppose.

2. Some have imagined that there is some part of the brain so exceedingly small as to be invisible, which is in its own nature incorruptible; and that the uniting this to the same soul to which it was before united, will occasion an identity of the whole man. But it is neither certain that there are any such incorruptible particles; nor can we see how the identity of these particles would make the raised body the same that was laid in the dust.

3. Many have supposed that there may be some stamina, which are the same in every distinct human body from its birth to its death, only in different circumstances dilated by the fluids to different degrees, and that these are of such a nature, as never to pass from being the stamina of one body to become the stamina of another: which hypothesis, though it be not entirely clear of its difficulties, yet if it be allowed possible, will show the possibility of giving to each what may properly be called his own body, even when, as in the instance of cannibals, and no doubt in many others, the same particles at different times make a part of different human bodies.

4. The Scripture speaks not merely (as Mr. Locke maintains) of the resurrection of the dead, but also of the resurrection of the body, in such terms, as at least strongly to intimate that it may properly be called the same body which was laid in the grave, on some material account, though the organization of it shall no doubt be greatly changed, in such a manner as is to us at present unknown, John v. 28. Rev. xx. 13. 1 Cor. xv. 35—38, 42—44, 53. Phil. iii. 21. to which we may without scruple add Rom. viii. 11.

It is not possible for us to determine, how far the language in which our Lord describes the judgment-day (Matt. xxv. and elsewhere) may be literal, and how far figurative. There seems no reason to believe that every individual word and action shall be particularly examined in all its circumstances, witnesses heard, refuted, &c.; for were this to proceed according to the method of human courts, it would make the judgment-day millions of years longer than the whole period of the earth's duration has been; neither can we depend upon it that those excuses will actually be made which are represented, Matt. vii. 22; xxv. 24 and 44. No doubt, every particular of men's conduct will be weighed, in order to fix their character and their state; and the proceedings of that day will be attended with such convictions of conscience, impressed upon the unhappy creatures condemned in it, as effectually to supersede such pleas, or any other they could be supposed capable of making: but it is probable this last expression, as well as those of opening the books, (Rev. xix. 12.) are to be taken figuratively.

* The doctrine of the resurrection of the same body has been called in question by three more recent writers. These are Dr. Sykes, in his Inquiry when the Resurrection of the Body, as Flesh, was first asserted; Bishop Newton confutes Mr. Alexander Spence's strange Essay on the Resurrection, in the fifteenth Chapter of the first Volume to the Thessalonians, and Mr. Cooper in his first volume of Essays. In 1725, Dr. Henry Felton published a Sermon, entitled, The Resurrection of the same numerical Body, and its Reunion to the same Soul, against Mr. Locke's Notion of Personality and Identity. It was as well suited at the time, as to pass through three editions. On this head, Bishop Newton confronts Spence and Cooper. See Newton's Sacred Works, vol. iii. p. 676.

SCHOLIUM 6.

It is expressly said that evil spirits are reserved to the judgment of the great day, Jude, ver. 6. 2 Pet. ii. 4. 1 Cor. vi. 3. in which there will be a more apparent propriety, if Dr. Hunt's conjecture concerning the fall of the angels be true; which is, that those angels, before they fell, had in their former state some peculiar relation to our system, and that they were in the number of those who attended the Shekinah while Adam was in paradise; but by drawing off, forsook their post, out of a principle of rebellion against the Son of God, or of envy to mankind, whom they thought unworthy the guardianship and attendance of such noble spirits.

SCHOLIUM 7.

Many precarious conjectures have been formed concerning the place in which good men shall dwell after the resurrection. Some have thought it to be beyond the starry firmament; and some of the ancients imagined that their dwelling would be in the sun, from a mistaken interpretation of Psal. xix. 4. which they rendered, as the Seventy and Vulgate, He has set his tabernacle in the sun: but the nature and appearance of the sun, especially considering the spots on his face, so easily expose the weakness of this hypothesis, that it deserves no manner of regard. Mr. Whiston supposes the air to be the seat of the blessed, at present at least; and imagines that Christ is at the top of the atmosphere; and other souls nearer or more remote from him, according to the degree of their moral purity; to which he imagines the specific gravity of their inseparable vehicles to be proportionable; a scheme so evidently precarious, that it seems hardly worth while particularly to examine it.

Fawcett's Dialogues, p. 21, &c.

But Mr. Hallet has endeavoured to prove at large that they dwell upon earth, when it shall be restored to its paradisaical state; and the substance of his arguments is this:—Saints on their death go to Heaven, (2 Cor. v. 8. Phil. i. 23. compared with Acts iii. 21.); which place is likewise called Paradise, Luke xxiii. 43. 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4. but after the resurrection there shall be a new earth, upon which shall descend the New Jerusalem, a city to be formed in Heaven, and thence brought down and fixed upon earth, Rev. xxi. xxii. compare 2 Pet. iii. 13. and he supposes this is all that is intended by such expressions as 1 Pet. i. 4. Heb. x. 34. John xiv. 2. and he confidently asserts that Heaven does nowhere in Scripture signify a place where good men shall dwell after the resurrection. He urges that many singular advantages attend this hypothesis; e. g. it shows the reason why the body shall be raised; and it affords the best interpretation of Matt. v. 3, &c.; but as for those passages, Isa. lxv 17, &c.; lxvi. 22, &c. he apprehends that these are only allusions to the abode of the saints after the resurrection, but do immediately refer to the restoration of the Jews to their own land, and its extraordinary fruitfulness and pleasure; which he supposes by various strong figurative expressions to be compared to the final abode of the blessed. Many objections lie against this scheme, too obvious to need a particular mention: the chief are these:—

1. One can hardly imagine any city upon earth capable of containing the whole number of God's people, especially considering the great triumph of the Christian cause, to be expected in the latter day, (of which see Prop. 112. Schol. 4.) the great multiplication of the inhabitants of the earth, which will probably be connected with it, and the probable reason there is to hope that all who die in infancy, (which is at least one third of the whole human species,) or at least all the deceased infants of the righteous, may belong to the number of the elect: and if this, or any thing like it, be the case, it is probable that the whole face of the earth would not be able, conveniently, if at all, to contain so great a number; and to say that the size of the earth shall be increased, or the dimensions of the glorified body contracted, would be so groundless and improbable a conjecture, that this ingenious writer, widely as he suffers his thoughts to expatiate, has not seen fit so much as to mention it.

2. It is difficult to conceive how the inhabitants of such a fine city upon earth should by any means be equal to the angels; which yet Scripture declares that they shall be. Luke xx. 36.

3. The notion of the perpetual day there to be enjoyed, without the sun, seems very ill to suit the apprehension of this our planet's being the seat of that glory. Rev. xxi. 23—25.

4. With the thought of a perpetual abode on earth, seem to be connected several other mean ideas, which will by no means suit the exalted description given of the heavenly state: least of all, therefore, can we imagine that Christ and the holy angels are to have their perpetual abode here; yet it is expressly said, that saints are to be for ever with the Lord, 1 Thess. iv. 17. that they shall be caught up to meet him in the air, (which would be very unnecessary and strange, if they were immediately to descend to earth again,) and that he will come to receive them to himself, that they may be where he is, John xiv. 2. which, on this hypothesis, must be a very improper expression.

5. That the Scriptures, on which this hypothesis is founded, are capable of another and very different interpretation; as will appear by consulting the most celebrated commentators upon them, and particularly Mr. Lowman, on those chapters of the Revelations which are the main support of Mr. Hallet's scheme.—On the whole, the place of the blessed is a question of little importance; and if we believe the description of their happiness given in Scripture, we may cheerfully pursue and expect it, though we cannot answer a multitude of curious questions relating to the circumstantials of it.

SCHOLIUM 8.

There have also been various conjectures, equally uncertain, concerning the place of the damned. The ancients generally supposed it was a region of fire, near the centre of the earth: others have supposed it might be a comet, where the extremes of heat and cold, in its access to, and recess from, the sun, would be equally tormenting; and they suppose the latter to be signified by βρυγμος οδοντων, Matt. xxii. 13. which they would render the chattering of the teeth; but Matt. xiii. 43. sufficiently overthrows that criticism. Mr. Swinden endeavours to prove at large that Hell is seated in the sun, chiefly pleading that this is the grand repository of fire, that its horrible face when viewed by a telescope, suits the description given of the burning lake; and that being in the centre of the system, it might properly be said that wicked men were cast down into it. How this is reconcilable with what is said of its being outer darkness, I think he has not attempted to show. It seems a great objection against each of these hypotheses, that if either of them be admitted, we must allow a vast number of Hells, if, as this author himself supposes, the fixed stars be suns; and it seems extremely improbable that, as soon as a system is created, a seat of torment should be prepared for its inhabitants. Others, by directly the counterpart to Mr. Hallet's hypothesis, have imagined that Earth would be the seat of the damned: and that when left in the flames of the last conflagration, wicked men would be cast down into it, supposing some peculiar propriety that the place of their sin should be that of their punishment: but it is something improbable this should be the everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his angels. Matt. xxv. 41. On the whole, we must here likewise confess our ignorance, and shall be much better employed in studying how we may avoid this place of horror, than in labouring to discover where it is.

SCHOLIUM 9.

Some have thought, that during the intermediate state between death and the resurrection, the soul shall be entirely insensible, which they suppose to be the natural consequence of its separation from the body. But the contrary seems to be evident with regard to good men, from the following Scriptures: Matt. xvii. 3. Luke xxiii. 42. 2 Cor. v. 6, 8. Phil. i. 21, 23, 34. to which some add 1 Pet. iii. 19. Heb. xii. 23. and with greater certainty Matt. x. 28.; compare also Acts vii. 59. John v. 24, et sim. Rom. viii. 10, 11, 38. 2 Cor. v. 1, 2; xii. 2, 3, 4. 1 Thess. iv. 14; v. 10. Rev. vi. 9, 10. 2 Pet. i. 13, 14. And that the Jews before Christ's time had this notion, is at least probable from Wisdom ii. 2—4, 23, 24; iii. 1—5; iv. 7—15; v. 14, 15. though it is certain, that about the time of the Maccabees, a resurrection from the dead was expected, however they came so confidently to embrace the persuasion of it; and the most considerable rewards of good men, and punishment of sinners, were supposed to commence from this grand period, 2 Mac. vii. 9—11, 14, 23, 29; xii. 43; xiv. 46. Judith xvi. 17. And by a parity of reason, we may conclude the like with regard to the wicked; compare Luke xvi. 22, 23.; and it seems plain, as the human mind is constituted, that the expectation of immediate blessedness or misery, as soon as ever death has done its office, increaseth those arguments for virtue which are taken from the future state. The most considerable arguments against this are brought from Isa. xxxviii. 18. Psal. xxx. 9; cxv. 17. Eccles. ix. 4—6. to which some have answered,

1. That the existence of the soul in a separate state might be a truth unknown to the Old-Testament saints. But if we suppose it to be a truth, and yet at the same time allow that in these passages they declared the contrary, we evidently give up the plenary inspiration of this part of Scripture:—most therefore have chosen to reply,

2. That the texts quoted above relate to the inactive state of the body in the grave, and the removal of the soul from all intercourse with this world, and all capacity of doing any thing for the service of God here, which they were peculiarly solicitous about. This reply may properly be made with regard to the two first of the Scriptures quoted above, and will appear of the greater weight, considering the distinguished character and circumstances of David and Hezekiah, (Herv. Med. vol. ii. p. 26, 27. not.) and as for the passage in Ecclesiastes, if the same reply be not admitted with regard to that, it seems so directly to contradict the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, that those who believe that doctrine, and also believe the plenary inspiration of Solomon, or even that he believed and taught it, (as in this book he seems to have done,) must suppose it the speech of an epicure, introduced by a sudden prosopopœia; which if it be allowed, destroys the force of all objection from it. Compare the texts quoted from Ecclesiastes, Schol. 2. De Veaux on Eccles. p. 171.

3. As to that objection which is taken from such passages of Scripture as refer to the general judgment, as the time when good men enter on their happiness, and the wicked on their misery, (many of which are quoted Prop. 162. gr. 5.) see Cor. 2. and the references there; whence it will appear that such Scriptures have an important sense, consistent with what we have advanced here for the existence of our thinking powers in a separate state. It may be further objected, that the apostle says, "We shall receive according to what we have done in the body;" but on the supposition of the soul's existing in a separate state, the time in which many lived in the body will have been but a very inconsiderable part of their whole duration, whereas justice would require the whole to be regarded, (compare 2 Cor. v. 10.) it is answered, God may suspend our probation upon what time of our existence he pleases; and that it is very supposable that both good and bad men may after death go into such a sort of state as may not suit probation, but make a part either of reward or punishment: and whatever can be objected against this, would affect the immensely greater part of our existence, which those who deny the separate state must allow to pass after the final sentence.

SCHOLIUM 10.

There is great reason to believe that the happiness of the blessed does in some measure arise from the converse of each other. Compare Heb. xii. 22. 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20. nor do those texts, which speak of the favour of God as the final portion of the blessed, (Psal. xvii. ult. lxxiii. 25, 26. 1 Cor. xv. 28.) at all interfere with this; seeing God will undoubtedly be owned and enjoyed in all those holy entertainments which arise from the company of angels and glorified saints: and the degree in which he makes benevolent spirits upon earth useful to each other, and the angels serviceable to saints here, as well as the social nature of man, gives additional weight to the argument taken from the passages quoted above, and leaves no doubt concerning the justice of the assertion.

Butl. Anal. Price's Four Diss. No. iii.

SCHOLIUM 11.

That there will be various degrees of future happiness, according to men's various attainments in virtue, and the different degrees of service here performed, appears not only from the justice of God, which seems evidently to require this, and from the nature of things, which would in the same external circumstances render the wisest and most virtuous the happiest,—but likewise from express Scriptures, such as Dan. xii. 3. Matt. x. 41, 42. xix 28, 29. Luke xix. 16—19. Rom. ii. 6. 1 Cor. iii. 8. 2 Cor. v. 10; ix. 6. compare Gal. vi. 9. 1 Cor. iii. 14, 15. to which we may perhaps add 1 Cor. xv. 41. Matt. v. 10—12. 2 Cor. iv. 17. To this it is objected,

1. That the rewards of the heavenly state are represented as equal. Matt. xx. 7–10. It is answered, That the parable refers to the calling of the Gentiles into equal church privileges with the Jews, else there would be no room to represent some as murmuring against the rest, since such a temper is plainly inconsistent with the character and happiness of the blessed. It is objected,

2. That as all believers have a perfect righteousness in Christ, the degree of glory, being the reward of that alone, must be equal.

Ans. Though all are accepted for the sake of Christ, and all equally justified from the guilt and condemnation of sin through him, yet there may be room for such a diversity of rewards as was mentioned above; which being expressly asserted, no conclusion from any hypothesis whatsoever ought to be advanced in opposition to that doctrine.

The like diversity of degrees with regard to future punishment, may be inferred from a parity of reason, and also from comparing Matt. x. 15; xi. 22. Luke xii. 47, 48.

SCHOLIUM 12.

It may not be improper here to mention the doctrine of the Church of Rome, relating to Purgatory, which is in short this: That it is a place where the souls of good men remain in torment for a certain time, which torments are in their degree equal to those endured by the damned, till they have by these sufferings satisfied for the guilt of venial sins they had committed, or mortal sins of which they had truly repented; for the support of this strangely incoherent doctrine, they chiefly urge 1 Pet. iii. 19. Matt. v. 25, 26; xii. 32. 1 Cor. iii. 10—15. xv. 29. As for the arguments drawn from Zech. ix. 11. Mal. iii. 2. Job xiv. 19—22. they are so trifling as hardly to deserve mention. On the other side, the Protestants plead Isa. lvii. 2. Rev. xiv. 13. Luke xvi. 22; xxiii. 43. 2 Cor. v. 8. For the fuller discussion of this point, see the notes in the Fam. Expos. on the texts cited; but we wave it here, and content ourselves with observing the silence of Scripture upon this head, which, had the doctrine been true, must be very unaccountable, seeing so important a part of charity would, upon the supposition of its truth, arise from thence, to which we have no exhortation. It is also derogatory from the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction; and it has so great a tendency to encourage men's hopes of finding mercy, in consequence of something to be done for them hereafter, when they are in their graves, that it ought by no means to be admitted upon such shadows of proof as those laid down above; especially when the Romish doctors teach, that one mere act of attrition before death delivers a man from mortal guilt, and sends him to purgatory, where it is not possible he should lie any longer than the resurrection, and from whence, if rich, he may be very quickly freed by the prayers of survivors.

SCHOLIUM 13.

With the doctrine of purgatory will fall that of praying for the dead, which is chiefly founded upon it, and for which the chief text the Papists plead is 2 Maccab. xii. 40, &c. To which it is sufficient to answer, that we showed before, Prop. 124. that no regard is to be paid to that book, as divinely inspired. If Judas Maccabeus did indeed offer such a sacrifice, it was probably not to atone for the dead, as the author foolishly concludes, but rather to avert the wrath of God from the living, lest, as in the case of Achan, the rest of the people should have suffered for the crimes of their brethren. They also urge 2 Tim. i. 16—18. which yet can have no weight, because it does not appear that Onesiphorus was then dead.

Burn. on Art. v. 26. Limb. Theol.

That the commemoration of the dead, which prevailed in the third century of Christianity, was not praying for them, is very evident. Compare Jurieu's Letters, No. ix. p. 188—196.

SCHOLIUM 14.

It is exceedingly difficult exactly to determine what we are to understand by Christ's giving up the kingdom to the Father, at the end of the world, of which we read 1 Cor. xv. 24—28. Some have thought that it means no more than Christ presenting the church to the Father in complete glory, even then acknowledging, by some public and solemn declaration, his own subjection to the Father, and derivation of the mediatorial kingdom from him; but as this does not appear a very natural interpretation, others have said that Christ shall then give up his commission, as a general does, when that war is concluded, for the management of which he has received it, and shall remain as one of his brethren; in which interpretation Witsius and Crellius do strangely agree. Against this is objected, The perpetuity of Christ's kingdom, so often declared; or (if that be answered by the ambiguity of the word made use of in declaring it) the glory which must necessarily result to the human nature of Christ, in consequence of its intimate and personal union with the Deity. On the whole, it seems probable that some peculiar authority, which Christ has received from the Father, of managing the affairs of this world for the salvation of his redeemed, will then be solemnly resigned, as the earth itself will then pass away; so that there will, in the nature of things, be no more room left for the exercise of such a kind of authority; and it will evidently appear by the process of the great day, that the destruction of the earth is not a calamity coming upon it while under the Redeemer's care, but a catastrophe to which he appoints it, as having closed all that administration which he proposed at first, when he undertook the management of it. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to believe that he will for ever remain as the glorified head both of elect angels and men, (Eph. i. 10.) the latter being then received to the abode of the former, and incorporated into the same society, and united into one kingdom with them, in such a manner as had not before been known; and that Christ will exercise over the whole kingdom such a mild and gracious government as suits the dignity of his nature, and the greatness of those services which he has performed for the Father; though he shall not then be the medium of their approach to and converse with God in the same manner that he now is; but they, being by the resurrection fully delivered from all the penal consequences of sin, shall have nearer access to God, and yet more intimate communion with him than they ever before had whether during their sojourning here upon earth, or even during the abode of their separate spirits in the unseen world.

LECTURE CCXXI.

PROPOSITION LXIII.

To inquire into the most probable things which are said to prove or disprove the eternity of Hell torments.

SOLUTION.

SECT. I. The arguments to prove them eternal are chiefly these:

1. That the infinite majesty of an offended God adds a kind of infinite evil to sin, and therefore exposes the sinner to an infinite punishment; but as the limited nature of the creature can only bear a finite degree of misery, in any finite duration whatsoever, therefore it must extend to an infinite duration, and the creature must ever be paying a debt, which he will never perfectly have discharged.—To this it is answered, That there cannot be an infinite degree of evil in the punishment of a finite being; but it is replied to this answer, That the enormity of any action is in part to be estimated by the dignity of the person against whom it is committed, and the greatness of those obligations which the offender lay under to him. On these principles, in human judgments, actions, in other respects the same, are punished in very different degrees; and striking a prince is made capital, whereas striking an equal might be sufficiently punished by a small fine; but it may be replied, That the argument here is not from the dignity of the person abstractedly considered, but from the interest which the public has in the safety of the prince, which could not be secured without this extraordinary guard set upon it.—It is further objected to this argument, That it would make all sins equal, whereas both Scripture and reason prove that there are different degrees of guilt, proportionable to the different circumstances attending them. Compare Prop. 102. Schol. 11. To this it is answered, That where the duration of punishment is equal, there may be such a difference in the degree, as may be correspondent to the degree of the crime: and if this answer be not allowed to be satisfactory, it will be difficult to say how the doctrine of different degrees of eternal rewards can be vindicated, as consistent with itself; yet this is allowed by all who urge the objection, and is by all parties of reason to be supposed in the very foundation of it.

Whitby's App. to 2 Thess. i.

2. That whatsoever reason requires a temporary Hell, will also require an eternal one; e. g. the display of God's wisdom, holiness, justice, majesty, and power, his regard to his injured Son and Spirit, his violated law, and rejected Gospel, his abused patience, slighted promises, despised threatenings, &c.; the labours of his servants, the ministry of his angels, and the impression it may make on the inhabitants of happy worlds, to whom the punishment of the damned may be an instructive spectacle. It is replied, That all those ends might as well be effected, by supposing a perpetual succession of criminals delivered over to temporary punishment, as by the eternal punishment of each individual; and that, even without this, the remembrance of what guilty creatures had suffered might answer this end; but it may be suggested, on the other hand, that if we believe an eternity of future happiness, and that the punishments of the damned will ever come to a period, the time will come when the whole duration of them will bear less proportion to the time in which happiness has been enjoyed, than a moment to a thousand years; and consequently, that the whole series of punishment will be, as it were, an evanescent thing, by which all the purposes above mentioned will seem to cease. It is further alleged, That if this argument will prove any thing, it will prove that every offence which is punished at all, must be punished to the utmost, even of almighty power, since it seems that the greater as well as longer the punishment is, the more effectual must it answer these ends. On the contrary, may not some good end possibly be answered by the cessation or mitigation of punishment, as well as by its continuance?—and if our conjectures were to take place here, might it not redound to the glory of Christ, if for his sake the punishment of the damned were to be brought to a period, even though it might have been consistent with the divine justice to continue it longer, and even to continue it for ever? Reyn. Angelic World, p. 301.

3. It is urged, That the government of the world will require God to threaten eternal misery,—since nothing less than the apprehension of that will keep men from the violation of his laws, as appears in fact; and if eternal punishments are once threatened, the justice, truth, and wisdom of God will require that they be actually inflicted, correspondently to that threatening. The latter part of the argument will be considered under the next head; to the former it is replied, 1. That if the apprehension of punishment not eternal does not deter men from sin, the only reason is, because it is not sufficiently attended to, so that the fault lies upon men's in-consideration, and not on any deficiency in the sanctions of the divine law, provided the punishment be greater than any pleasure or advantage to be derived from the sin forbidden under that penalty. 2. It is plain, in fact, the threatening of eternal punishment does not prevent sin, which seems in a great measure to overthrow the foundation of this argument; if it be said, It does a great deal more towards it than could otherwise have been done,—it is answered, 3. That eternal punishments, inflicted by perfect wisdom and complete rectitude, seem so incredible, that the threatening is on that very account disregarded; but this answer seems false in fact; since the generality of wicked Christians profess to believe the eternity of them, and build their hopes and false quiet, not on the prospect of seeing the period of them after some far distant revolution of ages, but on some general notion of the divine mercy, and some scheme which they form of escaping them, either by a death-bed repentance, or by some religious hypothesis, which substitutes something else instead of a truly pious and holy temper, in such a manner as to supersede it; and further, if it afterwards appear that God has threatened eternal punishments, such an answer as this is in effect a bold reflection upon his wisdom, as if he did not understand the constitution of human nature, and so, like some weak and angry men, had bent the bow till it broke. The most solid answer to all the preceding arguments is, That we cannot pretend to decide a priori in this question, so far as to say that the punishments of Hell must and will certainly be eternal; but if it afterwards appear that the Scriptures declare they shall be so, these considerations may serve to balance the difficulties urged on the other side of the question, from principles of the light of nature; and indeed, on the whole, it seems that it can only be determined by divine revelation. Burt. Works, vol. ii. p. 60.

LECTURE CCXXII

1. The Scripture has expressly declared, in a variety of the most significant phrases, that the torments of Hell shall be eternal. Matt. xviii. 8; xxv. 41, 46. Mark ix. 43—49. 2 Thess. i. 9. Jude ver. 13. Rev. xiv. 11; xx. 10. To this it is replied, 1. That it is not certain that the word rendered eternal, everlasting, &c. is to be taken in its utmost extent; it often signifies no more than a very long time, or a time whose precise boundary is to us unknown. Prop. 156. Schol. 1. It is answered, That the same language is used, and that sometimes in the very same place, to express the eternal happiness of the righteous, and the eternal misery of the wicked; and that there is no reason to believe, especially where it stands in so close a connexion, that it should express two such different ideas; and moreover, that the texts produced on this account in the scholium referred to above, are taken from the Old Testament; for as to that, Jude ver. 7. it may refer to a future punishment; and the expression εις τον αιωνα του αιωνος, as used Rev. xx. 10. is so strong, that if it does not express a proper eternity, it will be difficult to produce any Scripture that does; nor can any instance be produced of its being put for a finite and limited duration. Compare Psal. cxxxii. 14; lxxii. 17. which is an instance that of all others comes nearest to it. Vid. Trommii Concordt. Graec. ad verb. αιων et αιωνιος. 2. It is pleaded, That, granting eternal punishments are threatened, it does not follow that they must be executed, since the faithfulness of God will allow him to dispense with his threatenings, though not with his promises, as particularly in the case of Nineveh. It is replied, That where God has not only forbidden any sinful action on such a penalty, but has expressly declared that he will execute that penalty, and that he will not suspend the execution of it on any condition,—though we could not say his faithfulness would be impeached by acting in a different manner, yet it would be hard to vindicate his veracity, especially since he must know, even when he published the threatening, that it could not be executed without the greatest injury offered to the moral perfections of his nature. It also seems inconsistent with his wisdom to have pronounced such threatenings as these, and yet to have given mankind reason to believe that he will not and cannot execute them, which this objection supposes he has given; for a threatening, which the person threatened knows another cannot fulfil, is the vainest and most contemptible thing one can imagine: and it is here particularly worth observing, that Matt. xxv. 41—46. is such a [illegible] of a future and most solemn fact, as cannot with any decency be suspected, and yet cannot on this hypothesis be accounted for. Compare Prop. 79. Schol.

Dawes on Heb. [illegible] Watts's Worth to come. [illegible] Lardner's Gospel History.

Sect. II. The chief arguments against this doctrine are these:—

Arg. I. That it is inconsistent with the justice of the Divine Being, to inflict eternal punishment for offences committed in so short a space of time. It is answered,

1. That God gives us our choice; and his proposing to us eternal happiness on the one hand, is an equivalent for inflicting eternal misery on the other; but this seems to be taking the question for granted, rather than proving the justice of this appointment.

2. That, considering the infinite meanness and glory of God, none can say how long he may continue to punish a creature who has wilfully violated his laws; and that our feeble understandings are incapable of judging concerning the rights of the divine government in such a point; but it is said, that the former part of this reply may be admitted, and yet the eternity of these punishments denied; i. e. we may conclude they will come to a period, though none can say when; and that the latter part is not answering the difficulty, but acknowledging it to be unanswerable. It is replied, That it is only denying the pretended axiom, "That eternal punishments must be unjust," to be a self-evident proposition; and it should further be considered, that in order to determine the proportion between the punishment and the offence, it is of great importance that the consequence of crimes be taken into the estimate we make of their guilt.

Bourn's Ser. Jenk. on Chris. vol. ii. c. 14.

3. That if there be an obstinately sinful temper remaining, men may, by new guilt, be for ever exposing themselves to new punishment; but it is answered, 1. That upon this hypothesis, if granted, the eternal punishment of the damned could not properly be said to be inflicted upon them for sins done in the body; since the time will come when the punishments inflicted for such sins (let them be supposed to endure ten millions of years) will be less, when compared with the duration of the punishments inflicted for their after obstinacy and rebellion, than a moment is to all those years. This supposes the damned in a kind of probationary state; and it is hard to conceive how it should be possible for them to contract guilt by obstinacy and impenitency, if there were not a possibility of their repentance, and some room to obtain mercy upon that repentance, which is not allowed on this hypothesis.

4. It is further urged, in answer to this objection from the divine justice, That the perpetuity of the future misery of the damned is the necessary result of the constitution of things, in consequence of which human souls are naturally immortal, and vicious habits, after they have taken a certain degree of rooting in the mind, become incurable; so that nothing can prevent the eternal misery of an impenitent sinner but a miraculous interposition of God's divine power, either to change his character, or destroy his existence, which there is no reason to expect: and this obviates the last reply, as it supposes the moral state of agency to be ended when that of final punishment begins. To this it may be replied, 1. That this constitution is owing to a divine appointment; and that as the perpetual agency of God is required to support the soul, so likewise to form those painful impressions of mind, which arise from the exercise of conscious reflection and tormenting passions; just as there is the uniform agency of Providence in that gravitation and animal sensation by which a particle of gravel wounds and tortures the ureters, or other canals of the body, in passing through them; so that if it had been unjust for God to make a sinner for ever unhappy, he could not have chosen and appointed such a constitution. 2. That the Scripture doctrine asserts a state of corporeal punishment, which must imply something external, and cannot be solved by any observations made on the constitution of the human mind, in comparison with the irregularity of the passions, and final exclusion from all happiness; so that none can have a right to urge this plea but those who admit the hypothesis of Dr. Whitby, which is mentioned in the second scholium below. To which it might be added, 3. That as God can with infinite ease annihilate any spirit, it will remain a question why he makes all souls immortal, when the eternal misery of many must be the consequence, and does not rather universally determine to annihilate, when existence is more grievous than non-existence, and when he knew vice to be naturally incurable.

Horberry on Fut. Pun. c. iii.

Arg. II. It is said to be inconsistent with the goodness and mercy of God to make so many creatures, who he knew would be eternally miserable; and to leave them in such circumstances as those in which it is plain they are left, if all who die impenitent pass into everlasting torment. To this it is answered,

1. That, as we have endeavoured to show above, God has given them sufficient means for their everlasting happiness, so that their misery is to be charged not upon him but upon themselves.

2. That God is to be considered under the character of a Moral Governor, and therefore, in order to approve his goodness, he must consult, not so much the happiness of any particular person, as what may upon the whole be for the benefit of all that moral kingdom over which he presides, and may at the same time suit the majesty and honour of his government. Now, for any thing we certainly know, the everlasting misery of some sinful creatures may be the most effectual means of answering these ends, in harmony with each other.

3. That we are not, on the whole, to judge of the triumph of divine bounty and mercy, merely by what we see on earth, or the state in which the inhabitants of it are left, any more than we are to judge of the magnificence, bounty, and clemency, of a prince, by seeing the manner in which the inhabitants of a rebellious city are treated. For any thing we certainly know, the number of wicked and miserable may bear a smaller proportion to that of holy and happy creatures, than a grain of sand does to the whole body of the sun.

Arg. III. It is further objected, That how minute soever our rank, number, or figure, in the creation may be, that if God intended man for happiness, as he certainly did in the original constitution of his nature, it would be inconsistent with his wisdom to suffer his main end to be frustrated, in the eternal misery of the greater part of the species. It is answered,

1. That we do not know that the greater part of mankind are eternally miserable: perhaps all infants may be saved, and such universal virtue may hereafter prevail, for succeeding, and those very long-lived and fruitful generations, as shall turn the balance of number, even among the adult, on the side of religion and happiness.

2. That it may be much questioned, whether it is proper to say that the ultimate end of God in the creation of man, was the final happiness of the greater part of the species. This principle must prove every individual person to be intended for it, or it proves nothing; for the human species may be no more in the works of God, than an individual to the whole human race; yet it is most apparent in fact, that all are not, and consequently that God did not intend the happiness of each, as his final end, in the creation of each, unless we will grant that end to be disappointed; so that it seems much safer to say that he intended to put all into such a state, that nothing but their own abuse of their liberty should prevent their happiness, than that all, or even the greater part, should eventually obtain it.

LECTURE CCXXIII.

COROLLARY 1.

It must be acknowledged, on the review of these arguments, that there is at least so much force in those urged on the affirmative side of the question, and in the solution given to preceding objections, as to render it both imprudent and unsafe to go out of the way of Scripture on this head; or to explain those expressions in such a manner as positively to determine that future eternal punishments, in strict propriety of speech, are not to be apprehended. It is plain the chief hazard lies in representing the state of the damned less miserable than it may in fact prove to be; and we must have very low notions of Scripture, if we do not think fit to follow it in this affair.

Lucas on Happiness, vol. ii.

COROLLARY 2.

From the doctrine of the eternity of future punishments, compared with all those glorious demonstrations of the divine holiness and goodness which are contained in Scripture, especially when taken in comparison with all the solemn protestations with which God charges the misery of sinners upon themselves, (see Prop. 139. Schol. 4.) we may infer a very convincing additional argument in favour of Prop. 16. i. e. the natural liberty of the will, beyond what the light of nature will afford (see ibid. Schol. 7.);—for that such a Being, who is said not to tempt any one, and even swears that he desires not the death of a sinner, should irresistibly determine millions to the commission of every sinful action of their lives, and then with all the pomp and pageantry of a universal judgment condemn them to eternal misery, on account of those actions, that hereby he may promote the happiness of others, who are or shall be irresistibly determined to virtue in the like manner, is of all incredible things to me the most incredible. Hence most who have held the doctrine of necessity, have denied the eternity of future misery; but in proportion to the degree of its duration and extremity, the objection will still be cogent.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It has been debated, Whether there be properly material fire in Hell. The chief arguments on each side are these:—In proof of the affirmative it is said,

1. That fire and brimstone are represented as the ingredients of their torment, and that the smoke of them is said continually to go up, Rev. xiv. 10, 11; xx. 10. It is answered, That fire in this place may only signify the raging desire, or any other violent agony of the mind; and that there is no more reason to interpret it of material fire, than there is to understand an animal ever living in that flame, by the worm that never dies, which, nevertheless, most expositors who believe a material fire, understand of the stings and reproaches of conscience. It is probable the phrases used by Christ, particularly Matt. ix. 43—49. may allude to Isa. lxvi. ult. which may immediately express the terrible slaughter made on the enemies of God's people in the latter day, our Lord intending by this allusion to assert, that the punishment of the wicked in Hell should be infinitely more dreadful. Compare Judith xvi. 17. Eccles. vii. 17.

Driesberg de Statu Hom. fut. p. 167.

2. That as the body is to be raised, and the whole man to be condemned, it is reasonable to believe there will be some corporeal punishment provided, and therefore probably material fire. Some have answered, That God can give a most acute sense of pain, without any external apparatus for that purpose, and that a perpetual fever might render an imbodied spirit as exquisitely miserable as any external fire could do.

[*] A middle scheme is apprehended by some divines to be most consonant to Scripture, which is, not that the wicked shall be for ever miserable, or finally saved but that, after passing through a mental judgment, and condemnation proportioned to their crimes, they shall be punished with an utter extinction of their being. This scheme is examined by Mr Samuel Bourn, in a letter to a friend, in the first edition of his Discourses on the Principles and Evidences of Natural Religion, and the Christian Revelation, and in his Letter to the Reverend Samuel Chandler, D. D. concerning the Christian Doctrine of Future Punishment. The same scheme has recently been supported in a very elaborate manner, by Mr. Clark, in a publication entitled A Vindication of the Honour of God, in a Scriptural Refutation of the Doctrines of Eternal Misery and Universal Salvation.

Against the supposition of such a fire, it is urged,

1. That the body would quickly be consumed by it: but it is obvious to answer, that God might give it such a degree of fixedness and solidity, or might in the course of nature provide such recruits, as should prevent its dissolution. Compare Mark ix. 49. Fam. Expos. in Loc.

2. That the fire into which the damned are sent, is said to have been prepared for the Devil and his angels, who cannot be subject to the action of material fire: but this goes upon the supposition of their being so entirely incorporeal, as to be united to no material vehicle; which is a supposition that none can prove. Prop. 158. Schol. 2.

3. That a material fire would be inconsistent with that darkness which is said to attend the infernal prison. It is answered, That darkness might be metaphorical, or might refer to that feast, from which sinners are supposed to be excluded, (compare Matt. xxii. 13; xxv. 30.) and the gloomy horror and despair which shall surround them; nor could the terrible glare of such supposed flames be properly expressed by what is so amiable to the eye as light.

On the whole, it is of very little importance whether we say there is an external fire, or only an idea of such pain as arises from burning: and should we think both doubtful, it is certain God can give the mind a sense of agony and distress, which, though it be not analogous to any of those perceptions which the nerves convey from external objects now surrounding us, should answer and even exceed the terror of those descriptions we have now been examining: and care should certainly be taken to explain Scripture metaphors, so as that Hell may be considered as consisting more of mental agony than bodily tortures.

Dawes on Hell, p. 13. Swind. on Hell, c. iv.

Dr. Whitby thinks that the bodies of the damned, after the resurrection, shall be cast into a burning lake, where they will all at length be utterly consumed, though probably by slower degrees than such bodies as ours would be, on account of some alteration to be made in their contexture when raised from the dead. The separation of the soul from the body, occasioned by this terrible execution, he supposes to be, in the strictest propriety of speech, the second death, and that, after it, the soul, being in its own nature immortal, will for ever subsist in a separate state, and must be unutterably miserable, as the natural consequences of exclusion from Heaven, and of all those guilty passions which it will carry along with it into this state. But this seems hardly consistent with those Scriptures which represent, not merely the punishment of the wicked, but the fire in which they are tormented, as everlasting and unquenchable, and insist on this unquenchableness as a most important circumstance in the punishment of the damned, which on this hypothesis it could not be; for these separate spirits would be very little concerned in the question, whether the fire in which their bodies had been consumed were afterwards put out, or still kept burning. It is urged also, that Rev. xx. 14. is directly contrary to this hypothesis. And, by the way, it may be observed, that ἀδης spoken of here, may be the same with that visionary person represented as following death, Rev. vi. 8. and their being both cast into Hell, might signify expressly that there should be no more death properly so called, and consequently no separate state ever to succeed.

His main argument is, that this hypothesis makes the future punishment of the wicked eternal, not in consequence of any particular act of divine judgment towards them, but as the result of the natural constitution of things. Nevertheless, since he allows God to have been the Author of that constitution, and to have known all the particulars arising from it, it will (as was hinted and urged above, Sol. § 2. Arg. i. gr. 4.) be as hard to account for a general constitution, whereby creatures are made perpetually miserable, as for a particular interposition with regard to each; or rather (on the principles laid down, Prop. 32.) the difference between the one and the other is verbal rather than real. Horberry on Fut. Punish. p. 107.

LECTURE CCXXIV.

Origen, and some modern writers, particularly Dr. Hartley (in his treatise entitled Observations on Man) and Chevalier Ramsay, have apprehended, that at length all the damned, not excepting the fallen angels, and Satan the head of the apostasy, will be so reformed by the discipline of their punishment, as to be brought to real repentance and piety; upon which they will not only be released from their prison, but admitted to partake with the blessed in everlasting happiness. Those Scriptures, in which God is said to desire and will the salvation of all, as well as the preceding arguments in the second section, supposed to demonstrate the absurdity of eternal punishments, compared with the arguments both from reason and Scripture in proof of the immortality of the soul, are urged to this purpose. But these Scriptures admit of so just an interpretation another way, that there is little reason to entertain such an apprehension; and all that was urged under the first section of the proposition lies yet more directly against this hypothesis than against that of the annihilation of the damned, after they have endured punishment of some determinate time, the length of which might be proportionable to their respective offences. And it must be added, that the whole tenor of Scripture lies against this hypothesis, since it represents the judgment day as that in which the final states of men are to be irreversibly determined (compare Rev. xxii. 11. Matt. xxvi. 24.); and nothing can be more dangerous than to encourage sinners to hope that, though they should reject the Gospel, and run into the commission of all kinds of wickedness, how aggravated soever, yet the time will come when they shall outlive all the evils they are to endure on that account, and that they shall throughout all eternity be happy beyond all conception, in consequence of this temporary punishment. This representation seems utterly to subvert the whole Gospel scheme; and if any hypothesis stands in need of such a support, nothing can be more reasonable than to reject it, unless we are determined to throw aside Christianity itself.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Mr. Whiston, in order (as it seems) to get clear of the argument for the eternity of Hell-torments, from those texts of Scripture which speak of them in the same language as of the eternal duration of heavenly felicity, has thought fit to intimate his doubts concerning the latter, as well as to declare his disbelief of the former, though he owns its duration shall be much longer.—But most of the natural arguments for the immortality of the soul plead strongly against the supposition of the annihilation of good men, after having existed many millions of ages in a state of virtue and happiness: it seems not to suit our natural notions of the divine goodness and justice, to imagine he will annihilate them, though no offence has been committed to forfeit his favour: and Mr. Whiston himself does not intimate any apprehension of their falling into sin and condemnation, and so going a perpetual round of probations. We may add, that such a supposed revolt would be utterly inconsistent with what the Scripture asserts, of the care of Christ over his people, and the security especially of their heavenly state, as well as with what it says of the complete happiness of that state, which could not consist with the apprehension of annihilation, though the time when it was to be expected were or were not particularly known. But Mr. Whiston does not stop here: he in effect intimates, that the time may come when Christ also himself shall cease to be; so that the Redeemer himself and all his redeemed, according to his hypothesis, may at length be blotted out from among the works of God:—a thought so inconsistent with the doctrine of Christ's Deity, as laid down above, and on the whole so shocking, that merely to mention it seems sufficient to expose the absurdity of the principle from which it could follow. Whist. Eter. of Hell Torm.

PROPOSITION CLXIV.

To give a brief view of the Scripture doctrine of the general conflagration, which shall attend the last judgment.

SOLUTION.

1. Scripture assures us in the general, that this Earth in its present form will not be perpetual, but shall come to an end. Psal. cii. 25, 26, et sim.

2. It further tells us, that this dissolution of the world shall be by a general conflagration, in which all things upon the face of the Earth shall be destroyed; by which the atmosphere shall also be sensibly affected, as in such a case it necessarily must be (2 Pet. iii. 5—7. 10, 12.); where, from the connexion of the words, the opposition between the conflagration and the Deluge, as well as the most literal and apparent import of the phrases themselves, it is plain they cannot, as Dr. Hammond strangely supposes, refer to the desolation brought on Judea when destroyed by the Romans, but must refer to the dissolution of the whole Earth. Ray's Three Disc. p. 303.

3. The Scripture represents this great burning as a circumstance nearly connected with the day of judgment (2 Pet. iii. 7. compared with 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. Heb. x. 27. 1 Cor. iii. 12, 13.); and it is probable there may be an allusion to this in several passages of the Old Testament, such as Psal. xi. 6; l. 3; xcvii. 3. Isa. xxxiv. 4, 8—10; lxvi. 15. Dan. vii. 9, 10. Mal. iv. 1. Zeph. iii. 8. Deut. xxxii. 22. to which many parallel expressions might be added, from the canonical and apocryphal books.

4. It is not expressly declared how this burning shall be kindled, nor how it shall end; which has given occasion to various conjectures about it; the chief of which will be mentioned below.

Burnet's Theory, c. xii. Whist. Theory, c. v.

* The doctrine of the final salvation of the wicked has been maintained by several late writers. Dr. Isaac Mr. Stennett, in his Universal Restitution a Scripture Doctrine. Mr. Winchester, in his Outcasts conducted; and his Universal Restitution. Dr. Chauncy, in his Mystery hid from Ages and Generations made manifest by the Gospel Revelation; Mr. Brown, in his Restitution of all Things; and Mr. Pettipiece, in his Thoughts on Divine Goodness reconciled with Moral Agents, particularly displayed in Future Rewards and Punishments. To these authors may be added Bishop Newton, in his Dissertation on the final State and Condition of Men. See his Works vol. iii. p. 749.

SCHOLIUM 1.

The Heathens had some notion of such a conflagration; particularly Pliny the Elder, who thought there was such a propensity in nature to it, that he wondered it had not happened long ago, and the Stoics, who seem to have thought fire the first principle of all things, or the supreme God, but they held that there would through all eternity be certain periodical conflagrations and renovations of nature, in which, by a certain fatal necessity, the same persons and same events should in an endless series be produced.

SCHOLIUM 2.

Some, on the contrary, have thought a conflagration impossible, on account of the great quantity of liquids which are to be found in the Earth, sea, and atmosphere. But it is answered, 1. That the Earth may be heated to such a degree, that all these may be evaporated; of which the state of comets, in their nearest access to the sun, seems to be in fact a proof. 2. That the air is sometimes so heated, that fire is soon kindled in it, which cannot be extinguished without great difficulty. 3. That though no natural cause could be assigned, the miraculous power of Christ, or agency of his angels, may suffice: and indeed, on the whole, it seems that we could not from natural causes certainly infer that there would be a conflagration; and consequently, what some of the ancients have so confidently said of it, is to be regarded chiefly as a tradition. Vid. Prop. 21. Schol. 2. More's Theol. Works, p. 159.

LECTURE CCXXV.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Dr. Thomas Burnet supposes that many natural causes will concur, as the occasion of this burning: e. g. that many dry summers preceding it will render the face of the Earth combustible in an uncommon degree; that volcanoes will break out in many places, and that there will also be an eruption of that central fire which Dr. Woodward and some others suppose to have been lodged in the bowels of the Earth at the creation, (Woodw. Nat. Hist. part iii. § 1.) and he particularly conjectures, that one violent eruption preceding the general conflagration, will swallow up the city of Rome, and perhaps all that tract of land which is called the state of the church, in Italy, which event he thinks is intimated Rev. xix. 20. But it seems a strong objection against this supposed gradual approach of a conflagration, that our Lord describes the day of judgment as coming at an unexpected season, and supposes men in such a state of sensuality and luxury, as one could hardly imagine an Earth so desolated and ruined would be capable of affording materials for. Luke xvii. 30 (compared with 2 Pet. iii. 10.) xxii. 26—30. 1 Thess. v. 2—4.

Burnet's Theory, c. vi.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Mr. Whiston supposes that a comet will be the cause of the conflagration, as it was of the Deluge; which it may effect, either by drawing the Earth into the sun, in its descent towards it, or (which he supposes more probable) in its ascent, when heated by the sun, drawing off the vapours, emptying the seas, inflaming the air, and perhaps the surface of the Earth, or at least operating upon it so far as to make way for that action of the central fire, which he supposes would of itself be sufficient to produce a conflagration, were it not balanced by a proper degree of moisture and of cold. And indeed such alterations the access of a comet, so heated as some have been, would naturally produce, even though it should not pass close to the Earth. He supposes the comet, seen in the year 1680, may be the executioner of the divine vengeance upon the Earth, in some of its revolutions; but when that will be, he pretends not to determine. But if the possibility of calculating this period by astronomical observations be admitted, it seems inconsistent with what is said in Mark xiii. 32. and elsewhere, of the absolute uncertainty of the time when this great event will come to pass, and may perhaps afford an objection against that part of the scheme, which in other branches it appears very probable.

Whist. Theory, c. v.

SCHOLIUM 5.

What will become of this Earth, after this burning is kindled, and has done its work, it is hard to determine. Some have thought it would continue inflamed, and so become the seat of the damned; others have imagined it would rise like a phœnix out of its ashes, which hypothesis will more particularly be considered in the next proposition; and some imagine its annual motion will be so disturbed that it will become a comet, and continue for some time in that state, till possibly the approach of some other heavenly body may so alter its motion, and correct its eccentricity, as to reduce it again to a planetary state; and it is said, we know not but this may be the case with regard to many other planets and comets; and that perhaps, as the dissolution of one animal body supports the growth of another, so dissolving systems may with immense variety support and form others; but this is a very precarious conjecture, and would intimate a wider extent of natural and probably moral evil in the universe than one would be forward to allow: for the conflagration of a planet can hardly be conceived to happen without the ruin of its inhabitants. Some have thought Rev. xx. 11. and xxi. 1. some argument for this hypothesis; but it must be owned to be a very precarious one, considering how different an interpretation these words may admit of.

Burnet's Theory, lib. iv. c. viii. x.

SCHOLIUM 6.

The order assigned for this conflagration is not expressly determined in Scripture; but it seems probable that it will be after Christ's appearance, rather than before it; since it is expressly said, that some believers should be found alive at Christ's coming; which plainly shows that no such calamity will then have befallen the Earth as must destroy the whole human race, which a conflagration probably would. Therefore, comparing 2 Pet. iii. 10—13. with 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52. there seems reason to conclude that, on our Lord's appearing, the living saints, together with the dead now raised, will be caught up to meet him, the bodies of the former undergoing some great, yet gentle, and probably delightful, change, to make them fit for a celestial life (1 Thess. iv. 15, &c.); but as for the wicked, whether they will be judged and condemned before this fire is kindled, after it is spent, or while it continues, is not expressly asserted; perhaps, by the righteous judgment of God, those found alive may be left to die by these flames, of which they will be the more worthy, considering the peculiar aggravation attending their crimes, in consequence of those circumstances which will hereafter be represented. Vid. Prop. 166.

SCHOLIUM 7.

Bishop Burnet thinks that the action of this fire upon the bodies of the dead would have some natural efficacy, to render the particles of them more pure and fixed, and so to fit them for an immortal life; but it is not easy to understand this efficacy, or to reconcile this hypothesis (so far as it may relate to the righteous) with what is said in the preceding scholium, and with 1 Thess. iv. 15. where it is expressly asserted, "That the living saints shall not be changed before the dead in Christ are raised;" so that, on the whole, if there be any thing at all in this conjecture, it must only relate to the bodies of the wicked. Burn. on the Art. p. 66.

SCHOLIUM 8.

Mr. Fleming also supposed that the conflagration would attend Christ's first appearance to judgment; and would not only precede the general resurrection, but also the change of those who were found alive. He thought the most eminent saints would immediately be caught up and changed; that the wicked who were then alive would (as was intimated at the end of the sixth scholium) be burnt to death by the last fire; and that persons in the main good, but whose characters were attended with some remarkable imperfections, would feel in proportion to those imperfections some different degrees of pain and terror on this occasion; which he supposes to be intimated, when it is spoken of as the peculiar privilege of some good men, that they should not be hurt by the second death, (Rev. ii. 2.) and that it should have no power over them, Rev. xx. 6. He seems to think that something like this would also be the case of those true Christians who were before dead in the like imperfect state of virtue and holiness; for he fancied the resurrection would be accomplished before the conflagration was entirely over, and to this he refers that disputed passage, 1 Cor. iii. 15. Origen taught a doctrine nearly resembling this; but he extended the efficacy of this purging fire in some degree to the most eminent Christians, not excepting the apostles themselves; and this, by the way, was the first purgatory taught in the Christian church; but this order is directly contrary to 1 Thess. iv. 15. and the text referred to above will so easily admit of a different interpretation, that few will believe, in consequence of his arguments from them, that Christ should appear to torment them, and terrify great numbers of those whom he immediately intended to raise to perfect glory and felicity, and most of whom had dwelt with him in the holiness and happiness of the intermediate state.

Flem. on the Millen. vol. iii. p. 44.

LECTURE CCXXVI.

PROPOSITION CLXV.

To state the hypothesis of those who assert that, after the conflagration, there shall be a renovation of the Earth; and to enumerate the chief Scriptures which they urge in support of that assertion.

SOLUTION.

1. Dr. Thomas Burnet and Mr. Whiston concur in asserting that the Earth will not be entirely consumed; but that the matter of which it consists will be fixed, purified, and refined; which they say will be the natural consequence of the action of fire upon it, though it is hard to say what such a purification can do towards fitting it for its intended purpose: for it is certain, a mass of crystal or glass would very ill answer the following parts of this hypothesis.

2. They suppose, that from these materials thus refined, as from a second chaos, there will, by the power of God, arise a new creation; and that the face of the Earth, and likewise the atmosphere, will then be so restored, as to resemble what it originally was in the paradisaical state, and consequently to render it a more desirable abode for human creatures than it at present is; and they urge for this purpose the following texts, viz. 2 Pet. iii. 13 (comp. Isa. lxv. 17; lxvi. 22.) Matt. xix. 28, 29. (compare Mark x. 29, 30. Luke xviii. 29, 30.) Psal. cii. 25, 26. Acts iii. 21. 1 Cor. vii. 31. Rom. viii. 21.

3. They agree in supposing that, in this new state of things, there will be no sea. Rev. xxi. 1.

4. Mr. Whiston also supposes that the comet, which will occasion the conflagration, coming on the east side of the Earth, will impress a force upon it, by which its diurnal motion will be impaired to such a degree, as that the remainder of it will only suffice to carry it round its own axis once, while it dispatcheth its course in the ecliptic; the consequence of which will be, that one hemisphere will have perpetual day, and the other never see the sun at all; but the want of that, he supposes, will be supplied by some bright luminary, which shall appear fixed in the zenith of that hemisphere, and which may therefore be called, The glory of the Lord. He also supposes that the attraction of the comet will occasion a final separation of the Moon, which will be no longer necessary. Rev. xxi. 23—25; xxii. 5. Dr. Thomas Burnet conjectures that the renovation of the earth will, in a great measure, be occasioned by correcting the obliquity of its axis, and causing it to remain at right angles with the ecliptic; but Dr. Keil has admirably proved, in his Examination of the Theory, that this would be a mischief to the Earth, rather than a benefit; and, besides all the other inconveniences and difficulties attending this part of Mr. Whiston's hypothesis, that of continual summer and day, at least in that hemisphere towards the sun, seems to be of great weight; and if the Earth were supposed to be hereafter removed so far from the sun as to render such a degree of heat tolerable, the degree of light on that hemisphere must be proportionably diminished.

5. They both suppose that the Earth, thus beautified and improved, shall be inhabited by those who shall inherit the first resurrection, and shall here enjoy a very considerable degree of happiness, though not equal to that which is to succeed the general judgment; which judgment shall, according to them, open when those thousand years are expired, mentioned Rev. xx. 4, &c. 1 Thess. iv. 17. (comp. ver. 15.); which passage is thought by some to contain an insinuation that Paul expected to be alive at the appearance of Christ; which must imply an expectation of being thus raised from the dead before it; but it is answered, That the expression We that are alive, may only signify "Those of us that are so," speaking of all Christians as one body, 1 Cor. xv. 49—52. It is remarkable that Dr. Hartley has declared it as his opinion, that this Millennium shall consist of a thousand prophetical years, where each day is a year, i. e. of 360000 years, pleading that this is the language used in other parts of the Revelations.

Whist. Theory. Burn. Theory. Keil's Exam. of Burnet.

SCHOLIUM 1.

It seems an invincible objection against this hypothesis, which places the Millennium after the conflagration, that the saints inhabiting the Earth after the first resurrection, are represented as distressed by the invasion of some wicked enemies, who are called Gog and Magog. Rev. xx. 7—9. Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. Now, forasmuch as the whole race of mankind must be destroyed from the face of the Earth by the conflagration, if not miraculously removed from it, it is impossible to account for the existence of those wicked men on the renewed Earth,—not to mention the difficulty of saying what would become of those good men who were found alive at the conflagration, who cannot all be supposed worthy of the first resurrection; nor can we imagine they would be changed to dwell here. It is difficult, with respect to the forementioned objection, either to suppose that some of the saints shall be perverted, or that the wicked shall be raised before their time, as it seems, purely to afflict God's people. To solve this objection, Dr. Burnet, on Glanville's wild principles, is driven to the wretched expedient of supposing a race of earth-born men to spring like mushrooms out of the ground.

Gibson. Luc. Orient. p. 142. Campbell's Necessity of Revelation, p. 273.

Though Mr. Fleming does not entirely agree with Dr. Burnet and Mr. Whiston in all the foregoing particulars, yet he interprets Rev. xx. 6. as referring to a proper resurrection. He supposes that what happened Matt. xxvii. 52. was a pledge of this; and, by the way, he conjectures that the most celebrated saints of the Old-Testament times then arose, and ascended with Christ to Heaven (forgetting, as it seems, the strong objection against this from Acts ii. 29). Agreeably to this, he apprehends that the saints, who are to be the subjects of the first resurrection, will perhaps appear to some of the inhabitants of this Earth, which may be a means of reviving religion among them; yet will not have their abode here; but that during the thousand years in which the kingdom of Christ shall have its highest triumph on Earth, they shall be rejoicing with him in Heaven, in a state of happiness far superior to that which they enjoyed in the separate state, yet not equal to what is to be expected after the general judgment. To this peculiar privilege of the martyrs, and some other eminent saints, he supposes St. Paul to have referred, Phil. iii. 9—11. in that very emphatical phrase, (especially according to the Alexandrian reading, which is well attested by several other copies,) την εξαναστασιν την εκ των νεκρων; and he lays it down as a general rule, that εξαναστασις, or αναστασις εκ των νεκρων, whenever either of them is used, signifies this first resurrection from among the rest of the dead; and on this foundation he gives a peculiar but very precarious turn to Luke ii. 34; xx. 35, 36. John xi. 25, 26. Acts iv. 2; xxvi. 23. Rom. i. 4.

LECTURE CCXXVII.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Mr. Ray agrees that there will be a renovation of the Earth, and though he does not grant, as some have supposed, a resurrection of the same animals that once lived upon it, (as well seeing there would not be room to contain them,) yet he supposes that other like animals will be created anew, as well as like vegetables, to adorn the Earth, and to support the animals, only all in higher degrees of beauty and perfection than they have ever before had; but he pretends not to determine whether the Earth, thus beautified and adorned, as he supposes, after the general resurrection, shall be the seat of a new race of men, or only remain as the object of contemplation to some happy spirits, who may behold it, though without any rational animals to inhabit it, as a curious plan of the most exquisite mechanism; which last seems to be a very wild, as well as the former a very precarious, hypothesis,—and would make all the supposed bounty of God bestowed upon it perfectly insignificant and useless.

Ray's Disc. Nat. Disp. vol. i. p. 290.

SCHOLIUM 4.

The patrons of the millenary scheme, as laid down in the proposition, plead, not only that there was among the Stoic philosophers a tradition of the renovation of the Earth, (vid. Prop. 164. Schol. 1.) but also that it was generally asserted by the Christian fathers. But Dr. Whitby supposes the Millennium to refer entirely to the prosperous state of the Christian church after the conversion of the Jews, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall also flow into it, denying that such a tradition did ever universally prevail,—the chief authority of which rests on a passage of Irenæus, where he relates it as a report of Papias, a person generally esteemed of but little credit: and indeed it is certain that the account he gives of the matter does by no means agree with that of Burnet and Whiston; and contains some particulars too gross to be admitted on such slender evidence.

What. on Millen. Burnet's Theory. Burn. Archæol. p. 236. Ray's Disc. p. 406.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Dr. Whitby endeavours to invalidate all those Scripture proofs which Burnet, Whiston, and Ray, have urged in favour of their respective schemes, especially the two former; and further pleads against it,

1. That it would be a great detriment to the glorified saints to be brought down to dwell upon Earth, in the most pleasing form which it can be supposed to put on.

2. That it is inconsistent with the description which the Scripture gives of the resurrection, and the change to be made in the body that shall be raised.

3. That it is contrary to the genius of the Christian religion, to suppose it built on temporal promises.

To the first of these objections it may be replied, That none knows to what degree the Earth may be beautified and adorned, or to what happiness the saints may arrive, when free (as this hypothesis supposes they will be) from all moral and penal law. To the second, That the account of the spirituality of the saints' bodies after the resurrection, is to be understood as referring to the general resurrection only; and may be consistent with supposing that some saints shall at first be raised in a less perfect state, (as we know some few who have already been raised were,) who shall, at the consummation of all things, undergo a proper change. To the third, That though it is the genius of the Christian religion to govern its professors by faith rather than sight, nevertheless, as this first resurrection is the object of faith, there is no absurdity in supposing it to be promised,—especially since all agree that there will be some pleasure in Heaven suited to the corporeal part of our nature;—and Whitby himself allows that there are promises of great temporal prosperity made to the church in the latter days.

On the whole, the most considerable argument against the literal interpretation of the passages in question, arises from the nature of the book of the Revelations, which is so plainly figurative in the greatest part of it, that it seems reasonable, on principles of analogy, to suppose it to be so here, and to interpret this resurrection as a revival of the cause, rather than of the persons; and the rather, as the resurrection of the two witnesses, mentioned Rev. xi. 11. is generally acknowledged to be meant in this figurative sense: but the expression of the

* Dr. Caleb Fleming, in his Survey of the Search after Souls, has advanced an opinion, That the final judgment of every man takes place immediately after his dissolution, and that the mediatorial kingdom of Christ consists in the exercise of this judgment, until the restitution or consummation of all things. rest of the dead, is hard to be explained, even with this key. Whitby on Millen. Mil's examination concord."

SCHOLIUM 6.

Dr. Worthington has advanced a scheme very different from any of these writers in the main, though in some circumstances resembling theirs, which is, that the Gospel, being intended to restore the ruins of the Fall, will gradually meliorate the world, till by a train of natural consequences, under the influence of Divine Providence and grace, it is restored to a paradisaical state. He supposes this plan is already advanced through some important stages, of which he thinks the amendment of the Earth's natural state at the Deluge (which, with Dr. Sherlock, he maintains) to have been a very considerable one. He considers all improvements in learning and arts, as well as the propagation of the Gospel among the heathen nations, as the process of this scheme; but he apprehends much greater advances are to be made, about the year of Christ 2000, when the Millennium will commence; which shall be, according to him, such a glorious state as Whitby supposes, but with this additional circumstance, that, after some interruption from the last effects of wickedness by Gog and Magog, this shall terminate in the yet nobler state of the new Heaven and the new Earth, spoken of Rev. xxi. xxii. which he supposes will be absolutely Paradise restored; in which all natural and moral evil shall be banished from Earth, and death itself shall have no further place; but good men shall continue in the highest rectitude of state, and in the greatest imaginable degree of terrestrial felicity, till the coming of Christ and universal judgment close this beautiful and delightful scene, perhaps several thousands of years hence. Indeed, he seems to intimate some apprehension, that the consummation of all things will happen about the year of the world 25920, the end of the great year, as the Platonics called it, when the equinoxes shall have revolved. But the reasonings by which these conjectures are supported, are, on the one hand, too diffuse to be represented; and, on the other, too superficial to need to be confuted here.

LECTURE CCXXVIII.

PROPOSITION CLXVI.

Briefly to survey the chief prophecies of Scripture, relating to the conversion of the Jews, and its consequences with regard to the Gentile world.

SOLUTION AND DEMONSTRATION.

1. Though the Jews have for many ages been rejected by God, and driven out from their ancient inheritance, and though, during their dispersion, they have generally expressed an obstinate and implacable aversion to Christianity, and indeed a great disregard to all true morality and religion,—it is foretold that they will at length embrace their own Messiah, whom they now reject, and thereupon be taken into the divine favour and covenant anew. Rom. xi. 11—36. Isa. xlv. 17, 23—25; liv. per tot.; lx. lxii. lxv. lxvi. Jer. xxxi. 31—34. Hos. iii. 4, 5. Zech. xii. 9; xiii. 1; and many Scriptures quoted below.

2. On their conversion, they shall, by a train of wonderful providences, be gathered together from the countries in which they are now scattered, and conducted to their own land, where they shall become a prosperous and honourable, as well as a religious, nation. Isa. xxvii. 12, 13. Ezek. xi. 17—21; xxxvi. 24—28; xxxvii. 21—28; xxxix. 25—29. Hos. i. 10, 11. Amos ix. 14, 15. Zech. xiv. 10, 11, 21.

3. Whereas, on their settlement in their own land, some enemies shall make an assault upon them, some celebrated victory over such enemies is foretold, Isa. lxvi. 16, 24. Ezek. xxxviii. 39. Joel iii. 9—14. Zech. xiv. 1—15. Rev. xx. 8—10. to which we may perhaps add Isa. lix. 19. Micah iv. 11, 13. Zeph. iii. 8.

4. This interposition of God, in the methods of his providence and grace, for the recovery and defence of the Jews, shall make such impressions on the Gentiles, as to be a means of bringing in the fulness of them. Isa. xlix. 6. Rom. xi. 12, 15, 25, 26. See the passages quoted pr. 1.

Burn. App. ad Stat. Mort. Clark on the Proph. p. 243. Powell's Concord. Lavdn. Circumst. of the Jews, p. 65.‡

When the context of most of those places referred to is examined, it will appear that few, if any of them, can be justly applied to the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity; especially considering how expressly their regard to David their king, i. e. to Christ, is mentioned, as previous to ‡ Dr. Boothroyd, in his new translation of Jeremiah, has considered the subject of the restoration of the Jews. See the introductions and notes on that and other chapters. The same excellent commentator is engaged in the second part of Dr. Priestley's Sermons, and has contributed to the Discourses on the Theology of Revelation. Discourse the second, p. 205—240.

those gracious appearances of God in their favour; and also how expressly it is promised, in some of those passages, that the Jews, after the restoration referred to in them, shall never be rooted out of their land any more.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is not improbable that Deut. xxx. 1–6. and many other places in the Pentateuch, refer chiefly to this greatest dispersion of the Jews, and their final restoration; though most of the phrases there used are such as suited all the eminent deliverances God wrought out for them, so that each of those deliverances might be looked upon as an accomplishment of this prediction; nevertheless, those treated of in the proposition, being the greatest events of the kind, it seems reasonable to consider this prophecy of Moses as chiefly centring in them, though comprehending the other as types or models, which preserves a unity of sense and design as much as any interpretation whatsoever can do: and indeed the passage referred to above seems a general prophecy, That, upon their return to God, they should always be delivered; with an intimation, (ver. 6.) that, through God's gracious operation, this happy turn should be the final catastrophe of their nation. Compare Prop. 112. Cor. 1.

Jackson's Credibility, p. 169. &c. Patrick in Loc.

SCHOLIUM 3.

How far the form of government and religion among the Jews may, upon their restoration to their own land, be changed from what it originally was, we cannot certainly say; but it is exceedingly probable that so much of their ancient law will continue in force, as can be reconciled with the genius of the Christian religion; and that God will raise up some divinely inspired prophets among them, with a full declaration of his mind and will in relation to a variety of questions, which we have not light enough to decide: and some have thought that Elias, i. e. John the Baptist, (of whom the Old Testament prophesied by that name,) will then be raised from the dead, and bear a considerable part in the glorious work of converting and settling them. Jer. iii. 15. Mal. iv. 5, 6.

Jeffries's Review. Mede on Mark i. 11.

SCHOLIUM 4.

Some have supposed that the ancient patriarchs will then be raised from the dead; and Lord Barrington, in particular, thinks (as Irenæus formerly did) this supposition necessary for vindicating the truth of God, in promising to them, as well as to their seed, the land of Canaan, which they never in their lifetime possessed. He thinks that this is the easiest way of clearing up our Lord's argument for a resurrection, from God's calling himself their God after their death, Matt. xxii. 31. and the parallel places. But it is certain our Lord's argument will be conclusive without this; and the land might be said to be given to the patriarchs, as they were secured by the divine promise, that their seed should possess it: and if the Hebrew particle be rendered even, as it often is, all shadow of an argument from this promise will be removed. Compare Isa. lvi. 5. Ezek. xx. 11. Psal. li. ult. Mic. ii. 13. where it is thus rendered.

Barrington's Ess. on Dis. Disp. p. 84.

SCHOLIUM 5.

Some have apprehended, that several extraordinary miracles shall be wrought to assist the Jews in their return, Mic. vii. 15. particularly, that the rivers shall be dried up which would oppose their passage, (Isa. xi. 15, 16. Zech. x. 11. compare Rev. xvi. 12.) that others shall be open in dry places through which they are to march, (Isa. xli. 17, 18; xliii. 19, 20.) and that Christ himself shall appear in person among them, to lead them on in a considerable body, (Isa. lii. 12; lviii. 8. Hos. i. 10, 11. Mic. ii. 12, 13.) But it is certain several of these texts may admit of a different interpretation, and may perhaps be only figurative expressions of their being the objects of God's peculiar care and favour. Nevertheless, should these events actually happen, there would be great reason to believe that an all-seeing God, whose work is always actually before him, referred to them in such predictions.

SCHOLIUM 6.

A late writer has given it as his opinion, that the Jews shall be restored to their own land, and live for some time in great prosperity there, under the Mosaic economy and law, the Lord being their King, before they become Christians: which he argues, partly from the latter part of the prophecy of Ezekiel, concerning the building of a temple, which must be intended for such a ritual as the Mosaic law appointed, in connexion with several other passages referred to above, predicting the observation of such rites, (compare Zech. xiv. 16.) and partly from the order of the events foretold, Zech. xii. xiii. But it is answered, 1. That this is in the nature of things improbable. 2. That Ezekiel's temple may be mystically explained: or that, even under Christianity, some Jewish rites may in that place be restored. 3. That great absurdities would follow, from supposing all the events described in Zech. xii. and xiii. to follow each other in the order there laid down; and, among the rest, Christ's death would happen, after they had looked to him whom they had pierced.

Restoration of Jews and Israelites, p. 37.

SCHOLIUM 7.

As for the time when those glorious scenes shall open on the Christian church, commentators and other critics have been much divided among themselves. Some passages in the Revelations seem to fix the beginning of them at the distance of 1260 years from the rise of Antichrist, Rev. xii. 6, 14: xi. 2, 3. (compare Dan. xii. 7.) but the main difficulty lies in fixing the date of that rise. Most Protestant writers have dated it from the year 606, when Pope Boniface the Third assumed the title of Universal Bishop, conferred upon him by Phocas, ending A. D. 1866. But Mr. Fleming, and after him Sir Isaac Newton and Mr. Lowman, fix it about the middle of the eighth century, A. D. 756, when Pepin invested Pope Stephen with the temporal dominion of Rome and the neighbouring territories, on the ceasing of the exarchate of Ravenna; which is the more probable, as the other horns mentioned in the context are plainly temporal kingdoms: and as this happened nearly 666 years after John saw the vision recorded in the Apocalypse, A. D. 90. that seems the most probable interpretation of the number of the beast. Sir Isaac (after Irenæus, l. v. c. xxx.) refers it to the numeral letters of the word Α Α Τ Ε Ι Ν Ο Σ, and the Hebrew ס מ י ט ן, which do each of them make 666, and supposes that the mark of the beast is the sign of the cross, Rev. xiii. ult. On this hypothesis, that period will end in the year 2016.

Mr. Maurice dates the rise of the beast from the year 606, (which he supposes was 666 years after the Romans possessed Judea, when the rise of the fourth monarchy there must begin,) and adding to this number the 1260 days, (or years,) with 30 more for the languishing state of the Antichristian glory, and 45 for the pouring out of the vial, which was to be attended with its utter ruin, he fixes the end of this period in the year 1941. (Compare Dan. xii. 7, 11, 12.) And, by the way, he observes, that as the Turks ruined the eastern empire, A. D. 1453, and are to continue an hour, a day, a month, and a year, (see Rev. ix. 15.) i. e. according to the Julian reckoning, 396 years, they shall fall, A. D. 1849; and that after seventeen years triumph, Antichrist shall come to his end; i. e. begin to fall, A. D. 1866; which coincides with the former period, and so confirms it. Compare Dan. xi.

Maurice's Serm. of Tribes appearing, p. 54.

Mr. Fleming, computing the last-mentioned time, Rev. ix. 15. by prophetic years, makes it 391, and refers it to another event, viz. to the taking of Constantinople, in the year 1453, which was just that distance of time from the uniting the four Turkish kingdoms under one head.

Flem. on the First Resur. p. 126.

We shall conclude this scholium with observing, That when three years and a half are supposed equal to 1260 days, it plainly goes upon the supposition that the prophetic year, which probably was the ancient year, (see Whist. Theory, l. ii. p. 144—182.) consisting of twelve months of 30 days each, i. e. of 360 days, is made use of;—and if it be, the end of the period when Antichrist is to fall should be reckoned by the same year; which will make an alteration in all the computations above, and will reduce the fall of Antichrist, on Fleming's hypothesis, to A. D. 1998, and on the common, to A. D. 1848. And if, upon the same principles, the 666 years be reckoned by prophetical, not Julian, years, it will amount to very little more than 656 Julian; which, if the above hypothesis be allowed, will fix the date of the Revelations to about the year 100.

LECTURE CCXXIX.

PROPOSITION CLXVII.

To give a summary view of Mr. Lowman's late celebrated and valuable scheme for interpreting the book of the Revelations.

SOLUTION.

1. He proves that the seven epistles, contained in the second and third chapters, are not prophetic, but relate to the state and circumstances of the seven churches to whom they are directed, at the time when this book was written. Compare cap. i. 19.

2. He supposes the remainder of the book to be a prophetical representation of the most remarkable events which were to befall the Christian church, from that time to the consummation of all things; rejecting those schemes, in which, by various fanciful synchronisms, the seals, trumpets, and vials are represented and expounded as successive representations of the same event.

3. He considers the fourth and fifth chapters as only introductory to the prophetic part of the book; and justly observes, (as Sir Isaac Newton and many other good commentators had done,) that there is in the scenery here, and all along, a beautiful reference to the temple worship. Sir Is. Newton on Proph.

4. He divides the remainder into seven periods: the first of which, represented by the seals, shows, according to him, the state of the church under the Heathen Roman emperors, from A. D. 95—323. and here he more particularly explains the first seal (Rev. vi. 2.) of the triumph of Christianity over Jewish and Heathen oppression; the second (ver. 3, 4.) of the judgments of God on the Jewish persecutors, under Trajan and Adrian; the third (ver. 5, 6.) of the famine in the time of the Antonines; the fourth (ver. 7, 8.) of the pestilence and other calamities which befell the empire, in the reigns of Maximian, Valerian, and the intermediate emperors; the fifth (ver. 9—11.) of the persecution under Diocletian, A. D. 270—298; the sixth (ver. 12—17.) of the commotions of the empire from Maximian to Constantine; the seventh chapter, i. e. the sealing of the 144,000, he interprets of the numerous converts to Christianity, which happened between this and the second period, (vii. 1—8.) in the triumphs of which the heavenly world is beautifully represented as rejoicing (vii. 9—12.) The seventh seal is only introductory to the trumpets.

5. The second period, which is that of the trumpets, (cap. viii. ix.) according to Mr. Lowman, relates to what was to happen in the Christian church from Constantine, A. D. 337—750, when the Mahometan conquests ceased in the West. More particularly, the first trumpet, which produced hail and fire, mingled with blood, (cap. viii. 7.) he refers to the bloody wars which happened in Constantine's family, A. D. 337—352; the second, of the burning mountain, (ver. 8, 9.) to the invasion of Italy by the northern nations, and the taking of Rome by Alaric king of the Goths, A. D. 359—410; the third, of the star of wormwood, (ver. 10, 11.) the succeeding ravages of Italy, and founding the Gothic kingdom there, A. D. 412—493; the fourth, of darkening the sun, moon, and stars, (ver. 12.) to the wars in Italy between the Goths and Justinian's generals, which ended in erecting the exarchate of Ravenna, A. D. 493—558; the fifth trumpet, of the locusts from the bottomless pit, (ix. 1—12.) to the rise and increase of the Mahometan religion and empire, till checked by internal divisions, A. D. 568—675; the sixth, of loosing the four angels and flaming horsemen, (ver. 13—21.) to the Saracens invading Europe and ravaging it, till their defeat by Charles Martel;—the seventh trumpet is only introductory to the vials.

6. The third period, according to him, represents the state of the church and world in the time of the last head of the Roman government, i. e. under the Pope, for 1260 years, viz. from A. D. 756 to 2016. Vid. Prop. 166. Schol. 7. This grand discovery, being introduced by the solemnity of a peculiar message from God by an angel, (cap. x.) is first described by general representations of the temple, and the witnesses (cap. xi.); then of the woman in the wilderness (cap. xii.); then by a monstrous wild beast, signifying the new Roman and persecuting power (cap. xiii.) The xivth chapter is, according to him, an episode, containing strong representations of the happiness of those who should preserve their integrity, and the general purpose of God to bring vengeance in due time upon this wicked and persecuting power. The xvth contains the appearance of the seven angels with the vials, and a song of celestial praise on that account. Then follows the pouring out of the vials, (cap. xvi.) each of which he expounds of some great judgment upon the Papal kingdom. The first, (xvi. 1, 2.) on the earth, of the wars in the family of Charles the Great, by which it was ruined, A. D. 930—988; the second, (ver. 3.) on the sea, of the effusion of blood in the holy war, A. D. 1040—1190; the third, (ver. 4—7.) on the rivers and fountains of water, of the civil wars between the Guelphs and Ghibellins, when the Popes were driven out of Italy, A. D. 1200—1370; the fourth, (ver. 8, 9.) on the sun, of the long wars in Italy, Germany, France, and Spain, occasioned by schisms in the popedom, A. D. 1378—1530; the fifth, (ver. 10, 11.) on the seat of the beast, he explains of the Reformation, A. D. 1560—1650; the sixth, (ver. 12—16.) of drying up Euphrates, he supposes yet to come, and conjectures it may be some invasion of the Pope's dominions from the East; the seventh, (xvi. 17, &c.) of the final destruction of Rome. The following chapters (xvii—xix.) are assurances and descriptions of this final ruin, given by angelic messengers to John, and consist of songs of praise on the occasion; and in the last, Christ is represented as leading an army out of Heaven to effect this grand event.

7. The fourth period is that of a thousand years, or the Millennium, in which the church will be in a most prosperous state, A. D. 2000—3000 (Prop. 165. Schol. 4, 5.); so that, according to him, the seventh chiliad is to be a kind of Sabbath.

Ainsw. on Gen. i. 31. Burn. Theory, p. 209.

8. The fifth period is the renewed invasion of the enemies of the church, for a short time, not defined, but which is to end in their final extirpation and ruin (cap. xx. 7—10.) Compare Prop. 166. gr. 3.

9. The sixth period is the general resurrection and final judgment, (cap. xx. ver. 11—15.) which terminate.

10. In the seventh grand period, in which the saints are represented as fixed in a state of everlasting triumph and happiness in the heavenly world (cap. xxi. 1—5.)

11. The conclusion of the book confirms the truth of all, and deduces the grand moral which runs through it, viz. That though the church of Christ is to struggle with great difficulties, he will support it in the midst of all, and make righteousness and truth finally victorious.

Pyle's Ded. and Pref. to Rev.[*]

[*] Mr Daubuz's book on the Revelation, which was written a considerable number of years before that of Mr. Lowman, is considered as a work of great learning and merit. The discussion of several particular points relative to the Apocalypse may be seen in the Synopsis, Bishop Hurd and Bishop Halifax, referred to in the last note. Mr. Fleming's Dissertation on the Rise of Antichrist has likewise excited extraordinary attention. The whole book of Revelation has been

SCHOLIUM 1.

On the whole, it must be acknowledged that there is a beautiful resemblance between the prophetic representations, and the events supposed to be correspondent to them in many particulars; and the historical facts are represented with great learning and judgment by this excellent author; yet the correspondence is not in all respects so clear as might be expected, nor can we sometimes say why those in question are represented by one of the emblems, rather than by another. Yet, after all, he has finely illustrated many passages, by similar phrases from the prophetic books of the Old Testament, in which he is quite unequalled; and has made out so much, especially with respect to the first, and the beginning of the third, period, as evidently proves the book to be a glorious confirmation of Christianity, and well worthy our most attentive study.

SCHOLIUM 2.

It is to be observed, That the book of the Revelations does not contain a view of things and persons really existing, but merely a view of what passed in the imagination of St. John; in which scene there were plainly some allegorical persons, v. g. the animals, by a mistake called beasts in our translation; and it is on these principles that the representation of the New Jerusalem, under the figure of a city coming down from God, is to be explained.

SCHOLIUM 3.

Dr. Hartley (in his Observations on Man, vol. ii. p. 366) supposes that all present civil and ecclesiastical governments will be dissolved; and that, as other churches have copied after the Babylonish whore, they will in their degree partake in her plagues: and the author of the Critical Notes on some passages of Scripture (printed for Davis, 1747) thinks, that when Babylon shall be brought to utter destruction, that event will be a signal to the ten kingdoms that their dissolution is also approaching (Crit. Notes, p. 14, 15). These ten kingdoms he reckons:—1. Ireland; 2. Great Britain; 3. Germany, south of the Elbe; 4. France; 5. Spain; 6. Lombardy with Istria, Sardinia, and Corsica; 7. The Pope's patrimony, with Romania and Tuscany; 8. The Two Sicilies; 9. Pannonia, or Hungary; and, 10. Illyricum, or Turkey in Europe. Supposing these two circumstances must meet, viz. That the kingdoms must all have made a part of the old Roman empire, and must also have been, for a time, devoted with the rest to the spiritual power of Rome (ibid. p. 130, 131.); but it may seem surprising that reformed countries should be involved in the ruin of the church they have reformed from and protested against. Compare Rev. xviii. 4. and it is evident that the particular division above is very precarious.

The most considerable doctrines of natural religion are so far from being contradicted, that they are established, by the Gospel; particularly those which relate to the being, perfections, and attributes of God, his universal providence, government, and a future state of rewards and punishments. Prop. 95. gr. 1.

Ibid. gr. 6. 2. The most important branches of those duties which we owe to God, our fellow-creatures, and ourselves, are plainly described and inculcated in the precepts of the Gospel. Ibid. gr. 6.

Prop. 96. Cor. 3. The ceremonial observances instituted in the Gospel are but few; and those evidently calculated to answer the great ends of practical religion.

Prop. 95. gr. 2. 4. The Gospel discovers to us many particulars, of which the evidence on the principles of natural religion was dubious, and which a fallen creature might greatly and painfully doubt of; particularly the pardon of sin, however aggravated, on sincere repentance, and a state of complete and eternal glory reserved for all that are sincerely virtuous, notwithstanding the imperfection of their present attainments, while it threatens to the vicious and impenitent final and everlasting punishment.

Amory on Christ the Light of the World.

Ibid. gr. 3, 6. 5. The Gospel discovers a rich variety of truths, relating both to Christ and the Holy Spirit, which by the light of nature alone we could not possibly have found out; but which, when they are known, tend greatly to encourage the mind, and strike in a very powerful manner on those principles of gratitude which are the noblest sources of genuine and acceptable obedience.

Ibid. gr. 7. 6. As the apparent end of all is to promote virtue in general, so it is observable that this scheme of salvation, by faith in Christ, and through the free grace of God in him, together with what relates to the influence of the Divine Spirit upon our souls, has the most admirable tendency to promote humility, representing us as ignorant and guilty, polluted and enslaved. 1 Cor. i. 30.

Chandl. Posth. Serm. vol. i.

Ibid. gr. 4, 5. 7. It further appears, from a survey of the foregoing heads, that though many things yet remain mysterious and obscure,—yet those in which the regulation of our tempers and practice is most immediately concerned, are so plain as to admit of very little dispute.

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. 8. Valet propositio.

*Baxt. Reas. of Chris. Reynolds to a Deist.

COROLLARY 1.

Hence it evidently appears that they do much mistake the nature and design of Christianity, who represent it as merely a republication of the religion of nature. Warburton's Divine Leg. vol. i.

COROLLARY 2.

It further appears, that we have great reason to bless God for a revelation, attended with so many important circumstances, and so excellently adapted to answer the necessities of mankind. Matt. xiii. 16, 17.

COROLLARY 3.

We may further argue, that an attentive study of the Scriptures, and especially of the New Testament, may be an excellent mean of establishing our faith in the Scripture revelation. Acts xx. 32.

COROLLARY 4.

It appears from hence, that we shall serve the cause of virtue and piety in the world, by endeavouring all we can to establish the character and reputation of the New Testament; and that those schemes which would represent the writings of the apostles, as merely their own private opinions, or the relations concerning Christ, as liable to the common imperfections which attend well-meant reports of long-distant facts, must be very prejudicial to Christianity, and of practical religion, so nearly connected with it. Chub's true Gosp.

COROLLARY 5.

It is highly proper that the peculiarities of the Gospel scheme should be much insisted upon by Christian preachers; which may also further be argued from the pomp of miracles, by which this revelation was introduced into the world, and which must have appeared unworthy the Divine Wisdom and Majesty, if those things which were peculiar to it are of so little importance as many seem to suppose. Heb. ii. 3, 4. Watts's Redeemer, &c. Jennings on Christ.

COROLLARY 6.

It is of the highest importance to fall in with the practical design of the Gospel, and always to consider and represent it, not merely as an object of amusement and speculation, but as a system of truths intended to sanctify the heart, and to regulate the life, and thereby to train us up for the complete happiness of a future state. Matt. vii. 24—27. John xiii. 17.

COROLLARY 7.

They who have experimentally felt the power of the Gospel on their hearts, will have an additional evidence to confirm their faith, in proportion to the degree that its efficacy has prevailed. John vii. 17. 1 John v. 10.

Watts's Ser. vol. i. Boyse's 2 Serm. on 1 John v. 10.

COROLLARY 8

It follows from all, that to cultivate a devotional temper, and study as much as possible to enter into the spirit of the Gospel, and to conform every action and every sentiment to the tenor of it, must be one of the most important branches of a proper furniture and preparation for the ministerial work;—and God grant this remark may be deeply fixed on the memories and hearts of all who have studied this various course of Theological Lectures, whatever else be disputed or forgotten!

Watts's Hum. Attempt. Somes for recav. Relig.

Ὃς αὐτὸς, καὶ ὃ αὐτὸς, καὶ ὡς αὐτὸς τὰ πάντα.

* The subject of the internal evidence of Christianity occurs, more or less, in most of the general treatises on the divine authority of our holy religion. To this head also may be referred Dr Benson's History of the Life of Jesus Christ, and Dr Craig's Essay on the Life of Jesus Christ. Bishop Newcome's Observations on our Lord's Conduct as a Divine Instructor, and on the Excellence of his Moral Character, come under the same class. Direct publications on the subject are, Mr Soame Jenyns's View of the Internal Evidence of Christian Religion, Dr Maclaine's Series of Letters, addressed to Soame Jenyns, Esq. on Occasion of his View of the Internal Evidences of Christianity, Mr Toulmin's Dissertations on the Internal Evidences and Excellence of Christianity, and on the Character of Christ, compared with that of some other celebrated Founders of Religion and Philosophy; and Mr. Gilbert Wakefield's Remarks on the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion. Two additional books, of singular merit, are Dr Duchal's Presumptive Arguments for the Truth and Divine Authority of the Christian Religion, and Archdeacon Paley's Hora Paulinæ.

DEDICATION.

To the Church of Christ, in Northampton, under my ministerial care

My dear Friends,

As I reckon the providence which fixed me with you, in the pastoral relation, amongst the most singular blessings of my life, I would always retain a sense of those engagements which it brings me under, to labour to the utmost for your spiritual improvement. And though the divine goodness, I find it a delightful work; as your candid and serious temper adds a freedom and pleasure, both to my public ministrations and private converses with you.

I take this opportunity of renewing the assurances I have often given you, that I could gladly converse with you more frequently at home; did not the other work, in which I am engaged as a tutor, demand so large a share of my time. I heartily thank you, that you so kindly consider it, and make all the allowances for it I could reasonably desire.

I trust, God is my witness, that it is a sincere concern for his glory, and the interest of a Redeemer in the rising age, that has determined me to undertake the additional labour of such an employment: and as you voluntarily chose to sacrifice something of your private satisfaction to these great and important views, I hope you will have the pleasure to see them answered, and that you yourselves will not, on the whole, be losers by them. You know, it is my desire, that as my pupils advance in the course of their preparatory studies, they would endeavour by their religious visits, conversation, and prayer, to supply in part, that lack of service to you, which my care for them must necessarily occasion: and it is as a further supply of it, that I now offer you these Sermons on the Religious Education of Children, which you heard from the pulpit some months ago.

The indulgence and thankfulness with which you then received them, is one instance, amongst many others, of your relish for plain and practical preaching. When some of you expressed your desire that they might be made more public, I confess I knew not well how to deny you; and I was the more willing to comply with your request, because it is a subject which cannot be often handled, so largely, in the course of preaching.

That tender concern for you and yours, which led me to treat of Education, engaged me also to manage it in such a manner, as I apprehended might be most for your advantage and for theirs: that is, to make it, as far as I could, a warm and serious address to you. I have likewise, for the same reason, retained that form in transcribing them for the press; though I am sensible it might have appeared more fashionable and polite, to have cast them into a different mould, and to have proposed my remarks in a more cool and general way.

It is indeed my deliberate judgment, that there is an important difference between popular discourses and philosophical essays. The more I converse with the most celebrated speakers of antiquity, the more I am confirmed in that thought: and I will take the liberty to add, that, for the sake of common Christians, I could wish it were more generally considered. But whether in this respect I am in the right or the wrong, I must say with the apostle to the Corinthians, Brethren, it is for your sakes.

I would not willingly disgust persons of elevated genius and refined education; but I must confess, the great labour of my life is to bring down my discourses to common apprehensions, and to impress the consciences of men by them in subserviency to the momentous design of their eternal salvation. And as I am your shepherd, and you in a peculiar manner the people of my care, whom God has committed to my hand, and of whom he will require an account from me, I would always cherish a peculiar concern for you; and desire that, whenever I appear amongst you, my heart may overflow with a kind of paternal tenderness for you. There are, perhaps, some traces of this in these Discourses, which a severe critic may censure, and a profane wit may deride; nevertheless I have a cheerful hope, that they will be accepted by God and approved by you. If divine grace render them useful to others, I would own it as an additional favour; and that they might be so, I have diligently avoided whatever might offend any serious reader; yet they are yours by a peculiar claim. For you I composed them, for you I published them; and to you I now present them; humbly commending them and you to the blessing of God, and entreating your continued prayers that it may attend all the labours of

Your very affectionate brother, and obliged servant, in our common Lord, Newington, July 14, 1732. P. DODDRIDGE.

THE RECOMMENDATORY PREFACE.

The subject of the following discourses is of high importance to the interest of religion, and justly claims a share in our labours, if we would fulfil the ministry we have received in the Lord, and give a good account of it another day. This led the author to insist upon it, in the congregation under his care. What was delivered from the pulpit met with a favourable reception, and many who heard these Sermons, have importunately desired they might be published, for the benefit of others. I have perused them with some attention, and such special satisfaction, that I heartily concur in the same request.

The neglect of the rising generation, which so generally prevails, ought, surely, to awaken our serious concern for it: and I persuade myself, that the present attempt will be welcome to all who are duly impressed with that concern; for so far as I am capable of judging, it is well adapted to answer its intended purposes. The method is natural and easy, the language correct, the reasoning strong, the address pathetic and convincing, and the whole is so agreeably adjusted, that I can with pleasure recommend it as a valuable and useful performance.

The peculiarities of the Christian scheme are frequently and pertinently interspersed through the several parts of this work; which will be acceptable to them, who have tasted that the Lord is gracious. I look upon these as the brightest ornaments of practical discourses; and when they are introduced to this view, it must evidently appear, that the principles of our holy religion are not merely refined speculations for the entertainment of curious and inquisitive minds, but doctrines according to godliness, and the great support of virtue and goodness in the world. When arguments are drawn from the glorious dispensation of the grace of God, to persuade us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly; such endearing motives represent duty in its most amiable light, and have a most direct tendency to engage our cheerful compliance. It deserves our serious consideration, whether this be not a proper method to prevent the growth of infidelity; if not to reclaim those, whose arguments against the sacred Scriptures are mere banter and ridicule, and who are gone so far as to glory in their contempt of the gospel; yet, at least, to prevent the spreading of that dangerous infection.

It has been justly observed by an excellent person,* whose practical writings meet with that general acceptance which they so justly deserve, "That when men have heard the sermons of their ministers, for many years together, and find little of Christ in them, they have taken it into their heads, that they may go safe to heaven without Christianity." And this I apprehend will ever be the consequence, if we so lay the whole stress of our moral obligations on the reason and fitness of things, as to neglect that Saviour who gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. When Christian preachers seldom mention redemption and salvation by the Son of God, unless it be to expose an absurd sense, which some have put upon those doctrines: and thereby more artfully slur them, than by a direct and open attack; they cannot expect their hearers should have any great regard for them. Their people will be insensibly led into this conclusion, that they have little concernment with any thing in the New Testament but the morality of it, and that the other parts of the gospel may be neglected without hazard to their souls. And when they have advanced thus far, the next step will be, to set the inspired writings on a level with heathen authors, whose moral sentiments are admired, though there are many poetical fictions and fabulous stories intermixed with them.

The apostles took a different method, and constantly supported their instructions by considerations peculiar to the gospel of Christ. And if our schemes in religion will not permit us to follow their example, and we feel a secret unwillingness to form ourselves on their model, lest our discourses should not be polite and rational, we have reason to fear we are declining from that faith which they once delivered to the saints. But if we copy after these wise master-builders, we may hope the hand of the Lord will be with us, and that we shall see something of that Divine success attending our labours, which so remarkably accompanied theirs, when many believed and turned unto the Lord. And they, who have experienced the powerful influences of the gospel, in forming their hearts and lives for God, will be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight and craftiness of men, nor easily prevailed upon to part with it. And I am confirmed in this opinion, by observing that deism makes little progress in those auditories, where the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity are frequently and judiciously considered.

For this reason, I would humbly propose the following composures to the imitation of younger ministers. And I cannot but indulge a reasonable expectation, that those who are forming for the service of the sanctuary under the instructions of the learned and worthy author, having so good a pattern daily before them, will appear in our assemblies with a fixed resolution to exalt a Redeemer in all their ministrations; that they will stand as pillars in the temple of our God, and be the ornaments and supports of the Christian cause, when their fathers shall sleep in the dust.

As the subject of these Sermons is not matter of controversy, but plain and important duty, one would hope they will not fall under the severe censure of any. At least, I am fully persuaded, that humble and serious Christians, whose chief concern is to know and do their duty, will find agreeable entertainment, and much profitable instruction, in the perusal of them.

ADVERTISEMENT.

I HOPE the reader will pardon me, that I trouble him with the mention of two things, which, for some obvious reasons, I thought it not proper to omit.

The one is, that as my very worthy and condescending friend, Dr. Watts, had promised the world an essay on education, I would not have published these papers, without his full approbation of the design, as no way injurious to his; and I have omitted some particulars I might have mentioned, that I might interfere with him as little as possible.

The other is, that when I came to look over Dr. Tillotson's sermons, and some other treatises on this subject, I found many of the thoughts I had before inserted in my plan. They seemed so obvious to every considerate person, that I did not think myself obliged to mention them as quotations. What I have expressly taken from others, I have cited as theirs in the margin; and if I have been obliged to any for other thoughts or expressions, which is very possible, though I do not particularly remember it, I hope this general acknowledgment may suffice.

SERMON I.

PROVERBS xxii. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.

IT is a most amiable and instructive part of the character which Isaiah draws of the great Shepherd of the church, that he should gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom; a representation abundantly answered by the tender care which our Redeemer expressed for the weakest of his disciples, and beautifully illustrated by the endearing condescension with which he embraced and blessed little infants. Nor is it foreign to the present purpose to observe, that when he recommends to Peter the care of his flock, as the most important and acceptable evidence of his sincere affection to his person, he varies the phrase; in one place saying, Feed my sheep, and in the other, Feed my lambs. Perhaps it might be in part intended to intimate, that the care of a gospel minister, who would in the most agreeable manner approve his love to his master, should extend itself to the rising generation, as well as to those of a maturer age, and more considerable standing in the church. It is in obedience to his authority, and from a regard to his interest, that I am now entering on the work of catechising; which I shall introduce with some practical discourses on the education of children, the subject which is now before us.

I persuade myself that you, my friends, will not be displeased to hear that I intend to handle it at large, and to make it the employment of more than a single sabbath. A little reflection may convince you, that I could hardly offer any thing to your consideration of greater importance; and that, humanly speaking, there is nothing in which the comfort of families, the prosperity of nations, the salvation of souls, the interest of a Redeemer, and the glory of God, is more apparently and intimately concerned.

I very readily allow that no human endeavours, either of ministers or parents, can ever be effectual to bring one soul to the saving knowledge of God in Christ, without the cooperating and transforming influences of the blessed Spirit. Yet you well know, and I hope you seriously consider, that this does not in the least weaken our obligation to the most diligent use of proper means. The great God hath stated rules of operation in the world of grace as well as of nature; and though he is not limited to them, it is arrogant, and may be destructive, to expect that he should deviate from them in favour of us or ours.

We live not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God; and were he determined to continue your lives, or the lives of your children, he could no doubt feed or support you by miracle: yet you think yourselves obliged to a prudent care for your daily bread, and justly conclude, that were you to neglect to administer it to your infant offspring, you would be chargeable with their murder before God and man; nor could you think of pleading it as any excuse, that you referred them to a miraculous divine care, whilst you left them destitute of any human supplies. Such a plea would only add impiety to cruelty, and greatly aggravate the crime it attempted to palliate. As absurd would it be for us to flatter ourselves with a hope that our children should be taught of God, and regenerated and sanctified by the influences of his grace, if we neglect that prudent and religious care in their education which it is my business this day to describe and recommend, and which Solomon urges in the words of my text: Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

I need not offer you many critical remarks on so plain and intelligible a passage; you will easily observe, that it consists of an important advice, addressed to the parents and governors of children—Train up a child in the way he should go; and also of a weighty reason by which it is enforced—and when he is old he will not depart from it.

The general sense is undoubtedly retained in our translation, as it commonly is, but here, as in many other places, something of the original energy and beauty is lost.

The Hebrew word,* which we render, train up, does sometimes signify, in the general, to initiate into some science or discipline; and, very frequently, to apply any new thing to the use for which it was intended.† It is especially used of sacred things, which were solemnly dedicated, or set apart, to the service of God.‡ And perhaps it may here be intended to intimate, that a due care is to be taken in the education of children, from a principle of religion, as well as of prudence and humanity; and that our instructions should lead them to the knowledge of God, and be adapted to form them for his service, as well as to engage them to personal and social virtue.

It is added, that a child should be trained up in the way in which he should go; § which seems to be more exactly rendered by others, at the entrance, or from the beginning of his way, to express the early care which ought to be taken to prevent the prevalency of irregular habits, by endeavouring, from the first dawning of reason, to direct it aright, and to infuse into the tender unpractised mind the important maxims of wisdom and goodness.

To encourage us to this care, the wise man assures us, that we may reasonably expect the most happy consequence from it: that if the young traveller be thus directed to set out well in the journey of life, there is a fair prospect that he will go on to its most distant stages, with increasing honour and happiness. Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

I shall endeavour to illustrate and enforce this important advice in the following method, which appears to me the most natural, and for that reason the most eligible.

I. I shall more particularly mark out the way in which children are to be trained up.

II. Offer some plain and serious considerations, to awaken you to this pious and necessary care.

III. Direct to the manner in which the attempt is to be made, and the precautions which are to be used in order to render it effectual. And then,

IV. I will conclude the whole with a more particular application, suited to your different characters, relations, and circumstances of life.

I am very sensible, that it is a very delicate as well as important subject, which is now before me; I have therefore thought myself obliged more attentively to weigh what has occurred to my own meditations, more diligently to consult the sentiments of others, and above all, more earnestly to seek those Divine influences, without which, I know, I am unequal to the easiest task; but in dependence on which, I cheerfully attempt one of the most difficult. The result of the whole I humbly offer to your candid examination; not pretending at any time to dictate in an authoritative manner, and least of all on such an occasion as this; but rather speaking as to wise men, who are themselves to judge what I say. May the divine assistance and blessing attend us in all.

First, I am to describe the way in which children are to be trained up.

Our translation, as I have told you, though not very literal, is agreeable to the sense of the original, The way in which the child should go. And undoubtedly this is no other than the good old way, the way of serious, practical religion: the way which God has in his word marked out for us; the way which all the children of God have trodden in every succeeding age; the way, the only way, in which we and ours can find rest to our souls.

But it is not proper to leave the matter thus generally explained. I would therefore more particularly observe,—that it is the way of piety towards God,—and of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ:—the way of obedience to parents,—and of benevolence to all;—the way of diligence,—and of integrity;—the way of humility,—and of self-denial. I am persuaded, that each of these particulars will deserve your serious attention and regard.

1. Children should undoubtedly be trained up in the way of piety and devotion towards God.

This, as you well know, is the sum and the foundation of every thing truly good. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. The Psalmist

* חנך imbuere, primis rudimentis dare, eandem docere. Pagn. initiare. Cocc. The LXX render it with an exactness which our language will not admit, by διδασκειν. It is used of the early attendance of Abraham who is the first who is said to have used arms in any war, as this instructed, so skilful, from Gen. xiv. 14. a circumstance formed to military discipline, though religious instruction is not to be excluded. Gen. xxiv. 2. מנחה a word derived from the same root in the old sacrificial worship, a meat-offering, and therefore the margin of our text reads, meat-offering, &c.

† Thus it is applied to any new house. Deut. xx. 5. to that of David. Psal. xxx. 1. and to the work of Jerusalem. Neh. xii. 27.

‡ Thus it is applied to the dedicated vessels. Num. vii. 10. 11. 84. 88. 2 Chron. vii. 9. and to that of the temple. 1 Kings viii. 63. 2 Chron. vii. 5.

§ על פי דרכו which the French versions render, à proportion de son train, yet I am sensible, when read with the accompanying verse, as Gen. xlvi. 7. Numb. xxxv. 20. one of the ancient Versions, and some translators, think, that the text implies no more than לפי חנכו, &c. pag. 482.

therefore invites children to him, with the promise of instructing them in it; Come, ye children, hearken unto me, and I will teach you the fear of the Lord. And it is certain, some right notions of the Supreme Being must be implanted in the minds of children, before there can be a reasonable foundation for teaching them those doctrines which peculiarly relate to Christ under the character of the Mediator; for he that comes unto God (by him) must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

The proof of the being of God, and some of those attributes of the divine nature in which we are most concerned, depends on such easy principles, that I cannot but think, the weakest mind might enter into it. A child will easily apprehend, that as every house is builded by some man, and there can be no work without an author, so he that built all things is God. And from this obvious idea of God, as the Maker of all, we may naturally represent him as very great and very good, that they may be taught at once to reverence and love him.

It is of great importance, that children early imbibe an awe of God, and a humble veneration for his perfections and glories. He ought therefore to be represented to them as the great Lord of all; and when we take occasion to mention to them other invisible agents, whether angels or devils, we should, as Dr. Watts has most judiciously observed,* always represent them as entirely under the government and control of God; that no sentiments of admiration of good spirits, or terror of the bad, may distract their tender minds, or infringe on those regards which are the incommunicable prerogative of the Great Supreme.

There should be a peculiar caution, that when we teach these infant tongues to pronounce that great and terrible name, The Lord our God, they may not learn to take it in vain; but may use it with a becoming solemnity, as remembering that we and they are but dust and ashes before him. When I hear the little creatures speaking of "the great God, the blessed God, the glorious God," as I sometimes do, it gives me a sensible pleasure, and I consider it as a probable proof of great wisdom and piety, in those who have the charge of their education.

Yet great care should be taken not to confine our discourses to these awful views, lest the dread of God should so fall upon them, as that his excellences should make them afraid to approach him. We should describe him, as not only the greatest but the best of beings. We should teach them to know him by the most encouraging name of The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, and forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin. We should represent him as the universal, kind, indulgent parent, who loves his creatures, and by all proper methods provides for their happiness. And we should particularly represent his goodness to them; with what more than paternal tenderness he watched round their cradles; with what compassion he heard their feeble cries, before their infant thoughts could form themselves into prayer: we should tell them, that they live every moment on God; and that all our affection for them, is no more than he puts into our hearts; and all our power to help them, no more than he lodges in our hands.

We should also solemnly remind them, that in a very little while their spirits are to return to this God; that as he is now always with them, and knows every thing they do, or speak, or think, so he will bring every work into judgment, and make them for ever happy or miserable, as they on the whole are found obedient or rebellious. And here the most lively and pathetic descriptions, which the Scriptures give us, of heaven and of hell, should be laid before them, and urged on their consideration.

When such a foundation is laid, in the belief of the being and providence of God, and of a future state both of rewards and punishments, children should be instructed in the duty they owe to God, and should be particularly taught to pray to him and to praise him. It would be best of all, if from a deep sense of his perfections, and their own necessities, they could be engaged to breathe out their souls before him in words of their own, were they ever so weak and broken. Yet you will readily allow, that till this can be expected, it may be very proper to teach them some forms of prayer and thanksgiving, consisting of such plain scriptures, or other familiar expressions, as may best suit their circumstances and understandings. If the Lord's Prayer be taught them, as a form, I hope you will consider, how comprehensive the expressions are; how fast the ideas rise and vary; and consequently how necessary it is, that it be frequently and largely explained to them; lest the repetition of it degenerate into a mere ceremony, as I fear it does amongst many, who are perhaps most zealous for its use.

But what I have said, on this head, of piety and devotion, must be considered in an inseparable connexion with what I am to add under the next.

2. Children must be trained up in the way of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

You know, my friends, and I hope many of you know it to the daily joy of your souls, that Christ is the way, the truth, and the life; and that it is by him we have boldness and access with confidence to a God, who might otherwise appear as a consuming fire. It is therefore of great importance to lead children betimes into the knowledge of Christ, which is, no doubt, a considerable part of that nurture and admonition of the Lord, which the apostle recommends, and was perhaps what he principally intended by those words.

We should therefore teach them betimes, that the first parents of the human race most ungratefully rebelled against God, and subjected themselves and all their offspring to his wrath and curse. The awful consequences of this should be opened at large, and we should labour to convince them, that they have made themselves liable to the divine displeasure (that dreadful thing!) by their own personal guilt; and thus by the knowledge of the law should we make way for the gospel, the joyful news of deliverance by Christ.

In unfolding this, great care ought to be taken that we do not fill their minds with an aversion to one sacred person, while we endeavour to attract their regards to another. The Father is not to be represented as severe, and almost inexorable; hardly prevailed upon by the intercession of his compassionate Son to entertain thoughts of mercy and forgiveness. Far from that, we should speak of him as the overflowing fountain of goodness, whose eye pitied us in our helpless distress, whose almighty arm was stretched out for our rescue, whose eternal counsels of wisdom and love formed that important scheme to which we owe all our hopes. I have often had occasion to show you at large, that this is the Scripture doctrine; our children should be early taught it, and taught what that scheme was, so far as their understandings can receive it, and ours can explain it. We should often repeat it to them, that God is so holy, and yet so gracious, that rather than he would on the one hand destroy man, or on the other, leave sin unpunished, he made his own Son a sacrifice for it, appointing him to be humbled, that we might be exalted, to die, that we might live.

We should also represent to them, (with holy wonder and joy,) how readily the Lord Jesus Christ consented to procure our deliverance in so expensive a way. How cheerfully he said, Lo, I come; I delight to do thy will, O my God! To enhance the value of this amazing love, we should endeavour, according to our weak capacities, to teach them who this compassionate Redeemer is; to represent something of his glories as the eternal Son of God, and the great Lord of angels and men. We should instruct them in his amazing condescension in laying aside these glories, that he might become a little weak helpless child, and afterwards an afflicted sorrowful man. We should lead them into the knowledge of those circumstances of the history of Jesus, which may have the greatest tendency to strike their minds, and to impress them with an early sense of gratitude and love to him. We should tell them, how poor he made himself, that he might enrich us; how diligently he went about doing good; how willingly he preached the gospel to the lowest of the people. And we should especially tell them how kind he was to little children, and how he chid his disciples when they would have hindered them from being brought to him: it is expressly said, Jesus was much displeased, and said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God. A tender circumstance! which perhaps was recorded (in part at least) for this very reason, that children in succeeding ages might be impressed and affected with it.

Through these scenes of his life we should lead them on to his death: we should show how easily he could have delivered himself, (of which he gave so sensible an evidence in striking down by one word those who came to apprehend him,) and yet how patiently he submitted to the most cruel injuries, to be scourged and spit upon, to be crowned with thorns, and to bear his cross. We should show them how this innocent, holy, and divine person was brought as a lamb to the slaughter; and while they were piercing him with nails, instead of loading them with curses he prayed for them, saying, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. And when their little hearts are awed and melted with so strange a story, we should tell them, it was thus he groaned, and bled, and died for us, and often remind them of their own concern in what was then transacted.

We should lead on their thoughts to the glorious views of Christ's resurrection and ascension; and tell them with what adorable goodness he still remembers his people in the midst of his exaltation; pleading the cause of sinful creatures, and employing his interest in the court of heaven, to procure life and glory for all that believe in him and love him.

We should then go on to instruct them in those particulars of obedience, by which the sincerity of our faith and our love is to be approved; at the same time reminding them of their own weakness, and telling them how God helps us, by sending his Holy Spirit to dwell in our hearts, to furnish us for every good word and work. An important lesson, without attending to which, our instruction will be vain, and their hearing will likewise be vain!

3. Children should be trained up in the way of obedience to their parents.

This is a command which God recommended from Mount Sinai, by annexing to it a peculiar promise of long life; a blessing which young persons greatly desire. The apostle therefore observes, that it is the first commandment with promise; i. e. a command eminently remarkable for the manner in which the promise is adjoined. And it is certainly a wise constitution of Providence, that gives so much to parental authority, especially while children are in their younger years, their minds being then incapable of judging and acting for themselves in matters of importance. Children should therefore be early taught and convinced by Scripture, that God has committed them into the hands of their parents; and consequently, that reverence and obedience to their parents, is a part of the duty they owe to God, and disobedience to them, is rebellion against him. And parents should by no means indulge their children in a direct and resolute opposition to their will in matters of greater or smaller moment; remembering, that a child left to himself brings his parents to shame, and himself to ruin; and with regard to subjection, as well as affection, it is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth.

4. Children should be trained up in the way of benevolence and kindness to all.

The great apostle tells us, that love is the fulfilling of the law, and that all those branches of it, which relate to our neighbour, are comprehended in that one word, love. This love, therefore, we should endeavour to teach them; and we shall find, that in many instances it will be a law to itself, and guide them right in many particular actions, the obligations to which may depend on principles of equity, which lie far beyond the reach of their feeble understandings. There is hardly an instruction relating to our duty more happily adapted to the capacity of children, than that golden law, (so important to all of the maturest age,) Whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye so unto them. This rule we should teach them, and by this should examine their actions. From their cradles we should often inculcate it upon them, that a great deal of religion consists in doing good; that the wisdom from above is full of mercy and good fruits; and that every Christian should do good unto all as he has opportunity.

That such instructions may be welcome to them, we should endeavour, by all prudent methods, to soften their hearts to sentiments of humanity and tenderness, and guard against every thing that would have a contrary tendency. We should remove from them, as much as possible, all kinds of cruel and bloody spectacles, and should carefully discourage any thing barbarous in their treatment of brute creatures; by no means allowing them to sport themselves in the death or pain of domestic animals, but rather teaching them to treat the poor creatures kindly, and take care of them; the contrary to which is a most detestable sign of a savage and malignant disposition. The merciful man regardeth the life of his beast.

We should likewise take care to teach them the odiousness and folly of a selfish temper, and encourage them in a willingness to impart to others, what is agreeable and entertaining to themselves: Especially we should endeavour to form them to sentiments of compassion for the poor. We should show them where God has said, Blessed is the man that considereth the poor, the Lord will remember him in the day of trouble. He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth to the Lord, and that which he hath given, will he pay him again. And we should show them, by our own practice, that we verily believe these promises to be true, and important. It might not be improper sometimes to make our children the messengers, by which we send some small supply to the indigent and distressed; and if they discover a disposition to give something out of the little stock we allow them to call their own, we should joyfully encourage it, and should take care that they never lose by their charity, but that in a prudent manner we abundantly repay it. It is hardly to be imagined, that children thus brought up, should, in the advance of life, prove injurious and oppressive; they will rather be the ornaments of religion, and blessings to the world, and probably will be in the number of the last whom Providence will suffer to want.

5. Children should be trained up in the way of diligence.

This should undoubtedly be our care, if we have any regard to the welfare, either of their bodies or their souls. In whatever station of life they may at length be fixed, it is certain there is little prospect of their acquitting themselves with usefulness, honour, and advantage, without a close and resolute application; whereas the wisest of princes and of men has said, Seest thou a man diligent in his business; he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men. And it is evident, that a diligent prosecution of business keeps one out of the way of a thousand temptations which idleness seem to invite, leading a man into numberless instances of vice and folly, because he has nothing else to do.*

A prudent and religious parent will therefore be concerned that his children may not early contract so pernicious a habit, nor enter upon life like persons that have no business in it, but to crowd the stage, and stand in the way of those who are better employed. Instead of suffering them to saunter about from place to place, (as abundance of young people do, to no imaginable purpose of usefulness, or even of entertainment,) he will quickly assign them some employment for their time: an employment so moderated, and so diversified, as not to overwhelm and fatigue their tender spirits;† yet sufficient to keep them wakeful and active. Nor is this so difficult as some may imagine; for children are a busy kind of creatures, naturally fond of learning new things, and trying and showing what they can do. So that, I am persuaded, were perfect inactivity to be imposed upon them as a penance, but for one hour, they would be heartily weary of it, and would be glad to seek their refuge from it, in almost any business you would think fit to employ them about.

Thus should they be disciplined in their infant years, should early be taught the value of time, and early accustomed to improve it, till they grow fit for some calling in life; in which they should at length be placed with this important maxim deeply engraven upon their minds, "That full employ, in whatever service they are fixed, is a thing by no means to be dreaded, but, on the contrary, greatly to be desired."

I shall conclude this head with the mention of a very remarkable law amongst the Athenians, which ordained, "That those who had been brought up to no employ by their parents, should not be obliged to keep them, if they came to want in their old age; which all other (legitimate) children were."*

6. Children should be trained up in the way of integrity.

Simplicity and godly sincerity is not only a very amiable, but an essential, part of the Christian character; and we are every one of us indispensably obliged to approve ourselves Israelites indeed, in whom there is no allowed guile. And this is a circumstance that will peculiarly require our regard, in the education of our children, and of all young persons under our care.

It is very melancholy to observe, how soon the artifices and deceits of corrupt nature begin to discover themselves. In this respect we are transgressors from the womb, and go astray almost as soon as we are born, speaking lies. Great care therefore should be taken to form the minds of children to a love for truth and candour, and a sense of the meanness as well as the guilt of a lie. We should be cautious, that we do not expose them to any temptations of this kind, either by unreasonable severities, on account of little faults, or by hasty surprises, when inquiring into any matter of fact, which it may seem their interest to disguise by a falsehood: and when we find them guilty of a known and deliberate lie, we should express our horror of it, not only by a present reproof or correction, but by such a conduct towards them for some time afterwards, as may plainly show them how greatly we are amazed, grieved, and displeased. When so solemn a business is made of the first faults of this kind, it may be a means of preventing many more.

I will further add, that we ought not only thus severely to animadvert upon a direct lie, but likewise, in a proper degree, to discourage all kinds of equivocations and double meanings, and those little tricks and artifices, by which they may endeavour to impose on each other, or on those that are older than themselves. We should often inculcate upon them that excellent scripture, He that walketh uprightly, walketh surely, but he that perverteth his way, (that twists and distorts it with the perplexities of artifices and deceit,) shall at length be known.† Be showing them every day how easy, how pleasant, how honourable, and how advantageous, it is to maintain a fair, open, and honest temper; and on the other hand, what folly there is in cunning and dishonesty in all its forms; and how certain it is, that by studying and practising it, they take the readiest way to make themselves noxious and useless, infamous and odious. Above all, should we remind them, that the righteous Lord loveth righteousness, and his favourable countenance beholds the upright; but lying lips are such an abomination to him, that he expressly declares, All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone.

7. Children should be trained up in the way of humility.

This is a grace, which our Lord particularly invites us to learn of him, and most frequently recommends to us; well knowing, that without it, so humbling a scheme as he came to introduce, would never meet with a welcome reception. And with regard to the present life, it is a most lovely ornament, which engages universal esteem and affection; so that before honour is humility. On the whole we find, he that exalteth himself is abased, and he that humbleth himself is exalted, both by God and man.

A regard therefore to the case, honour, and happiness of our children, should engage us to an early endeavour of checking that pride, which was the first sin, and the ruin of our natures; and diffuses itself so wide, and sinks so deep into all that draw their original from degenerate Adam. We should teach them to express humility and modesty in their converse with all.

They should be taught to treat their superiors with peculiar respect, and should at proper seasons be accustomed to silence and reserve before them. Hence they will learn in some degree the government of the tongue; a branch of wisdom, which, in the advance of life, will be of great importance to the quiet of others, and to their own comfort and reputation.

Nor should they be allowed to assume airs of insolence towards their equals, but rather be taught to yield, to oblige, and to give up their right for the sake of peace. To this purpose I cannot but think it desirable, that they should be generally accustomed to treat each other with those forms of civility and complaisance, which are usual among well-bred people in their rank of life. I know these things are mere trifles in themselves, yet they are the out-guards of humanity and friendship, and effectually prevent many a rude attack, which, taking its rise from some little circumstance, may nevertheless be attended with fatal consequences. I thought it proper to mention this here, because (as Scougal very justly and elegantly expresses it)* "These modes are the shadows of humility, and seem intended to show our regard for others, and the low thoughts we have of ourselves."

* Potter's Greek Antiq. vol. i. p. 142.

† Prov. x. 9. כְּתָם ... כְּתָם [illegible] Pagn.

I shall only add further, that it is great imprudence and unkindness to children, to indulge them in a haughty and imperious behaviour towards those who are most their inferiors. They should be made to understand that the servants of the family are not their servants, nor to be under their government and control. I the rather insist upon this, because I have generally observed, that where young people have been permitted to tyrannize over persons in the lowest circumstances of life, the humour has shamefully grown upon them, till it has diffused insolence and arrogance through their behaviour to all about them.

Lastly, Children should be trained up in the way of self-denial.

As without something of this temper we can never follow Christ, or expect to be owned by him as his disciples; so neither indeed can we pass comfortably through the world. For, whatever unexperienced youth may dream, a great many distasteful and mortifying circumstances will occur in life, which will unhinge our minds almost every hour, if we cannot manage, and in many instances deny, our appetites, our passions, and our humours. We should therefore endeavour to teach our children this important lesson betimes; and if we succeed in our care, we shall leave them abundantly richer and happier, in this rule and possession of their own spirits, than the most plentiful estates, or the most unlimited power over others, could make them.

When a rational creature becomes the slave of appetite, he sinks beneath the dignity of the human nature, as well as the sanctity of the Christian profession. It is therefore observable, that when the apostle mentions the three grand branches of practical religion, he puts sobriety in the front; perhaps to intimate, that where that is neglected, the other cannot be suitably regarded. "The grace of God (i. e. the gospel) teaches us, to live soberly, righteously, and godly." Children therefore, as well as young men, should be exhorted to be sober-minded; and they should be taught it, by early self-denial. It is certain, that if their own appetite and taste were to determine the kind and quantity of their food, many of them would quickly destroy their constitution, and perhaps their lives; since they have often the greatest desire for those things which are the most improper. And it seems justly observed by a very wise man, (who was himself a melancholy instance of it,) "That the fondness of mothers for their children, in letting them eat and drink what they will, lays a foundation for most of those calamities in human life, which proceed from bodily indisposition."† Nay, I will add, that it is the part of wisdom and love, not only to deny what would be unwholesome, but to guard against indulging them in too great a nicety, either of food or dress. People of sense cannot but see, if they would please to consider it, that to know how to fare plainly, and sometimes a little hardly, carries a man with ease and pleasure through many circumstances of life, which to luxury and delicacy would be almost intolerable.

The government of the passions is another branch of self-denial to which children should early be habituated; and so much the rather, because, in an age when reason is so weak, the passions are apt to appear with peculiar force and violence. A prudent care should therefore be taken to repress the exorbitances of them. For which purpose it is of great importance, that they never be suffered to carry any point by obstinacy, noise, and clamour, which is indeed to bestow a reward on a fault that deserves a severe reprimand. Nay, I will venture to add, that though it be very inhuman to take pleasure in making them uneasy by needless mortifications, yet when they are eagerly and intemperately desirous of a trifle, they ought, for that very reason, sometimes to be denied it, to teach them more moderation for the future. And if by such methods they gradually learn to conquer their little humours and fancies, they learn no inconsiderable branch of true fortitude and wisdom. I cannot express this better, than in the words of Mr. Locke,‡ in his excellent treatise on the subject before us: "He that has found out the way to keep a child's spirit easy, active, and free, and yet at the same time to restrain him from many things which he has a mind to, and draw him to things uneasy to him, has got the true secret of education."

I have sometimes been surprised to see, how far a sense of honour and praise has carried some children of a generous temper, in a long and resolute course of self-denial. But undoubtedly the noblest principle of all is a sense of religion. Happy would it indeed be, if they were led to see, that there is but very little in this kind of gratifications and indulgences; that the world itself is but a poor empty trifle; and that the great thing a rational creature should be concerned about, is to please

God, and get well to heaven. May divine grace teach us this important lesson for ourselves, that we may transmit it with the greater advantage to our children! Amen.

SERMON II.

Proverbs xxii. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

It is certainly a very pleasing reflection to every faithful minister of the gospel, that the cause in which he is engaged, is the most benevolent, as well as the most religious; subserving the glory of God by promoting the happiness of mankind. It must be a great satisfaction to a man of integrity and humanity, to think that it is not his business to dazzle and confound his hearers with the artifices of speech, to give the appearances of truth to falsehood, and importance to trifles; but to teach them to weigh things in an impartial balance, and by the words of truth and soberness, to lead them into the paths of wisdom and of goodness.

This is a satisfaction which I peculiarly find this day, while I am urging you to that religious care in the education of children, which I have at large opened in the former discourse. And it is a circumstance of additional pleasure, that I am pleading the cause of the weak and the helpless; of little tender creatures, who are incapable of pleading for themselves, and know not how much their interest is concerned. Nor am I without a secret hope, that if the Divine Spirit favour us with his assistance, some who are yet unborn may have eternal reason to rejoice in the fruits of what you are now to hear. Amen.

Having already endeavoured to describe the way in which children are to be trained up; I now proceed, Secondly, to propose some arguments to engage parents to this pious care.

And here I would entreat you distinctly to consider, that the attempt itself is pleasant;—you have great reason to hope it may be successful,—and that success is of the highest importance.

I. The attempt itself is pleasant.

I speak not merely of the pleasure arising from the consciousness of discharging present duty, and a probable view of future success; such a satisfaction may attend those actions, which are in themselves most painful and mortifying. But I refer to the entertainment immediately flowing from the employment itself, when rightly managed. This is undoubtedly one of those ways of wisdom, which are ways of pleasantness, as well as a path, which in its consequences is peace and happiness: it is a commandment, in keeping of which there is great reward.

The God of nature has wisely annexed a secret unutterable delight, to all our regular cares for the improvement of our rising offspring. We rejoice to see our tender plants flourish, to observe how the stock strengthens, and the blossoms and the leaves successively unfold. We trace with a gradually advancing pleasure, their easy smiles, the first efforts of speech on their stammering tongues, and the dawnings of reason in their feeble minds. It is a delightful office to cultivate and assist opening nature,* to lead the young strangers into a new world, and to infuse the principles of any useful kind of knowledge which their age may admit, and their circumstances require. But when we attempt to raise their thoughts to the great Father of spirits, to present them, as in the arms of faith, to Jesus the compassionate Shepherd, and teach them to inquire after him; when we endeavour to instruct them in the principles of divine truth, and form them to sentiments of prudence, integrity, and generosity; we find a pleasure superior to what any other labour for their improvement can give.

On this occasion, my friends, I persuade myself I may appeal to the repeated experience of many amongst you. Do you not find that the sweetest truths of Christianity, which are your hope and your joy in this house of your pilgrimage, are peculiarly sweet when you talk them over with your children? Do you not find that your instructions and admonitions to them return into your own bosom with a rich increase of edification and refreshment? Thus, while you are watering these domestic plantations, you are watering also yourselves; and from these holy converses with your children, you rise to more endearing communion with your heavenly Father: God by his Spirit visiting your souls in the midst of those pious cares, and giving you immediate comfort and strength, as a token of his gracious acceptance, and perhaps as a pledge of future success. This leads me to urge the religious education of children,

II. By the probability there is, that it will be attended with such success as to be the means of making them wise and good.

This is the argument urged by Solomon in the text, Train up a child in the way in which he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it. Being early initiated into the right way, he will pursue it with increasing pleasure; so that

* Delightful task! to rear the tender thought,

——————— and plant
The generous purpose in the glowing breast.
Thoms. Spring.

with regard to the prosperity of the soul, as well as of the body, his path will be like the morning light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

It is true, this assertion is to be understood with some limitation, as expressing the probability, rather than the certainty, of the success; otherwise experience would contradict it in some melancholy instances. Would to God there were none untractable under the most pious and prudent methods of education; none, who like deaf adders stop their ears against the voice of the most skilful charmers, and have been accustomed to do so from their infancy! Would to God there were none of those who appeared to set out well, and seemed eager in inquiring the way to Zion with their faces thitherward, who have forgotten the guides of their youth, and the covenant of their God, and are to this day wandering in the paths of the destroyer, if they are not already fallen in them! But do you throw by every medicine which some have used without being recovered by it; or decline every profession of which there are some who do not thrive? What remedy must you then take? what calling must you then pursue? The application is obvious. It would be folly to pretend to maintain that religious education will certainly obtain its end; but let me entreat you to consider,—that it is in its own nature a very rational method,—that it is the method which God has appointed,—and a method which in many instances has been found successful. Attend seriously to these remarks, and then judge whether prudence and conscience will not oblige you to pursue it.

1. The religious education of children is a very rational method of engaging them to walk in the way in which they should go.

There is this most evident advantage attending our early attempts of this kind, that we shall find the mind more open and disengaged, not tainted with all those corrupt principles, nor enslaved to those irregular habits, which they would probably imbibe and contract in the advance of age. Though the paper on which we would write the knowledge of God be not entirely fair, it is clear of many a foul inscription and deep blot, with which it would soon be covered. Though the garden, in which we would plant the fruits of holiness, be not free from weeds, yet many of them are but (as it were) in the invisible seed, and the rest are not grown up to that luxuriant size, which we must expect, if due cultivation be omitted or delayed.

It is a further advantage which deserves to be mentioned here, that infancy and childhood is the most impressible age; and as principles are then most easily admitted, so they are most firmly retained. The ancients, those judicious observers of human nature, as well as many modern writers, are full of this remark in their discourses on education, and illustrate it by a great many beautiful allusions, which are well known.

The new vessel takes a lasting tincture from the liquor which is first poured in.* The soft clay is easily fashioned into what form you please.† The young plant may be bent with a gentle hand; and the characters, engraved on the tender bark, grow deeper and larger with the advancing tree.‡ It will be our wisdom then to seize these golden opportunities; and so much the rather, as it is certain they will either be improved or perverted; and that, if they are not pressed into the service of religion, they will be employed as dangerous artillery against it.‖

But you will say, "With all these advantageous circumstances we cannot infuse grace into the hearts of our children; and after all our precautions, corrupt nature will prevent us, and fix a wrong bias on the mind, before we can attempt to direct it aright." A mournful, but too evident, truth! which, far from denying or suppressing, I would often declare and inculcate; and the rather now, as it greatly confirms my argument. Are the influences of a degenerate nature unavoidably so strong, and will you suffer them to be confirmed by these additional advantages? Do you apprehend, that running with the footmen, you shall be in danger of fainting? and do you for that very reason choose to contend with the horsemen? You cannot sure, in the face of so much reason and scripture, urge this as an excuse against making any attempts at all of this kind; and how then is it an apology for the neglect of those, which are (other things being equal) the most rational and easy? But the trifling plea is more evidently silenced, by observing,

2. The religious education of children is a method which God has appointed; and this greatly increases the probability of its success.

I assuredly know, (and may God more deeply engrave it on our hearts!) that with regard to your labours, as well as ours, neither is he that planteth any thing, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase. But consider, I beseech you, how that increase is to be hoped for: is it in the omission, or in the use, of prescribed means? I urge it on your consciences, my friends, that religious education is an ordinance of God, which, therefore, you may reasonably hope he will honour with a blessing. And you might as justly expect, that your souls should flourish in an unnecessary absence from the table and house of the Lord, or an habitual neglect of reading and prayer, as that your children should grow up for God, while you fail in your endeavours to engage them in his service. I repeat it again, religious education is an ordinance of God. And is it a work of labour and difficulty to prove the assertion? Which of you does not know, that Christian parents are solemnly charged to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and that even under the Mosaic economy, God urged it on his people in a very affecting manner? Surely you must have observed, how strictly God charges it upon the Jews to take all opportunities to this purpose, occasional, as well as stated. These words, says he, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And elsewhere, Thou shalt teach them to thy sons and thy sons' sons: plainly recommending a care of more remote, as well as immediate descendants, of grand-children as well as children. Thus when God established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, he commanded the fathers, that they should make them known unto their children; that the generation to come might know them, even the children that should be born, that they should arise and declare them unto their children; that so religion might be transmitted to every rising age. You cannot be ignorant of such passages as these, which need no comment to explain them, and consequently you cannot but know, that the religious education of children is a divine institution, as well as in itself a most rational attempt: after which you will not wonder to hear,

3. That it has in fact been attended with very happy success.

We acknowledge, that the great God does not confine himself to work by this way; and that he sometimes displays his sovereignty in visibly turning out of it. We acknowledge, that he sometimes leaves those who had been, as it were, born and brought up in his family, to forsake it in a very scandalous manner; while he seems to go into the very territories of Satan, into ignorant, carnal, and profane families, and takes from thence persons, whom he erects as trophies of free, surprising, and (as Mr. Howe justly expresses it) "unaccountable grace." But you well know, that these are more rare and uncommon cases: and though some of you, my friends, are (and I hope you will never forget it,) happy instances of the singular divine goodness; yet most of you, as I apprehend, were from your childhood trained up in the knowledge of God, and are living monuments of the success which has attended the care of parents or masters in this particular. The greater part of those, who have of late been admitted to your communion, have, to my certain knowledge, mentioned it with thankfulness; and I rejoice to think how many of the rising generation amongst us (if even a child may be known by his doings) are like to increase the number, and give us an encouraging hope that they will at length be set as olive-plants around the Lord's table, as well as yours. I persuade myself it is so elsewhere, and think I may pronounce it with some confidence, that the families of God's children are, generally speaking, the nurseries of his church. Solomon, no doubt, had observed that a good education had generally been successful, or we could by no means account for the remark in the text; and a very accurate writer of our own age and nation has carried it so far as to say, "That of all the men we meet with, nine parts in ten are what they are, good or bad, useful or not, according to their education."*

I hope you are by this time convinced, that, humanly speaking, there is great probability, that religious education may be the effectual means of promoting serious piety in the rising age; which was the second argument by which I was to recommend it: an argument, which may be greatly strengthened by observing,

III. That the success, which we may so reasonably expect, is a matter of very high importance.

It is of evident importance—to the honour of God and the support of religion,—to the present and future happiness of your children,—and to your own comfort both in life and death. Weighty and comprehensive thoughts; which I shall briefly touch,† and to which I beg you will renew your attention.

1. The honour of God, and the interest of a Redeemer, is greatly concerned in the behaviour of your children; and consequently in your care of their education, which is likely to have so great an influence upon it.

We live in a dying world. Our fathers, where are they? Sleeping in the dust, as we must shortly be. We are sure, that in a little, a very little, while, these places must know us no more: and when we are mouldering in the house of silence, who must fill our places in the house of God? Who must rise up in our stead for the support of religion amongst those that succeed us? From whom can it be expected, but from our children? Yet how can we expect it from these, in the neglect of a method which comes recommended by so many

* Locke on Education, § 1.

† I have many things which might be said on these heads, because I have spread them more largely in a Sermon on this very subject, The Importance of the Rising Generation, which is the first of the Sermons to Young People.

advantageous circumstances? "Yes," you will perhaps be ready to say, "God will take care of his own cause, and almighty grace will do what we have not attempted, because we knew that we could not accomplish it." Almighty grace can indeed do it; and almighty power can of these stones, on which we tread, raise up children to Abraham. But show me your warrant from the word of God for expecting it, either in the one case, or in the other. You will possibly answer, "He has promised to be ever with his church, and that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; but that one generation shall arise and declare his mighty works unto another, and that the kingdom of his Son shall continue as long as the sun and the moon endure." Blessed be his name for these encouraging promises, which shall, no doubt, be accomplished. But where has he engaged, that this kingdom shall always continue amongst us? Such passages as these will no more prove, that the gospel shall never be removed from Great Britain, than they would once have proved, that it should never be taken away from Pergamos or Thyatira, or any other of the Asian churches, which have so many ages ago been given up to desolation.

Now let me entreat you, for a few moments, to dwell upon that thought; What if the gospel should be lost from amongst your descendants? What if in the age of these little ones, or the next that shall succeed to theirs, the house of the Lord should be forsaken, and his table abandoned? What if the ministry should be grown into disuse, or the servants of Christ in it should have nothing to do, but to bear a fruitless testimony against an unbelieving generation, till (when their hearts are broken with so sad an office) the gospel here die with them, and religion be buried in their graves? Is it a thought easily to be supported by a true Israelite, that the ark of the Lord should thus be lost, and God should write upon us Ichabod, the sad memorials of a departed glory?

It would surely be peculiarly melancholy, that religion should die in the hands of those who were the children of the kingdom. And were not yours so? In this respect, my friends, permit me to say, that I am witness against some of you. When you have offered your children to baptism, you have delivered them into my hands, with an express declaration of your sincere desire, that they might be devoted to God; and have received them again with a solemn charge and promise to bring them up for him, if their lives should be continued. And as for those of you, who do not practise this institution, I doubt not, but many of you are equally faithful in dedicating your infant offspring to God. Is it not then reasonable to expect from both, that they should be brought up as a seed to serve him? And from whom may we hope it, if not from you? If you have experienced the power of divine grace upon your own souls, and have tasted that the Lord is gracious, methinks it should awaken a holy zeal to spread the sweet savour of his name and word wherever you come. You should labour to the utmost for the advancement of his gospel amongst all your acquaintance, and even amongst strangers; how much more in your own families, amongst those whom you have received from him, amongst those whom you have so solemnly given back to him.

2. The character of your children, and consequently your care in their education, is of the most evident importance to their present and future happiness.

I need not surely employ a great deal of time in proving the truth of the assertion. As Christians, you must undoubtedly own, that godliness is profitable to all things, having the promise of the life which now is, as well as of that which is to come. If your children, through the divine blessing on your holy care, become truly religious, they will not only be preserved from those follies and crimes, which stain the honour and ruin the substance of families, but they will secure a fair reputation; they will take the most probable method to make life truly comfortable; they will be entitled to the paternal care and blessings of God; and, to crown all, will be heirs of eternal glory with him: and what could your most prudent, faithful, tender love wish for them as a greater, or indeed as a comparable, good? On the other hand, if they prove vicious and profane, (which in so dangerous an age it is very probable they may, if they have no religious principle to secure them,) what can you expect but their infamy and misery in this world, and their eternal destruction in the next?

One would imagine, that such considerations as these should very deeply impress the heart of a parent; and if they were alone, should be sufficient to gain the cause. You, who have so tender a regard to all their temporal concerns; you, that rise early and sit up late, that you may advance their fortunes, that you may furnish them with those dubious and uncertain possessions, which may be blessings or curses, as they are improved or abused; can you bear to think, that they may be for ever poor and miserable? Surely it should cut you to the heart to look on a child and reflect, "Here is an heir of eternal misery. Alas! what am I doing for him? Preparing an estate? Contriving for his present convenience or grandeur?" Vain, wretched, preposterous care! which, to use a very plain simile, is but like employing yourselves in trimming and adorning its clothes, while the child itself were fallen into the fire, and would be in danger of being destroyed, if not immediately plucked out. Hasten to do it with an earnestness answerable to the extremity of the case, and so much the rather, as the danger is in part owing to you.

I will not now say, how far your personal mistakes in conduct may have been a snare and a temptation to your children; nor can I pretend to determine it. But I am confident of this, that they have derived from you a corrupt and degenerate nature. Through your veins the original infection, which tainted the first authors of our race, has flowed down to them. And is not this an affecting thought? and ought it not to quicken you to attempt their relief?

Dr. Tillotson sets this in a very moving light: "* When a man has by treason tainted his blood and forfeited his estate, with what grief and regret does he look on his children, and think of the injury he has done to them by his fault; and how solicitous is he before he die to petition the king for favour to his children! How carnestly does he charge his friends to be careful of them, and kind to them!" We are those traitors. Our children have derived from us a tainted blood, a forfeited inheritance. How tenderly should we pity them! How solicitously should we exert ourselves to prevent their ruin! Mr. Flavel expresses the thought still more pathetically. "† Should I bring the plague into my family, and live to see all my poor children lie dying by the walls of my house; if I had not the heart of a tiger, such a sight would melt my very soul." And surely, I may add, were there a sovereign antidote at hand, perhaps an antidote I had myself used, should I not direct them to it, and urge them to try it, I should be still more savage and criminal. The application is easy: the Lord deeply impress it on your souls, that your dear children may not die eternally of the malignant plague they have taken from you!

This is one consideration, which should certainly add a great deal of weight to the argument I am now upon. I will conclude the head with the mention of another: I mean, the peculiar advantages which you, their parents, have for addressing yourselves to them. You, who have known them from their infancy, are best acquainted with their temper, and manner of thinking; you, who are daily with them, may watch their most tender moments, the most favourable opportunities of pleading with them; your melting affection for them, will suggest the most endearing sentiments and words on such occasions: their obligations to you, and love for you, will probably dispose them to attend with the greatest pleasure to what you say, or your authority over them, your power of correction, and a sense of their dependence upon you in life, may prevent much of that opposition and contempt, which from perverse tempers, others might expect, especially if they were not supported by your concurrence, in their attempts to instruct and reform your children.

On the whole then, since your obligations and your encouragements to attempt the work are so peculiar, I may reasonably hope you will allow its due weight to this second consideration, that the character and conduct of your children, and consequently your care in their education, is of the highest importance to their present and future happiness. I add, once more,

3. It is of great moment to your own comfort, both in life and death.

Solomon often repeats the substance of that remark; A wise son maketh a glad father, but a foolish son is a heaviness to his mother. And the justice of it in both its branches is very apparent. Let me engage you seriously to reflect upon it, as a most awakening inducement to the discharge of the important duty I am recommending.

If you have reason to hope, that your labours are not in vain, but that your children are become truly religious; it must greatly increase your satisfaction in them, that they are dear to you, not only in the bands of the flesh, but in those of the Lord. You will not only be secure of their dutiful and grateful behaviour to you, but will have the pleasure of seeing them grow up in their different stations, to prospects of usefulness in the church, and in the world. Should Providence spare you to the advance of age, they will be a comfort and honour to your declining years. You will, as it were, enjoy a second youth in their vigour and usefulness; nay, a sense of their piety and goodness will undoubtedly be a reviving cordial to you in your dying moments. A delightful thought will it indeed be! "I am going to take my leave of the world, and my scene of service is over; but I leave those behind me, who will appear for God in my stead, and act, perhaps, with greater fidelity and zeal, for the support of religion in a degenerate age. I leave my poor children, destitute indeed of my counsel and help, perhaps in no abundant affluence of worldly enjoyments; but I leave them under the guardian care of my Father and their Father, of my God and their God. I must soon be separated from them, and the distance between us must soon be as great, as between earth and heaven, but as I leave them under the best guidance in the wilderness, so I have a joyful persuasion they will soon follow me into the celestial Canaan. Yet a little while, and I and my dear offspring shall appear before the throne of God, and I shall stand forth with transport, and say, Behold, here am I, and the children which my God has graciously given me. Then will the blessedness on which I now enter, be multiplied upon me, by the sight of every child that has a share in it. Now, Lord, sufferest thou thy servant to depart in peace, since thou hast directed not only mine eyes, but theirs, to thy salvation."

But if you see these dear little ones grow up for the destroyer, if you see those, whose infant days gave you so many tender pleasures, and so many fond hopes, deviating from the paths of duty and happiness, how deeply will it pierce you! You now look upon them with a soft complacency, and say, "These are they, that shall comfort us under our labours and sorrows." But alas! my friends, if this be the case, "These are they, that will increase your labours, and aggravate your sorrows; that will hasten upon you the infirmities of age, or crush you the faster under the weight of them, till they have brought down your hoary hairs with anguish to the grave." Little do they or you think, how much agony and distress you may endure, from what you will see and what you will fear concerning them. How many slighted admonitions, how many deluded hopes, how many anxious days, how many restless nights, will concur to make the evening of life gloomy! And at length, when God gives you a dismission from a world, which the folly and wickedness of your children has so long imbittered, how painful will the separation be; when you have a prospect of seeing them but once more, and that at the tribunal of God, where the best you can expect, (in their present circumstances,) is to rise up in judgment against them, and to bear an awful testimony, which shall draw down upon them aggravated damnation!

And let me plainly tell you, that if in these last moments, conscience should also accuse you of the neglect of duty, and testify that your own sorrow, and your children's ruin, is in part chargeable upon that, it will be a dreadful ingredient in this bitter cup, and will greatly darken, if not entirely suppress, those hopes with regard to yourselves, which alone could support you in this mournful scene. I am fully persuaded, that if you knew the weight with which these things will sit upon your mind in the immediate views of the eternal world, you would not suffer every trifling difficulty, or little care, to deter you from the discharge of those duties, which are so necessary to prevent these galling reflections.

To conclude: Let me entreat you seriously to weigh the united force of these arguments, which I have now been urging to excite your diligence in this momentous care of training up your children in the way in which they should go. Consider how pleasant the attempt is. Consider how fair a probability there is that it may prosper, as it is in itself a very rational method, as it is a method God has appointed, and a method which he has crowned with singular success. Consider how important that success is, to the honour of God and interest of religion, to the temporal and eternal happiness of your children, and finally, to your own comfort both in life and death.

On the whole I well know, and I am persuaded, Sirs, that you yourselves are convinced, that whatsoever can be opposed to such considerations as these, when laid in an impartial balance, it is altogether lighter than vanity. I do therefore seriously appeal to those convictions of your consciences, as in the sight of God: and if, from this time at least, the education of children amongst you be neglected, or regarded only as a light care, God is witness, and you yourselves are witnesses, that it is not for want of being plainly instructed in your duty, or seriously urged to the performance of it.

SERMON III.

PROVERBS XXII. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

THOSE of you who have made any observations on human life, must certainly know, that if we desire to be agreeable and useful in it, we must regard not only the quality, but the manner, of our actions; and that while we are in the pursuit of any important end, we must not only attend to those actions which do immediately refer to it, but must watch over the whole of our conduct, that we may preserve a consistency in the several parts of it. Otherwise we shall spoil the beauty and acceptance of many an honest, and perhaps, in the main, prudent, attempt; or, by a train of unthought-of consequences, shall demolish with the one hand what we are labouring to build up with the other.

This is a remark which we shall have frequent occasion to recollect; and it is of peculiar importance in the business of education. It is therefore necessary, that having before described the way in which children are to be trained up, and urged you to a diligent application to the duty, I now proceed, Thirdly, to offer some advices for your assistance in this attempt, of leading children into, and conducting them in, this way.

These will relate—partly to the manner in which the attempt is to be made,—and partly to the precautions necessary for rendering it effectual: which are, as you see, matters of distinct consideration, though comprehended under the general head of directions.

I. As to the manner in which the attempt is to be made.

And here it is evident it should be done plainly,—seriously,—tenderly,—and patiently.

1. Children are to be instructed plainly: in the plainest things, and by the plainest words.

They are to be taught the plainest things in religion in the first place. And it is a pleasing reflection on this occasion, that according to the abundant goodness and condescension of the great God, those things which are the most necessary are the plainest. Just as in the world of nature, those kinds of food which are the most wholesome and nourishing are also the most common. We should show our grateful sense of the divine goodness in this particular by our care to imitate it; and should see to it, that when the necessities of our children require bread, we do not give them a stone, or chaff; as we should do, if we were to distract their feeble minds with a variety of human schemes and doubtful disputations. The more abstruse and mysterious truths of the gospel are gradually to be unfolded, as they are exhibited in the oracles of God, and to be taught in the language of the Spirit; according to the excellent advice of the great Dr. Owen,* "making Scripture phraseology our rule and pattern in the declaration of spiritual things." But we must not begin here. We must feed them with milk while they are babes, and reserve the strong meat for a maturer age. Take the most obvious and vital truths of Christianity. Tell them that they are creatures, and sinful creatures; that by sin they have displeased a holy God; and that they must be pardoned, and sanctified, and accepted in Christ, or must perish for ever. Show them the difference between sin and holiness, between a state of nature and of grace. Show them that they are hastening on to death and judgment, and so must enter on heaven or hell, and dwell for ever in the one or the other. Such kind of lessons will probably turn to the best account, both to them and you. I know it is a very easy thing to inflame the warm ignorant minds of children with an eager zeal for distinguishing forms, or distinguishing phrases, and to make them violent in the interest of a party, before they know any thing of common Christianity. But if we thus sow the wind, we shall probably reap the whirlwind; venting ourselves, and transfusing into them, a wrath of man, which never works, but often greatly obstructs, the righteousness of God. Blessed be God, this is not the fault of you, my friends of this congregation. I would mention it with great thankfulness, as both your happiness and mine, that, so far as I can judge, it is the sincere milk of the word that you desire. Let it be your care to draw it out for the nourishment of your children's souls, as their understandings and capacities will permit them to take it in.

And while you are teaching them the plainest things, endeavour to do it in the plainest words. It is the gracious method which God uses with us, who speaks to us of heavenly things in language, not fully expressive of the sublimity and grandeur of the subject, but rather suited to our feeble apprehensions. Thus our Lord taught his disciples, as they were able to bear it; and used easy and familiar similitudes, taken from the most obvious occurrences in life, to illustrate matters of the highest importance. A most instructive example! Such condescension should we use, in training up those committed to our care, and should examine, whether we take their understandings along with us as we go on: otherwise we are speaking in an unknown tongue, and, as the apostle expresses it, are barbarians unto them, be our language ever so graceful, elegant, or pathetic.*

Give me leave to add, for the conclusion of this head, that though it is to be taken for granted, that children in their earliest infancy are to be engaged to what is good, and to be restrained from evil, chiefly, by a view to rewards and punishments, more immediate or remote, or by some natural workings of a benevolent affection, which are by all means to be cherished and cultivated; yet, as they might grow up to greater ripeness of understanding, something further is to be attempted. It must then be our care, to set before them, in the strongest light, the beauties of holiness, and deformities of sin; and likewise to propose, in the easiest and most familiar way, the evidences of the truth of Christianity, that they may be fortified against those temptations to infidelity, with which the present age does so unhappily abound. The external evidences of it are by no means to be slighted, such as the credibility of the gospel history, the accomplishment of prophecies, the unity of design, carried on by so many different persons in distant ages and countries, its amazing and even miraculous propagation in the world; all which, with many other considerations to the same purpose, are very judiciously handled in a variety of excellent writings of our own age; of which I know not any more suited to your use, than Mr. Bennet's Discourses on the Inspiration of Scripture, which I therefore recommend to your attentive perusal; and with them Dr. Watts's Sermons on the Inward Witness to the Truth of Christianity, from its efficacious tendency to promote holiness. This appears to me the noblest evidence of all, and will, to those who have actually experienced it, be an anchor of the soul both sure and stedfast.

2. Children should be instructed in a very serious manner.

There is an unhappy proneness in our degenerate nature to trifle with the things of God; and the giddiness of children is peculiarly subject to it. Great care should therefore be taken, that we do not encourage such a humour, nor teach them by our levity or indolence in the manner of instruction, to take the awful name of God in vain, while they are speaking of him, or to him. For this purpose we must labour with our own hearts, to work them to a deep and serious sense of the truth and importance of what we say: this will give us an unaffected solemnity in speaking, which will probably command the attention, and impress the hearts, of our children. Endeavour to preserve on your own spirit an habitual awe of the great and blessed God, the Lord of heaven and earth; that when you speak of him to those little creatures, they may evidently see the indications of the humblest veneration and reverence, and so may learn to fear him from their youth. When you speak of Christ, let your souls be bowing to him as the Son of God, through whom alone you and yours can obtain pardon and life; and let them be overflowing with love to him, for his unutterable and inconceivable grace. And when you remind them of death, judgment, and eternity, consider yourselves and them as dying creatures: think in how few months, or weeks, or days, your lips may be silent in the dust, or they may be for ever removed beyond the reach of your instructions; and plead with them in as earnest and importunate a manner, as if the salvation of their immortal souls depended on the effect of the present address. Again,

* Owen on the Spirit, Book ii. ch. [illegible]

* Meminisse [illegible] capitis [illegible]

3. Children should be instructed in a very tender and affectionate manner.

We should take care to let them see, that we do not desire to terrify and amaze them, to lead them into unnecessary severities, or to deprive them of any innocent pleasures; that what we say is not dictated by an ostentation of our own wisdom and authority; but that it all proceeds from a hearty love to them, and an earnest desire of their happiness. Study therefore to address them in the most endearing language, as well as with the softest and sweetest arguments. Endeavour, according to the practice of Solomon, to find out acceptable words. And if tears should rise while you are speaking, do not suppress them. There is a language in them, which may perhaps affect beyond words. A weeping parent is both an awful and a melting sight.

Endeavour therefore to look upon your children in such a view, as may be most likely to awaken these tender sentiments. Consider them as creatures, whom you (as instruments) have brought into being, tainted with innate corruption, surrounded with snares, and, on the whole, in such apparent danger, that if not snatched as brands out of the burning, they must perish for ever. And that your hearts may be further mollified, and you may be formed to the most gentle and moving manner of address, let me entreat you to study the Scripture in this view, and to observe the condescending and endearing forms in which the blessed God speaks to us there. Observe them for yourselves, and point them out to your children. Tell them, how kindly he has demanded, how graciously he has encouraged, their services; while he says, Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth; and elsewhere, I love them that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me. Tell them, that the Lord Jesus Christ hath invited them to come to him; for he hath said, Come unto me all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest: Him that comes unto me, I will in no wise cast out: And whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely. Such scriptures as these should be often repeated to them, and should be early inculcated on their memory, with an attempt, as far as possible, to let them into the spirit and force of them.

Nor will it be improper sometimes to set before them how much you have done, how much you are ready to do, for them; how many anxious thoughts you entertain, how many fervent prayers you offer, on their account. Thus Lemuel's mother addressed him, What, my son? and what, the son of my womb? and what, the son of my vows? As if she had said, "My dear child, for whom I have borne so much, for whom I have prayed so earnestly; in what words shall I address thee, to express what my heart feels on thy account? How shall I speak my affectionate overflowing concern for thy happiness both in time and eternity?" So Solomon pleads, My son, if thine heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, even mine: as if he should have said, "Think how much is comprehended in that argument, that a parent's happiness is in a great measure to be determined by thy character and conduct." And the apostle Paul lays open his heart to the Galatians in those pathetical words, My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, till Christ be formed in you. Yet these were, comparatively, strangers to him. And should not you, my friends, feel, should not you express, an equal tenderness for those, who are so nearly allied to you in the bonds of nature, for those who are indeed parts of yourselves? But further,

4. Children should also be instructed patiently.

You know, when the husbandman has committed the seed to the ground, he patiently expects the fruit of his labours. So must ministers do, when instructing their people: so must parents do, when instructing their children. You must not imagine, my friends, that a plentiful harvest will spring up in a day. The growth of nature is slow, and by insensible degrees: nor are you to wonder, if advances in knowledge and grace be still slower. Be upon your guard therefore against fretfulness and impatience. Your children will forget what you have once taught them; repeat it a second time; and if they forget it the second time, repeat it the third. It is thus that the great God deals with you; and you have daily reason to rejoice that he does. He knows the frailty and weakness of your minds, and therefore acts by a rule, which seems to be laid down with peculiar regard to the very point I am urging. Whom shall he teach knowledge, and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts. For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; and line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little. As if the prophet should have said, "God has treated you like little children, who must have the same short easy lesson repeated again and again." And is it not indeed thus with regard to you? Does not the patience and condescension of your heavenly Father send to you his ministers sabbath after sabbath, frequently inculcating the same things, that what you have forgot may be brought to mind again? Thus should you do by those committed to your care.

Be teaching them every sabbath: that is remarkably a good day for the purpose. Then you have leisure for it; then you have peculiar advantage to pursue the work; then you are furnished with some new matter by what you have heard in public; and I would hope, your spirits are then quickened by it; so that you can speak out of the abundance of the heart: and you may, by discoursing with them on what has been addressed to you, revive the impression on your own souls.

I add: Be teaching them every day, by occasional discourses, when you have not an opportunity of doing it by stated addresses. Drop a word for God every day, and often in a day. You will probably find your account in it, and your children theirs. A sudden glance of thought towards God in the midst of the world is often a great refreshment to the Christian; and a sudden turn to something serious and spiritual in conversation, is frequently very edifying to others. It strikes the memory and the heart, and is, perhaps, as a nail fixed in a sure place, when many a solemn admonition, and many an elaborate sermon, is lost. It is with pleasure that I frequently hear good Christians speaking of such occasional hints, which have been dropped by saints of the former generation. Those transient passages, which the pious parents might forget in a few moments, their children have distinctly remembered for many future years, and repeated for their own edification, and I might add, for mine. Let this therefore be an encouragement to you; and in this respect, in the morning sow this precious seed, and in the evening withhold not your hand, since you know not whether shall prosper, or whether both shall be alike good.

Once more, let me entreat you to repeat your pious instructions and admonitions, even though your children should grow up to years of maturity without appearing to profit by them. Say not, that you can teach them no more than they already know; or, that you can try no new methods which you have not already attempted. You see that, in our assemblies, God often brings back souls to himself, by setting home on the conscience truths which, with regard to the speculative part of them, they know as well as their teachers; and adds a divine efficacy to those institutions, which, for a long succession of years, they had attended in vain. Be not therefore weary in well-doing; but let patience in this instance have its perfect work.

Thus let your children be instructed plainly, seriously, tenderly, and patiently. I wave some other particulars, which I might have added to these, concerning the manner of instructing them, because I apprehend they will more properly fall under the second branch of these directions, where I am further to advise you,

II. As to the precautions you must use, if you desire that these attempts in the religious education of your children may be attended with success.

Here I would particularly advise,—that a prudent care be taken to keep up your authority over them, —and at the same time to engage their affections to you;—that you be solicitous to keep them out of the way of temptation;—that you confirm your admonitions by a suitable example;—that you cheerfully accept of proper assistances in this important attempt;—and that you humbly and constantly look up to God for his blessing on all.

1. If we desire to succeed in our attempts for the religious education of our children, we must take care to keep up our authority over them.

To this purpose, we must avoid, not only what is grossly vicious and criminal, (which will be more properly mentioned under a following head,) but also those little levities and follies which might make us appear contemptible to them. Whatever liberties we may take with those who are our equals in age and station, a more exact decorum is to be preserved before our children. Thus we are to reverence them, if we desire they should reverence us;* for, as Dr. Tillotson very justly observes, "There is a certain freedom of conversation, which is only proper amongst equals in age and quality, which if we use before our superiors we seem to despise them, and if we do it before our inferiors, we teach them to despise us."†

I will not insist on this hint, which your own prudence must accommodate to particular circumstances: but shall here introduce the mention of correction, which, in some cases, may be absolutely necessary to the support of parental authority, especially where admonitions and counsels are slighted.

You know, that the Scriptures expressly require it on proper occasions; and Solomon, in particular, enlarges on the head, and suggests some important thoughts with regard to it. Foolishness (says he) is bound up in the heart of a child, but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him. Nay, he speaks of it as a matter in which life is concerned, even the life of the soul: Withhold not correction from a child; for if thou beat him with the rod he shall not die: Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and shalt deliver his soul from hell. And is it kindness, or cruelty, in a parent, to spare the flesh to the hazard of the soul? Parents are therefore exhorted to an early care in this respect, lest vicious habits growing inveterate should render the attempt vain or hurtful; and they are cautioned against that foolish tenderness, which would lead them to regard the tears of a child, rather than his truest and highest interest. Correct thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying: He that spareth the rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes. Nor can we imagine a more lively commentary on the words than the melancholy story of Eli, who, though he was a very eminent saint in a degenerate age, yet erred here, and by a fatal indulgence, brought ruin, as well as infamy, on himself and his family. He reproved the abominable wickedness of his sons; but did not make use of those severe methods, which, in such a case, the authority of a parent might have warranted, and the office of a judge did undoubtedly require. Observe the sentence which God pronounced against him for it, and which he executed upon him in a very awful manner. The Lord said unto Samuel, Behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle. In that day I will perform against Eli all the things which I have spoken concerning his house; when I begin, I will also make an end. For I have told him, that I will judge his house for ever, for the iniquity which he knoweth; because his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. Take heed, I entreat you, as you love your children, as you love yourselves, that it may not be said of you, that yours have made themselves vile, and you have neglected to restrain them. Let mothers, in particular, take heed, that they do not, as it were, smother their children in their embraces; as a French author smartly expresses it.* And let me remind you all to be particularly cautious, that the arms of one parent be not a refuge to the children from the resentment of the other. Both should appear to act in concert, or the authority of the one will be despised, and probably the indulgence of the other abused, and the mutual affection of both endangered.

I cannot say that I enlarge on this subject with pleasure; but how could I have answered for the omission of what is so copiously and so pathetically inculcated in the sacred writings? It is indeed probable, that the rugged and servile temper of the generality of the Jewish nation, might render a severe discipline peculiarly necessary for their children; yet I fear there are few of our families where every thing of this kind can safely be neglected. But, after all, I would by no means drive matters to extremities; and therefore cannot persuade myself to dismiss the head without a caution or two. Take heed,—that your corrections be not too frequent,—or too severe—and that they be not given in an unbecoming manner.

If your corrections be too frequent, it will probably spoil much of the success. Your children, like iron, will harden under repeated strokes; and that ingenuous shame will be gradually worn off, which adds the greatest sting to what they suffer from a parent's hand. And there will be this further inconvenience attending it, that there will not be a due difference made between great and small faults. The laws of Draco the Athenian were justly rejected, because they punished all crimes alike, and made the stealing of an apple capital, as well as the murder of a citizen. You, on the contrary, should let your children see, that you know how to distinguish between indiscretion and wickedness; and should yourselves appear most displeased, when you think God is so.

Nor should your corrections at any time be too severe. It is very prettily said by Dr. Tillotson on this occasion, "that whips are not the cords of a man." They should be used in a family, only (as the sword in the republic) as the last remedy, when all others have been tried in vain; and then should be so used, as that we may appear to imitate the compassion of our heavenly Father, who doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.

Which leads me to add, that we should be greatly cautious, that correction be not inflicted in an unbecoming manner: and it always is so, when it is given in a passion. A parent's correcting his child should be regarded as an act of domestic justice, which therefore should be administered with a due solemnity and decorum; and to behave otherwise on the occasion, is almost as great an indecency, as for a judge to pass sentence in a rage. It is injurious to ourselves, as it tends to spoil our own temper; for peevishness and passion will grow upon us, by being indulged towards those who dare not oppose them. And it is on many accounts injurious to our children. Solomon intimates, that correction and instruction should be joined, when he says, The rod and reproof give wisdom. But what room is there for the still voice of wisdom to be heard in a storm of fury? If your children see that you act calmly and mildly; if they read parental tenderness in your heart, through an awful frown on your brow; if they perceive that correction is your strange work, a violence which you offer to yourselves from a principle of duty to God and affection to them; they must be obdurate indeed, if they do not receive it with reverence and love; for this is both a venerable and an amiable character. But if once they imagine that you chastise them merely to vent your passion, and gratify your resentments, they will secretly despise, and perhaps hate, you for it. In that instance at least, they will look upon you as their enemies, and may, by a continued course of such severities, contract an aversion, not only to you, but to all that you recommend to them. Thus you may lose your authority and your influence, by the very method you take to support it, and may turn a wholesome though bitter medicine into poison. But I hope and trust that your humanity and your prudence will concur to prevent so fatal an abuse.

2. If you desire success in your attempts for the education of your children, you must be careful to secure their affection to you.

Our Lord observes, that if any man love him, he will keep his word; and the assertion is applicable to the present case: the more your children love you, the more will they regard your instructions and admonitions. God has indeed made it their duty to love you, and the most indispensable laws of gratitude require it; yet since so many children are evidently wanting in filial affection, it is certain that all this may not secure it in yours, unless you add a tender obliging behaviour to all the other benefits you have conferred upon them. I observed, under a former head, that you should address them in an affectionate manner when discoursing on religious subjects; but now I add, that you should carry the temper through life, and be daily endeavouring to render yourselves amiable to them. The apostle cautions parents, that they should not provoke their children to wrath, if they would bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. On the contrary, you should put on the kindest looks; you should use the most endearing and condescending language; you should overlook many little failings, and express a high complacency in what is really regular and laudable in their behaviour. And though you must sometimes overrule their desires, when impatiently eager, yet far from delighting generally to cross them, you should rather study their inclinations, that you may surprise them with unexpected favours. Thus will they learn quietly to refer themselves to your care, and will more easily submit to mortification and denial, when it is not made necessary by clamorous and impetuous demands. Oh the whole, you should endeavour to behave so, as that your children may love your company, and of choice be much in it; which will preserve them from innumerable snares, and may furnish you with many opportunities of forming their temper and behaviour, by imperceptible degrees, to what may be decent, amiable, and excellent.*

If you manage these things with prudence, you need not fear that such condescensions, as I have now recommended, will impair your authority: far from that, they will rather establish it. The superiority of your parental character may be maintained in the midst of these indulgences; and when it is thus attempered, it is most like to produce that mixture of reverence and love, by which the obedience of a child is to be distinguished from that of a slave.

3. You must be solicitous to keep your children out of the way of temptation, if you would see the success of your care in their education.

If you are not on your guard here, you will probably throw down what you have built, and build up that which you have been endeavouring to destroy. An early care must be taken, to keep them from the occasions, and the very appearances, of evil. We should not venture their infant steps on the brink of a precipice, on which grown persons, who know how to adjust the poise of their bodies, may walk without extreme danger. More hazardous might it be, to allow them to trifle with temptations, and boldly venture to the utmost limits of that which is lawful. An early tenderness of conscience may be a great preservative; and the excess of strictness, (though no excess be desirable,) may prove much safer than an excess of liberty.

Bad company is undoubtedly one of the most formidable and pernicious entanglements. By forming friendships with persons of a vicious character, many a hopeful youth has learnt their ways, and found a fatal snare to his soul. You should be very watchful to prevent their contracting such dangerous friendships; and where you discover any thing of that kind, should endeavour, by all gentle and endearing methods, to draw them off from them; but if they still persist, you must resolve to cut the knot you cannot untie, and let your children know, that they must either renounce their associates or their parents. One resolute step of this kind might have prevented the ruin of multitudes, who have fallen a sacrifice to the importunities of wicked companions, and the weak indulgence of imprudent parents, who have contented

All bad company is, in this respect, formidable; but that is most evidently so, which is to be found at home. Great care ought therefore to be taken, that you admit none into your families, who may debauch the tender minds of your children by pernicious opinions, or by vicious practices.* This is a caution which should be particularly remembered in the case of servants. Take heed you do not bring into your families such as may diffuse infection through the souls of your dear offspring. It is a thousand times better to put up with some inconveniences and disadvantages, when you have reason to believe a servant fears God, and will, from a principle of conscience, be faithful in watching over your children, and in seconding your religious care in their education; than to prefer such, as while they are, perhaps, managing your temporal affairs something better, may pervert your children to the service of the devil. I fear, some parents little think how much secret mischief these base creatures are doing. And it is very possible, that if some of you recollect what you may have observed amongst the companions of your childhood, you may find instances of this nature, which riper years have not since given you opportunity to discover. See to it, therefore, that you be diligently on your guard here.

Again: If you send your children to places of education, be greatly cautious in your choice of them. Dearly will you purchase the greatest advantages for learning, at the expense of those of a religious nature. And I will turn out of my way to add, that schoolmasters and tutors will have a dreadful account to give, if they are not faithfully and tenderly solicitous for the souls of those committed to their care. The Lord pardon our many defects here, and quicken us to greater diligence and zeal!—But to return:

Give me leave only to add, that it is of the highest importance, if you would not have all your labour in the education of your children lost, that you should be greatly cautious with regard to their settlement in the world. Apprenticeships and marriages, into irreligious families, have been the known sources of innumerable evils. They who have exposed the souls of their children to apparent danger, for the sake of some secular advantages, have often lived to see them drawn aside to practices ruinous to their temporal, as well as their eternal, interests. Thus their own iniquity hath remarkably corrected them: and I heartily pray, that the God of this world may never be permitted thus to blind your eyes; but that you, my friends, may learn from the calamities of other families, that wholesome lesson, which, if you neglect it, others may perhaps hereafter learn from the ruin of yours.

4. See to it, that you confirm your admonitions by a suitable example, if you desire on the whole that they should prove useful to your children.

A consciousness of the irregularity of your own behaviour, in any remarkable instances which may fall under their observation, will probably abate much of that force and authority with which we might otherwise address them.† When we know they may justly retort upon us, at least in their minds, those words of the apostle, Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? surely a sense of guilt and of shame must either entirely silence us, or at least impair that freedom and confidence, with which we might otherwise have exhorted or rebuked.

Or had we so much composure and assurance, as to put on all the forms of innocence and virtue, could we expect regard, when our actions contradicted our discourses, or hope they should reverence instructions, which their teachers themselves appear to despise? It is in the general true, that there is a silent, but powerful, oratory in example, beyond the force of the most elegant and expressive words; and the example of parents has often a peculiar weight with their children;‡ which seems to be alluded to in that exhortation of St. Paul, Be ye followers (or imitators) of God, as dear children. So that on the whole, as a very celebrated writer well expresses it,§ "To give children good instruction, and a bad example, is but beckoning to them with the head to show them the way to heaven, while we take them by the hand, and lead them in the way to hell." We should therefore most heartily concur in David's resolution, as ever we hope our families should be religious and happy: I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way; I will walk within my house with a perfect heart.

5. Cheerfully accept of all proper assistances in the education of your children, if you desire it may succeed well.

It will be your wisdom to accept of the assistance, which may be offered, either from books, or friends.

Books may in this respect be very useful to you; the book of God above all: both to furnish you with materials for this great work, and to instruct you in the manner of performing it. Other writings may be subservient to this purpose. Wise and pious treatises on the subject of education may be read with great pleasure and advantage; and you may receive singular assistance from those catechisms, and prayers, and songs for children, with which most of your families are now furnished, through the condescension of one valuable friend* in writing them, and the generosity of another in bestowing them upon us. I hope you will express your thankfulness to both, by a diligent care to use them: and I persuade myself, that you and yours may abundantly find your account in them; for while the language is so plain and easy, that even an infant may understand it, you will often find, not only a propriety, but a strength and sublimity, in the sentiments, which may be improving to persons of advanced capacities. There is much of that milk, by which strong men may be entertained and nourished.

I add, that in this important work, you should gladly embrace the assistance of pious and prudent friends. I can by no means approve that Lacedemonian law, which gave every citizen the power of correcting his neighbour's children, and made it infamous for the parent to complain of it: yet we must all allow, that considering the great importance of education, a concern for the happiness of families and the public, will require a mutual watchfulness over each other in this respect; nor is there any imaginable reason to exclude this from the number of those heads, on which we are to admonish one another; and to consider each other, to provoke unto good works.

Nothing seems more evident than this; and one would suppose, that persons, who are acquainted with human nature, should suspect, that self-love might work under this form, and that they might be a little blinded by a partial affection to their offspring. Such a reflection might engage them, at least patiently, or rather thankfully, to hear the sentiments, and receive the admonitions, of their friends on this head. But instead of this, there is in many people a kind of parental pride, (if I may be allowed the expression,) which seldom fails to exert itself on such an occasion. They are so confident in their own way, and do so magisterially despise the opinion of others, that one would almost imagine they took it for granted, that, with every child, nature had given to the parent a certain stock of infallible wisdom for the management of it: or that, if they thought otherwise, they rather chose their children should be ruined by their own conduct, than saved by any foreign advice. If this arrogance only rendered the parents ridiculous, one should not need to be greatly concerned about it; especially as their high complacency in themselves would make them easy, whatever others might think or say of them: but when we consider the unhappy consequences it may produce, with regard to the temper and conduct of the rising generation, it will appear a very serious evil, well worthy a particular mention, and a particular care to guard against it.

As for the assistance of ministers in this work of education, I persuade myself you will be so wise as thankfully to embrace it, both in public and private; and let me urge you to improve it to the utmost. Accustom your children to an early constancy and seriousness in attending divine ordinances, and be often yourselves inquiring, and give us leave sometimes to inquire, how they advance in acquaintance with religion, and in love to it. And more particularly let them attend on our catechetical lectures, which are peculiarly intended for their service.

I bless God, I have seen the happy effects of this exercise, both in the places where I was educated whilst a child,† and in those where I was formerly fixed; and as I am now introducing it amongst you, with an intent to continue it as long as I am capable of public service, I promise myself your most hearty concurrence in it. I will not at large insist on the advantages which may attend it. You easily see, that it will be an engagement to the children to learn those excellent summaries of divine truth, when their progress in them is so often examined. By repeating it themselves, and hearing it rehearsed by others, it will be more deeply fixed upon their memories. The exposition of it in a plain and familiar manner, may much improve their understandings in the doctrines and duties of religion: and I will add, you that are parents may, by attending on these occasions, possibly learn something as to the way of opening and explaining things, which you may successfully practise at home. In consequence of all, we may hope that, by the divine blessing, some good impressions may be made on the minds of children. And when they find a minister willing to take pains to instruct them, when they hear him seriously and tenderly pleading with them, and pleading with God for them, it may much engage their affections to him, and so promote his usefulness amongst them, in other ordinances, and in future years. And give me leave to say, upon this head, that as no wise and good minister will think it beneath him to desire the affection of the children of his congregation, so it is the duty of parents to cherish in their offspring sentiments of respect and love to all the faithful ministers of Christ, and especially towards those who statedly labour amongst them. Whatever mistakes you may discover in our conduct, or whatever deficiencies in our public ministrations, you should study to conceal them from the notice of your children; lest they should grow up in a contempt of those whose services might otherwise be highly advantageous to them.

On the mention of which, I cannot forbear [illegible] my serious thanks to my reverend and worthy friends, Mr. Meyrick and Mr. Clark, for the many excellent admonitions they gave me there, in public and private, when under their instruction, now in the years of childhood. As I would always retain a grateful remembrance of it, I cannot but pray that the like care may be as much the practice, as it is the duty, of their successors in every denomination.

6. Lastly, Be earnest in prayer to God for his blessing on your attempts in the education of your children, if you desire to see them successful.

This I would leave with you as my last advice; and though I have had frequent occasion to hint at it before, I would now more particularly urge it on your attentive regard. God is the author of every good and every perfect gift; it is he that has formed the mind and the tongue, and that teaches man knowledge and address. On him therefore must you fix your dependence, to teach you so to conceive of divine things, and so to express your conceptions of them, as may be most suited to the capacities, the dispositions, and the circumstances of your children; and to him you must look to teach them to profit by all, by his almighty grace to open their ear unto discipline, and to bow their heart unto understanding.

A heathen poet could teach the Romans, in a form of public and solemn devotion, to look up to heaven for influences from thence, to form their youth to the love and practice of virtue.* Surely you, my friends, are under much greater obligations to do it, and that in a Christian manner; earnestly entreating the God of grace to send down on your rising offspring the effusions of that blessed Spirit, which was purchased by the blood of Christ, and is deposited in his compassionate hand. If you have tasted that the Lord is gracious, you are daily living on those supplies; let it be your constant errand at the throne of grace to plead for your children there. Wrestle with God in secret for the life of their souls, and for those regenerating influences on which it depends; and in those family devotions, which I hope you dare not neglect, let the little ones, from their earliest infancy, have a share in your remembrance. You may humbly hope, that He by whose encouragement and command you pray, will not suffer these supplications to be like water spilt upon the ground. And, in the nature of things, it may tend to make serious impressions on the minds of your children, to hear their own case mentioned in prayer; and may dispose them with greater regard to attend on what you say to them, when they find you so frequently, so solemnly, and so tenderly, pleading with God for them.

Doubt not that every faithful minister of Christ will most heartily concur with you, in so great and necessary a request. May God return to our united addresses an answer of peace! May he pour out his Spirit on our seed, and his blessing on our offspring, that they may grow up before him as willows by the water-courses; that they may be to their parents for a comfort, to the church for a support, and to our God for a name and a praise! Amen.

SERMON IV

Proverbs xxii. 6.

Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

In treating on this subject of Education, I have all along endeavoured, according to my usual manner, to make my discourses as practical as I could. While I was describing and recommending the way, and offering my advices with regard to the manner of conducting children into it, most of what I said under those generals was an application to you. I have therefore left myself the less to do here; yet I was not willing to conclude my discourses on a subject, which it is probable I shall never so largely resume, without,

Fourthly, A particular address to my hearers, according to your different relations and characters in life.

This I promised as my fourth and last general, and I enter on it without further preface; humbly begging that God, who has so intimate an access to all our hearts, would enable me to speak in the most awakening and edifying manner; and that he would, by his blessed Spirit, apply it to your consciences, that it may be as a nail fastened in a sure place; that hearing and knowing these things for yourselves, you may hear and know them for your good.

I would here particularly address myself,—first, to parents, then to children, and, in the last place, to those young persons who are grown up to years of maturity, but not yet fixed in families of their own.

I. Let me address my discourse to those of you that are parents; whether you have been negligent of the duties I have now been urging, or through grace have been careful in the discharge of them.

1. To those who have been grossly negligent in this important care.

I have here one advantage not common to every subject; I mean, that the guilty will immediately know themselves. When we apply ourselves in general to unconverted sinners, ignorance of the nature of true religion, a neglect of conversing with your own souls, or the insinuating prejudices of self-love, may disguise the true state of the case, and teach people to speak peace to themselves under the most awful denunciations of wrath and vengeance. But here, one would imagine, that the recollection of a few moments might be sufficient to determine the case; because the question relates to past fact, and that not merely to one particular action, but to a long train and succession of labours and attempts.

Now let your consciences witness, whether I am guilty of a breach of charity, when I take it for granted, that there are some amongst you, who have been, and are, very negligent of the duty I have now been enforcing? You have probably contented yourselves with teaching your children to read, and setting them to learn, like parrots, a prayer, and perhaps, too, a catechism and a creed. But I appeal to your consciences, have you from the very day of their birth to this time, ever spent one hour in seriously instructing them in the knowledge of God, and endeavouring to form them to his fear and service; in setting before them the misery of their natural condition, and urging them to apply to Christ for life and salvation; in representing the solemnities of death, and judgment, and the eternal world, and urging an immediate and diligent preparation for them? Where is the time, where the place, that can witness, that you have been pouring out your souls before God on their account, and wrestling with him for their lives, as knowing they must perish for ever, without the righteousness of his Son, and the grace of his Spirit? Where, or when, have you thus prayed with them, or for them? What sermon have you heard, what scripture have you read, with this thought, "This will I carry to my children, and communicate to them as the food of their souls?" I fear there are several of you that have been so far from doing it, that you have hardly ever seriously thought of it as a thing to be done.

And I would ask, Why have you not thought of it, and why have you not done it? Are these creatures that you have produced, like the other animals of your houses or your field, mere animated systems of flesh and blood, made to take a turn in life for a few days and months, and then to sink into everlasting forgetfulness? Or are they rational and immortal creatures, that must exist for ever in heaven or in hell? This is not a matter of doubt with you; and yet you behave as if the very contrary to what you believe were evident, certain truth. In short, it is the most barbarous part you act, and more like that of an enemy than a parent.

It is not that you are insensible of the workings of parental tenderness. No, far from that, it may sometimes rise to a weak and criminal dotage; yet I repeat it again, you are acting a hostile and barbarous part. You are greatly solicitous for their temporal happiness. For this you labour and watch; for this you deny yourselves many an enjoyment, and subject yourselves to many an uneasy circumstance: but, alas! Sirs, where is the real friendship of all this, while the precious soul is neglected! Your children are born with a corrupted nature, perverted by sinful examples, ignorant of God, in a state of growing enmity to him, and, in consequence of all, exposed to his wrath and curse, and in the way to everlasting ruin; in the mean time it is your great care, that they may pass through this precarious, momentary life, in ease and pleasure, perhaps in abundance and grandeur; that is, in such circumstances, as will probably lull them into a forgetfulness of their danger, till there be no more hope. How cruel a kindness!

It brings to my mind the account which an ancient writer* gives of the old Carthaginians, which I can never recollect without great emotion. He is speaking of that diabolical custom which so long prevailed amongst them, of offering their children to a detestable idol, which was formed in such a manner, that an infant put into his hands, which were stretched out to receive it, would immediately fall into a gulf of fire.† He adds a circumstance, which one cannot mention without horror; that the mothers, who with their own hands presented the little innocents, thought it an unfortunate omen that the victim should be offered weeping; and therefore used a great many fond artifices to divert it, that soothed by the kisses and caresses of a parent, it might smile in the dreadful moment in which it was to be given up to the idol.‡ Pardon me, my friends; such is your parental care and love, such your concern for the present ease and prosperity of your children, while their souls are neglected: a fond solicitude, that they may pass smiling into the hands of the destroyer!

You know, with what just severity God reckons with the Israelites for their abominable wickedness, in taking his sons and his daughters, (for so he calls the children of his professing people,) and sacrificing them to be devoured: and can you suppose he will take no notice of the unnatural neglect of yours. Not to endeavour to save, is to destroy; and is it a little guilt, when an immortal soul is in question! You probably remember those terrible words in Ezekiel; (may they be deeply inscribed on the hearts of all whom they concern!) Son of man, I have made thee a watchman to the house of Israel, therefore hear thou the word from my mouth, and give them warning from me:—and if thou speakest not to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life, the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thine hand. If ever you read this passage with attention, you must own it is exceedingly awful, and must be ready to say, "The Lord be merciful to ministers, they have a solemn account to give." Indeed they have.

and we thank you, if you ever bestow a compassionate thought and prayer upon us. But permit me to remind you, that though it be our case, it is not ours alone; you have likewise your share in it. Your children are much more immediately committed to your care, than you and they are committed to ours: and, by all parity of reason, if they perish in their iniquities, while you neglect to give them warning, their blood will be required at your hand.

And when God comes to make inquisition for that blood, how will you be able to endure it? That awful day will open upon you, and the tribunal of God, in all its terrors, will stand unveiled before you. Give me leave to direct your eyes to it in this distant prospect, while there is yet room to mitigate those terrors. If you go on in this cruel negligence of the souls of your children, how will you dare to meet them at that judgment-seat? How will you be able to answer the great Father of spirits, when expostulating with you on account of his offspring, as well as yours, who have been betrayed and ruined by your neglect? "Inhuman creatures, (may he justly say,) to whom should I have committed the care of them, rather than to you? Did they not, by my appointment, derive their being from you? Did I not implant in your hearts the natural affections of parents towards them? And to increase the obligation, did they not pass through the tender scenes of infancy and childhood in your arms, and under your eye? If you had no compassion for their perishing souls, if you would exert no efforts for their deliverance and salvation, from whom could those compassions, those efforts, have been expected? But wherein did they appear? Behold the book of my remembrance, the records of thy life, thrown open before thee: where is the memorial of one hour spent in holy instruction, or in fervent prayer with them, or for them? Can I approve, can I acquit, you on such a review? Or shall I not rather visit for these things? and shall not my soul be avenged for such a conduct as this?

And your children,—will they be silent on the occasion? Did Adam, in the distress and amazement of his soul, when in the presence of his judge, accuse Eve, his wife, so lately taken from his side, and committed to his protection, and still, no doubt, appearing lovely in the midst of sorrow? And will your children in that terrible day spare you? You may rather expect they will labour to the utmost to aggravate a crime which costs them so dear, that so they may, if possible, alleviate their own guilt, or if not, indulge their revenge. "O God," may they perhaps then cry out, in the most piercing accents of indignation and despair, "thou art righteous in the sentence thou passest upon us, and we justly die for our own iniquity. We have destroyed ourselves. But wilt thou not remember that our ruin is in part chargeable here? Had these our parents been faithful to thee, and to us, it had perhaps been prevented. Had our infancy been formed by religious instruction, we might not have grown up to wickedness; we might not, in the advance of life, have despised thy word, and trampled on thy Son; but might this day have been owned by thee as thy children, and have risen to that inheritance of light and glory, which we now behold at this unapproachable distance. Oh! cursed be the fathers that begat us; cursed the womb that bare us; cursed the paps that gave us suck! Remember us, O Lord, whilst thou art judging them; and let us have this one wretched comfort, in the midst of all our agonies, that it is not with impunity that they have betrayed our souls!"

This is indeed shocking and diabolical language; and for that very reason, it is so much the more probable on so dreadful an occasion. And give me leave to ask you one question, my friends, and I will conclude this head. If your children were thus crying out against you in the bitterness of their souls, could you attempt to silence them, by reminding them of the care which you took of their temporal affairs, or of the riches and grandeur in which you left them on earth? Nay, could you have the heart so much as to mention such a trifle? And if you could not, then, in the name of God, Sirs, how do you satisfy yourselves to confine all your thoughts and labours to that which, by your own confession, will neither secure your children from everlasting destruction, nor give them one moment's relief in the review, when they are falling into it?

I will make no apology for the plainness and earnestness which I have used. Eternal interests are at stake, and the whole tenor of Scripture supports me in what I say. I had rather you should be alarmed with hearing these things from me now, than tormented with hearing them in another manner from your children, and from God, at last. If you please to take proper measures for preventing the danger, I have told you the way at large: if you do not, I hope I may say, "I am, in this respect, clear from your blood, and the blood of yours, who may perish by your means: look you to it."

But it is high time that I proceed in my address, and apply myself,

2. To those parents who have been careful to discharge the duty we have so copiously described and enforced.

I cannot suppose that any of us would pretend to maintain that in this, or any other branch of duty, we have acted up to the utmost extent and perfection of our rule. I hope, a humble sense of the deficiencies of all the best of our services, is frequently leading us to the believing views of a better righteousness than our own, in which alone we can dare to appear before a holy God, and answer the demands of his perfect law. Nevertheless, it is surely allowable to rejoice in the testimony of our conscience, with regard to the regularity of our own behaviour, so far as it is conformable to reason and Scripture; and it is an important duty, thankfully to own those influences of sanctifying and strengthening grace, by which we are what we are.

It is with great pleasure I recollect the reason I have to believe, that many of you, Christians, who hear me this day, are, in the main, conscientiously practising these duties; and that some of you were doing it long before I was capable of exhorting and directing you. Acknowledge the singular goodness of God, by which you have been excited to them, and furnished for them.

More especially have you reason to adore it, if through grace you can say, with regard to the present success, what you may certainly say as to the future recompence, that your labour in the Lord is not in vain. Let God have the glory of his own work. I persuade myself, you understand the gospel too well, to ascribe it to the prudence of your own conduct, to the strength of your reasoning, or to the warmth and tenderness of your address. Whatever of these advantages you have possessed, were derived from God; and your very care for your offspring, is, (as the apostle expresses it in a like case,) the earnest care which God has put into your hearts. But it was not this care, or these advantages, alone, that produced so happy an effect. In vain had your doctrines from day to day dropped as the rain, and distilled as the dew, in the most gentle and insinuating manner; in vain had the precious seed of the word been sown with unwearied diligence, and watered with tears too; had not God commanded the operations of his blessed Spirit to come down, as a more efficacious rain, as more fruitful showers, to water their hearts. O be not insensible of the favour! Your own souls might to this very day, have been a barren wilderness, a land of drought, a habitation of devils; and behold, not only they, but your families too, are like a field, like a garden, which the Lord has blessed. God might have cut you off many years ago, for your neglect of his covenant, or your breaches of it; and behold, he is establishing it, not only with you, but your seed after you, for an everlasting covenant. Methinks your hearts should overflow with gratitude and holy joy, while you dwell on such reflections as these. This should add a relish to all the pleasure you find in conversing with your children: this should quicken you to further diligence in cultivating those graces, which you have the satisfaction to see already implanted: this should reconcile you to all the afflictions with which Providence may exercise either you or them: this should support you in the views of a separation, either by your own death, or by theirs; since you have so comfortable a hope, that if they are removed they will go to a heavenly Father, and that if they are left behind you, they will be safe and happy under his care, till you meet in a better world, where you will be for ever to each other a mutual glory and joy.

But I cannot congratulate you on such an occasion, without the danger of adding affliction to the afflicted parents, whose circumstances, alas! are far different from yours. I fear, my friends, that there are some amongst you, who look round you, and look forwards, with far different prospects; some who are, with bleeding hearts, borrowing the complaint, which we who are ministers of the gospel so frequently breathe forth, We have laboured in vain, and spent our strength for nought. "O (may you perhaps add) that it were only in vain! Those dear children, which we early devoted to God in baptism, which we endeavoured to educate in the knowledge and fear of the Lord, the children of our hopes, the children of our prayers, are unfruitful under all our cultivation; or, it may be, visibly turned aside from the good ways in which they were trained up; as if they had known them only to reject and affront them: so that, we have reason to fear, that all we have already done, as it is an aggravation of their guilt, will be a proportionable aggravation of their ruin."

It is indeed a very pitiable case. We owe you our compassions, and we owe you our prayers; but permit us to intermix our consolations and our admonitions. You have at least delivered your own souls; and as you participate in the sorrows of faithful ministers, you may share in their comforts too; and say with them, Though the objects of our compassionate care be not gathered, yet shall we be glorious, for our work is with the Lord, and our reward with our God. Go on therefore in the midst of all your discouragements, and, in this respect, be not weary in well-doing. Take heed of such a despair, as would cut the sinews of future endeavours. If your child were labouring under any bodily distemper, you would be very unwilling that the physicians should quite give him over, and try no further medicines: you would follow them, and say, "Can nothing more be done? Is there not the least glimmering of hope?" Alas! my friends, a child given up by a pious parent, is, to a believing eye, a much more melancholy sight, than a patient given over by the physicians. Excuse me then, if I follow you with the question, "Can nothing more be done? Is there not the least glimmering of hope?" Who told you, that the sentence of condemnation is sealed, while you are sure it is not executed? Is the danger extreme? Let your efforts be so much the more zealous, your admonitions so much the more frequent and serious, your prayers so much the more earnest and importunate. And on the whole, (to allude to the words of David, on a much lower occasion,) who can tell whether God will be gracious to you, that the child may live? And the sad apprehensions which you now entertain, may only serve to increase the joy with which you shall then say, This my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found.

II. I would address myself to children: To you, the dear lambs of the flock, whom I look upon as no contemptible part of my charge. I have been speaking for you a great while, and now give me leave to speak to you; and pray do you endeavour, for a few minutes, to mind every word that I say.

You see, it is your parents' duty to bring you up for God. The great God of heaven and earth has been pleased to give his express command, that you should be trained up in the way in which you should go, even in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. It is the wonderful goodness of God to give such a charge; and methinks you should be affected with it, and should be inquiring what you should do in return.

Now there are three things, which I would ask of every one of you, in return for this gracious notice which the great God has taken of you children; and I am sure, if you love your own souls, you will not deny me any of them.—Be willing to learn the things of God;—pray for them that teach you;—and see to it, you do not learn them in vain. Listen diligently, that you may understand and remember each of these.

1. Be willing to learn the things of God.

The things of God are very delightful, and they are very useful; and, whatever you may think of it, your life depends on your acquaintance with them. So Christ himself says, This is life eternal, that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent. Therefore you, children, should not think much of the labour of learning these things. Oh! far from that, you should be every day upon your knees, begging God, that you may be taught to know him, and to know Christ. God has done a great deal more for you, than he has for many others. You might have been born in a place, where you would never have seen a Bible in all your lives; where you would never have heard of the name of Christ, where you might never have been instructed in the nature of duty and sin, nor have been told of the world beyond the grave; and so would probably have fallen into hell, before you had known there was such a place. And the great God has ordained matters so, that you are born under the light of the gospel, and have such plain and excellent instructions, that you may know more of divine things in your infancy, than the wise men amongst the heathens did, when they were old and grey-headed, and had spent all their lives in study. And will you be so ungrateful, as not to be willing to learn, when such provision is made for your instruction? God forbid! Shall God give you his word, and your parents and ministers employ their time, and their pains, to teach you the meaning of it, and will you refuse to attend to it? That were foolish and wicked indeed. I hope much better things of you. This is my first advice: be willing to learn. I add,

2. Pray for those that are to teach you.

I would hope you, little creatures, dare not live without prayer. I hope God, who sees in secret, sees many of you on your knees every morning and every evening, asking a blessing from him as your heavenly Father. Now let me entreat you, that at such times you would pray for those that instruct you in divine things; pray that God would bless them for it, and pray that he would help them in it. In praying thus for us, you do indeed pray for yourselves. There is a gracious promise to the people of God: "And they shall be all taught of God:" pray that it may be fulfilled. Pray, that God would teach us to teach you: else we should attempt it to very little purpose. Pray for your parents, and pray for your ministers.

Pray for your parents: That God would help them to instruct you in such a manner as they have now been directed: that they may do it plainly, so that you may be able to understand what they say: and seriously, that you may be brought to a holy awe of God; and tenderly, that you may be engaged to love God and his word, and Christ and his ways: and pray that your parents may be stirred up to do it frequently, to give you line upon line, and precept upon precept, that you may be put in mind of what you are so ready to forget.

And let me desire you, my dear charge, when you pray for your parents, to pray for your minister too. I declare it again, in the most public manner, it is my earnest desire that children would pray for me. And I verily believe every faithful minister of Christ would join with me in such a request. We do not, we dare not, despise the prayers of one of these little ones. Far from that, I am persuaded it would greatly revive and encourage us, and we should hope that God had some singular mercy in store for us and his people, if we were sure the children of the congregation were every day praying for a blessing on our labours.

3. Take heed that you do not learn in vain.

The great truths which you are taught from the word of God are not intended merely to fill your heads with notions, but to make your hearts and lives more holy. You know the way to your father's house, every step of it, but that would never carry you home, if you would not go in it. No more will it signify to know the way to heaven, unless you walk in it. If you know these things, says the Lord Jesus Christ himself, happy are ye if ye do them. And I may add, that if ye do them not, it had been happier for you if you had never known them. Dear children, consider it; it is but a little while, and you must die: and when those active bodies of yours are become cold, mouldering clay, the great God of heaven and earth will call your souls to his judgment-seat. As sure as you are now in his house, you will shortly, very shortly, be standing before his awful throne. Then he will examine to what purpose you have heard so many religious instructions, so many good lessons. Then he will examine, whether you have feared him, and loved him, and served him, and received the Lord Jesus into your hearts, as your Saviour and your King; whether you have chosen sin or holiness for your way, earth or heaven for your portion. And if it be found that you have lived without thought and without prayer, without any regard to the eye of God always upon you, and the word of God always before you, it will be a most lamentable case. You will have reason to wish you had never heard of these things at all; for he has said, The servant which knew his Lord's will and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. Even while I am speaking to you, death is coming on; perhaps his scythe may cut you down while you are but coming up as flowers. I speak to you thus plainly and earnestly, because I do not know but you may be in eternity before another Lord's day. O pray earnestly that God would give you his grace to fit you for glory; and that all you learn may be so blessed, that you may be made wise to salvation by it. The Lord grant that it may.

And I have one thing to tell you for your encouragement, and then I have done with you for this time. How young soever you are, and how broken soever your prayers may be, the great and glorious Lord of angels and men will be willing to hear what you say. You may be sure to be welcome to the throne of grace. The Lord Jesus Christ, when he was upon earth, was very angry with those who would have hindered little children from coming to him. He said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God. And Christ is as compassionate now as ever he was. Go to him, and you may humbly hope he will, as it were, take you up in his arms, and bless you. He has said it, and I hope you will never forget it; I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me. O that I were but as sure that every child in this assembly would go and ask a blessing from Christ, as I am that our dear Lord is willing to bestow it! But to draw to a conclusion.

III. I shall address myself to those young persons who are grown up to years of maturity, under the advantages of a religious education, and are not yet fixed in families of their own.

I hope that many of you have been sensible of the value of those opportunities you have enjoyed, and by divine grace have been enabled to improve them well; yet I must add, that I fear there are others amongst you who have unhappily neglected and abused them. I must apply myself distinctly to each of you.

1. To those young persons, who have neglected and abused the advantages of a religious education.

I confess, there are hardly any to whom I speak with so little pleasure, because I have seldom less reason to hope I shall succeed. What shall I say to you? What can I say, that you have not often heard, and often despised? One is almost tempted, in such a circumstance, to turn reasonings and expostulations into upbraidings; and even to adopt those too passionate words of Moses, "Hear now, ye rebels, you that have grown up in the knowledge, and yet in the contempt, of divine things; you that have disappointed the hopes, and slighted the admonitions, of your pious parents, and so have broken their spirits, and, it may be, their hearts too, and have brought down their hoary hairs with sorrow to the grave. One way or another you have perhaps silenced them. But is it a small thing to you, that you have thus wearied men, and will you attempt to weary your God also? Can you dare to hope, that you shall at last carry those proud thoughtless heads triumphant over all the terrors of his word?" You imagine it a very happy circumstance that you have got loose from those mortifying lessons, and uneasy restraints, you were once under. But really, when one seriously considers whither these liberties lead you, and where they will probably end, a just resentment of your ingratitude is almost disarmed, and indignation is converted into pity.

Alas! sinners, the way of all transgressors is hard; but yours is peculiarly so. You, whom I am now addressing, are in the morning of your days, and it is not to be supposed that the impressions of a good education are yet entirely effaced. What future years may do I know not; but hitherto, I persuade myself, you have frequently your reflections and your convictions: convictions, which have force enough to torment you, though not to reform you; to plant thorns in the paths of sin, though not to reduce you to those of duty. But if you feel nothing of this remorse and anxiety, such a dead calm is then more dreadful than the fiercest storm and tumult of thought: a sad indication that your course in wickedness has been exceeding swift; indeed, so swift, that it is probable it may not be long. Oh that it might immediately be stopped by divine grace, rather than by the vengeance you have so much reason to fear.

At least be engaged to pause in it for a few moments, and let reason and conscience be permitted to speak. How is it that you make yourselves, I will not say entirely, but tolerably, easy? Is it by the disbelief of Christianity? Do you secretly suspect, that the gospel is but a cunningly devised fable? Yet even that suspicion is not enough. Let me rather ask, "Are you so confident it is so, that you will venture to stake even the life of your souls upon its falsehood?" If you were come to such a confidence, yet it is amazing to me how, even on the principles of natural religion alone, persons in your circumstances can make themselves easy. Can any of the libertines of the present age, that believe a God, imagine that he is altogether such a one as themselves? Can they flatter themselves so far as to hope, that they, in the ways of negligence, profaneness, and debauchery, are likely to meet with a more favourable treatment from him, than those pious parents whose principles they deride? or that this loose and irregular course will end better, than that life of prayer and self-denial, of faith and love, of spirituality and heavenly-mindedness, which they discerned in them? Few are so abandoned, even of common sense, as to think this.

But these are more distant concerns. I bless God, this kind of infidelity is not in fashion here. You assent to the gospel as true, and therefore must know, that God, who observes and records your conduct now, will bring you into judgment for it another day. And if you go on thus, how will you stand in that judgment? What will you plead? On what will you repose the confidence of your souls, that will not prove a broken reed, which will go up into your hand, and pierce you deep, in proportion to the stress you lay upon it? While you behave like a generation of vipers, think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham for our father. Think not to plead a relation to the religious parents, whose God and whose ways you have forsaken. Think not to plead an early dedication to him in the baptismal covenant, which you have broken, despised, and in fact renounced. Think not to plead that external profession, which you have so shamefully contradicted, and even by wearing it, dishonoured. You will see the weakness of such pleas as these, and will not dare to trifle with that awful tribunal, so far as to mention them there. And when you are yourselves thus silent and confounded, who will appear as an advocate in your favour? Your parents were often presenting their supplications and intercessions for you before the throne of grace, but there will be no room to present them before the throne of justice: nor will they have any inclination to do it. All the springs of natural fondness will be dried up; they will no longer regard you as their children, when they see you in the accursed number of the enemies of their God.

And when you are thus disowned by your parents, and disowned by God, whither will you cause your shame and your terror to go? You, who have had so many privileges, and so many opportunities, perhaps I may add, so many fond presumptuous hopes too, how will you bear to see multitudes coming from carnal and profane families, to share with your parents in the inheritance of glory from which you are excluded? You, who were the children of the kingdom; whose remorse therefore must be the more cutting; whose condemnation therefore must be the more weighty! Observe in how strong and lively a view our Lord has represented this awful thought, in words which, though immediately addressed to the unbelieving Jews, are remarkably applicable to you: There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, (your pious ancestors,) in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out: and many shall come from the north, and the south, and the east, and the west, and shall sit down with them in the kingdom of God; but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into utter darkness.

But through the divine forbearance you are not yet shut out. There is still hope even for you, if you will now return to the God of your fathers, from whom, by these aggravated transgressions, you have so deeply revolted. Let me then once more tenderly entreat you, and solemnly charge you, by the consolations of the living, and by the memory of the pious dead, by your present comforts, by your future hopes, by the nearly-approaching solemnities of death and judgment, by the mercies of God, and by the blood of a Redeemer, that you consider, and show yourselves men; that you set yourselves, as it were, attentively to read over the characters inscribed on your memories and understandings in the course of a religious education; that you hearken to the voice of conscience repeating those admonitions, and to the voice of the blessed God, as speaking in his word to confirm them; and finally, that you apply to him in a most importunate manner, for those victorious influences of his Spirit, which are able to mollify and transform these hearts of stone, and to raise even you, from so low a depth of degeneracy and danger, to the character and happiness of the genuine children of Abraham. God forbid, that I should sin against your souls, and my own, in ceasing to pray that it may be so! And now,

2. I shall conclude all, with an address to those young persons, who have been, through grace, engaged to a becoming improvement of the religious education they have enjoyed.

I have the pleasure of being well assured, that there are many such amongst you: many who are now the joy of ministers and parents, and the hope of the church for succeeding years. Let me entreat you, my dear brethren and friends, that you daily acknowledge the divine goodness, in favouring you with such advantages; and, what is still more valuable, in giving you a heart to prize and to improve them.

Think how different your circumstances might have been. Providence might have cast your lot in some distant age or country, where the true God had been unknown, where your early steps had been guided to the groves and temples of detestable idols, and you might possibly have been taught to consecrate lust or murder by the name of devotion. Or you might have been educated in popish darkness, where the Scripture would have been to you as a sealed book, and you would have seen Christianity polluted with idolatrous rites, on some accounts more inexcusable than those of the heathen, and adulterated with the most absurd and pernicious errors. There the mistaken piety of your parents might have proved a dangerous snare, whilst it had infused a blind, and perhaps a cruel, zeal, and a proud furious opposition to all the methods of better information.

Nay, even here, in a protestant country, is it not too evident, there are many families in which had you been born and educated, you had sat as in darkness and the shadow of death, though in the land of light and the valley of vision? Your infant tongue had been formed to the language of hell, and exercised in curses and oaths rather than in prayer. You had early been taught to deride every appearance of serious godliness; and all the irregular propensities of nature had been strengthened by examples of wickedness, which might have been sufficient to corrupt innocence itself. When you consider the wide difference between these circumstances and your own, surely whatever your portion of worldly possessions may be, you have reason to lift up your hands to heaven with wonder and gratitude, and to say, The lines are fallen to us in pleasant places, yea, we have a goodly heritage.

Nor is this all: There are many around you who have shared in such advantages as these, and have sinfully abused them, to the dishonour of God, to the grief of their parents, and to their own danger, and perhaps their ruin. And why are not you in that wretched number? or who maketh thee to differ from them? Why are not your hearts barred against the entrance of a Redeemer, but because the Lord has opened them? Why were not all the good instructions which have been given to you, like seed sown upon a rock, but because God gave the increase? Adore the riches of this distinguishing grace.

And let me earnestly exhort you, that you be careful still further to improve it. Give me leave to say, that these fair openings of early seriousness do naturally raise a very high expectation of eminent advances in religion. Let it be your humble and diligent care, that these expectations be answered; that your goodness may not be like the morning cloud, or the early dew, which soon goeth away; but rather like the dawning light, which shines brighter and brighter till the perfect day.

Whilst Providence continues these holy parents to whom you have been so highly indebted, let it be your constant care, by all the most cheerful returns of duty and gratitude, to express your regards to them, and your sense of so great an obligation. And I will add, let it be your care to hand down to future ages those important advantages you have received from them.

One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh. It is highly probable that in a few years numbers of you will be conducted into new relations; and we please ourselves with the hope, that you will carry religion and happiness into rising families. Let not those hopes be disappointed. When God fixes you in houses of your own, let it be your first concern to erect there such domestic altars, as those at which you have worshipped with such holy pleasure, and sensible tokens of divine acceptance. Let the sacred treasure of divine knowledge, which has been deposited with you, be faithfully delivered down to your descendants; that they, in their turn, may arise with the same pious zeal, to transmit it to another generation, that shall be born of them.

And may divine grace, that inexhaustible spring of the most valuable blessings, sweetly flow on to add efficacy to all, that real vital religion may be the glory and joy of every succeeding age; till this earth (which is but a place of education for the children of God, during their minority) shall pass away to make room for a far nobler scene and state of existence; where pious parents and their religious offspring shall for ever enjoy the most delightful society, inhabiting the palace of our heavenly Father, and surrounding the throne of our glorified Redeemer! Amen.

SERMONS

TO YOUNG PERSONS.

DEDICATION.

To the Young Persons belonging to the Dissenting Congregations at Hinckley, Harborough, and Kibworth in Leicestershire, and at Ashley, and Northampton.

My dear Brethren and Friends,

At length, after a long and unexpected delay, I offer to your perusal a few sermons which I promised the public some years ago; all which some or other of you heard, and in which you are all concerned.

It is not material to tell you on what account I have laid by some, which I had transcribed for your service, and which you probably expected to have seen with these. I have substituted in their room such, as I thought might, by the divine blessing, be most useful to you.

I hope you will peruse them with candour; and the rather, considering they were prepared for the press chiefly in some broken moments, while I was on journeys, or in some fragments of time at home, often taken from my sleep; as the stated duties of my calling require an attendance, which will not allow of any long interruption. You would readily excuse what defects you may discover in them, if you knew that tender concern for your present and future happiness, by which every sermon, and every page, has been dictated. They have often been mingled with prayers and with tears; and my heart is so full of affection to you, that it is with great difficulty that I forbear enlarging, more than the proper limits of such an address will admit.

As for you, my Leicestershire friends, amongst whom my ministry was opened, and the first years of it were delightfully spent, I cannot forget, and I hope you have not forgotten, that intimate and pleasing friendship with which we were once almost daily conversing; the sweet counsel we have often taken together in private, as well as the pleasure with which we have gone to the house of God in company. All these sermons, but the second and fifth of them, were first drawn up for your service, and preached to you; and much of that tenderness for you, which gave birth to them, has been rising afresh in my mind while I have been taking this review of them. I hope they were not then like water unprofitably spilt on the ground, and that the perusal of them may revive impressions made by the first hearing. Intermediate years have introduced new scenes; and some of us who were then in the morning of life, are now risen up to the meridian of it. Providence has conducted many of you into new relations; and it is my pleasure to observe, in how honourable and useful a manner several of you are filling them up with their proper duties.

While you are yourselves instances of the happy consequences which attend a religious education, I hope you will be singularly careful, that your descendants may share in the like advantages; and I shall heartily rejoice, if these sermons, or those I have formerly published, may be of any assistance to you in those pious cares. God has put an early period to the lives of some, who, when I was amongst you, were the growing hopes of the respective congregations to which they belonged. Several of them have died while these sermons were transcribing. May the thought quicken you in the improvement of so uncertain a life; and may divine grace render some things, peculiarly intended for the use of those who are now beyond the reach of such an address, serviceable to others, into whose hands they may fall!

I greatly rejoice in the goodness of God to you, in setting over you such able and faithful shepherds, as those worthy ministers of Christ, under whose care you now are; and I heartily pray, that you and they may long be spared, as comforts to each other, and as blessings to the church. Though I am providentially separated from you, may I still hear that you walk worthy of the Lord; and may every advancing year and revolving day of life, ripen us more for that happiness, which we hope ere long to share with each other, in the house of our heavenly Father!

If any of you, who were once my care and my hope, have now forsaken the ways and the God of your fathers, and turned aside to the paths of licentiousness and folly, I now repeat the admonitions which I have formerly given you, that these things will, to you above all others, be bitterness in the end. And I entreat you, that if you have any little regard still remaining, for one to whom some of you have professed not a little, you would at least attentively peruse the sixth of these discourses, as containing reflections, which must, sooner or later, pierce your hearts with penitential remorse, or everlasting despair. O that divine grace might concur with it to prevent your ruin, and might give me to see you as wise, as religious, and as happy, as those excellent parents once wished you, whose eyes are now closed in the dust; whose precepts and examples, charges and tears, you seem long since to have forgotten!

As for you, my dear friends, here at home, I have the pleasure of conversing so often with you, that it is the less necessary now to address you at large. Yet it is but justice to you thus publicly to declare, that, amidst all that goodness and mercy which has followed me all my days, there is no providence which I more gratefully own, than that which brought me hither; nor does any thing contribute more to make my ministry here comfortable, than the spirit of seriousness which discovers itself in many young persons amongst us. O that it were as universal, as in some it is amiable and exemplary! Permit me to remind you, that, as your remarkable importunity was the consideration, which turned the scales for my coming hither, after they had long hovered in uncertainty, so you are under some peculiar obligations to study the ease and comfort of my life, which you can never so effectually secure, as by the holy regularity of your own. Our aged friends are dropping away apace; nay, the graves have swallowed up many, very many, of your own age, who, but a few months ago, promised long and extensive usefulness here. It is you that are to comfort me under these sorrows. I can solemnly say, that I had much rather be numbered amongst them, than live to see the glory of practical religion lost in this society, while it is under my care. Remember that, under God, you are its support; and remember, that the high hopes you have given me, would make a disappointment sit so much the heavier upon my heart.

But I will not conclude with any thing so uncomfortable, as the mention of a disappointment from you; but rather with recommending you, and those to whom I have formerly stood in the like relation, to the care of Christ, the great Shepherd of the sheep, and to the influence of that gracious Spirit, who can cause you to grow in knowledge and piety like the grass, and like willows by the water-courses. A generous friend* is intending some of you a present of that course of sermons, which I am now preaching on the power and grace of Christ, and the evidences of his glorious gospel; and it much sweetens the labour of preparing them for the press, to reflect, that they are in part intended for your service. I hope you will not forget to pray for all that appear concerned for your spiritual edification, and eternal happiness, and more especially for

Your most affectionate and faithful friend and servant,

Northampton, December 30th, 1734. P. DODDRIDGE.

SERMON V.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE RISING GENERATION.

PSALM xxii. 30, 31.

A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation. They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness to a people that shall be born, that he hath done this.

IT is a very beautiful saying of an ancient Jewish writer,† which has its parallel amongst some of the finest of the heathen poets,‡ that "as of the green leaves on a thick tree, some fall, and others grow; so of the generations of flesh and blood, one cometh to an end, and another is born." In this respect the resemblance is obvious; but there is another, in which it will not always so evidently hold. We perceive not any remarkable difference between the leaves of one year and of another: they which open at the return of the spring, are commonly as large and fair as those which the preceding winter had destroyed. But it has been matter of long lamentation, that the children of men are continually sinking into deeper and deeper degeneracy. Solomon denies not that the former days were better than the present, when he cautions against too curious an inquiry into the reasons why such an alteration was permitted: and those who know little else of the most celebrated writers of antiquity, can quote their complaints on this melancholy occasion. They can tell you that Homer§ observed, "that children are seldom better, but frequently worse, than their parents;" and they often repeat that lively and comprehensive acknowledgment of Horace: ‖ "Our fathers, who fell short of the virtues of their ancestors, have produced us a generation worse than themselves; and our children will be yet more degenerate than we."

These complaints and forebodings have been borrowed by every age since they were published, and are to this day borrowed by us, as what we imagine more applicable to ourselves than to those who wrote them, or to any who have already cited them. I will not say there is universal cause for such an application: but I am sure the face of affairs in many families, and may I not add, in many churches too, is abundantly sufficient not only to excuse, but to vindicate it.

In the midst of this mournful survey, the heart of every pious Israelite will tremble for the ark of the Lord, and he will be ready to say, perhaps with an excess of solicitude and of anguish, "What will the end of these things be? Surely God will utterly abandon those who so basely desert him in contempt of the clearest revelation of his gospel, and the most engaging or awakening calls of his providence. The very memory of religion will at length be lost; and when the Son of man cometh he will not find faith on the earth."

Now there seems to be something in the very sound of the text which may relieve our minds under these gloomy apprehensions. A seed shall serve him, it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation: they shall come and declare his name to a third succession; a people who shall be born of them. Here is an evident promise or prediction, that the knowledge and the fear of God should be propagated from one age and generation to another: and this must be an agreeable assurance, whatever the particular occasion were on which it was introduced. Were this psalm to be considered only as relating to the calamities of David, and the wonderful deliverance which God wrought out for him, the words before us might be improved for our own consolation on the justest principles of analogy; for if a temporal salvation granted to him were to make so deep and so lasting an impression on distant nations, and on future ages, how reasonably might the like effects be expected from that infinitely more important and extensive salvation, which is exhibited to us in the everlasting gospel?

But after all, the application of this passage of scripture to the purposes for which I have alleged it, does not depend on so long a train of consequences; for if we attentively peruse this psalm, and diligently survey the distress and glory which are described in the several parts of it, we must be obliged to confess, that a greater than David is here. It contains a most lively and sublime prophecy of the sufferings of the Messiah, and the exaltation with which they were to be rewarded;* and particularly mentions the calling of the Gentiles in his church, and the propagation of his religion to future ages.† All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee; all they who are fat upon the earth, i. e. (by a usual Hebraism) persons of eminent rank and in plentiful circumstances,‡ shall eat and worship, i. e. they shall pay their public homage to him, and enter themselves solemnly into his covenant, as the Jewish votaries did by eating of the sacrifices which were offered to him: and, on the other hand, those that go down to the dust, i. e. who are in the most indigent circumstances, shall bow before him,§ even he that cannot keep alive his own soul,‖ who is so poor that he wants the necessaries of life; as if it had been said, there shall be a universal submission to him, in which the greatest and meanest shall concur. And the text assures us, that his triumphs shall be as lasting, as extensive: A future seed shall serve him; they shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation; i. e. being brought to the knowledge and the profession of the true religion, they shall be owned by God as his people: and it shall be their pious care, to declare this glorious display of his righteousness¶ to a people who shall be born of them, that he has done this; that it is the hand of God which has wrought out this great salvation. And though there are not many generations mentioned here, yet other scriptures assure us, that the kingdom of the Messiah is to be of perpetual duration, and consequently that such promises as these are to be taken in their utmost extent. In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace, so long as the moon endureth: his name shall endure for ever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him.

Upon the whole, then, it appears, that the words of the text are a prophecy, that the kingdom of Christ shall be perpetual, and extend itself to the latest generations, as well as the remotest climates: and, through the divine goodness, we must acknowledge, that this day is this scripture in part fulfilled among us. We dwell in a country which, with regard to Judea, lay at the ends of the earth, and which was long overrun with barbarity and idolatry; yet we are now instructed in the knowledge of the God of Israel, and are this day assembled for his worship; so that at the distance of more than two thousand years from the publication of this prediction, we are the living witnesses of its truth; being ourselves a seed who profess to serve the Lord, and accounted to him for a generation.

I hope it is the concern of many of us, that the concluding words may be fulfilled in those who come after us; that his gospel righteousness may so be declared to them, that they likewise might be engaged to serve the Lord, not only in the external forms of the true religion, but with the affections of the heart, and the obedience of the life.

That this concern may be more deep, more active, and more universal, it will be the business of my present discourse, to represent to you at large the importance of the rising generation. And here I would aim, not merely at the demonstration of a speculative truth, which may leave your minds as cold and as irregular as it found them; but I would labour, by the divine assistance, to possess you with such a sense of the case, as may have a powerful influence on your temper and behaviour; that so our meditations on this excellent promise may, through the concurrence of God, be the means of its more complete accomplishment.

I am now particularly concerned, that you, my younger brethren, may be impressed with what I say: I shall therefore address myself directly to you, and endeavour to show how important and desirable it is, that you be early tinctured with a sense of religion, and heartily engaged in the service of God.

May the Spirit of God, in the mean time, so speak to your hearts, as that life and energy might be added to those convictions which, I am confident, your reason will not be able to oppose!

Now I would entreat you, on this occasion, seriously to consider the importance of your character and behaviour, with regard both to yourselves and others.

I. Nothing can be of greater importance, with regard to yourselves, than your being early engaged in the service of God.

It is a consideration, which equally concerns you, and others of a more advanced age, that religion is, generally speaking, the surest way we can take to be happy in this world, and, through the merits and righteousness of a Redeemer, the only way to glory in another; so that, as the apostle expresses it, godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

Its tendency to promote our present comfort and happiness, will abundantly appear from the influence it has on our external circumstances, and on the temper of our minds. As to the former of these, I might enlarge on its beneficial effects, with regard to health and reputation, estate and friendship; and as to the latter, nothing is more obvious than that it tends to secure the tranquillity and the pleasure of the soul, as it either suppresses or moderates, those turbulent passions which throw it into anguish and confusion, while it gives abundant exercise to those which are most sweet and delightful. Such is the immediate blessedness of the man who feareth the Lord, and delighteth greatly in his commandments. And whosoever reflects on the evidence with which each of these particulars is attended, must acknowledge, that the ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

To complete the argument, it is to be considered, that these pleasant and peaceful paths lead up to the paradise of God; for invariable truth and goodness has engaged, that to them who, by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, he will render eternal life.

On the other hand, if you go on in the neglect of God and religion, it is very possible you may be undone for this world, as thousands have been, by debauchery and folly: or, under some restraints of common prudence, which may secure you from that, if you do not violently overbear the voice of conscience, it will often disquiet and torment you by its remonstrances and expostulations; till in a little time death will remove you to the seats of horror, where the worm never dies, and the fire is never quenched. For God has solemnly declared, that he will render indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, to every soul of man that doeth evil; when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those that know not God, and obey not the gospel.

Are not the youngest of you concerned in such declarations as these? And if you are, let conscience say, whether they are to be despised? It evidently appears the question is this: Shall you spend your days upon earth like rational creatures, in the noblest enjoyment of God and of yourselves, till you rise to the glories and pleasures of the heavenly world? or shall you live like idiots and like brutes, in the amusements of a vain imagination, and the indulgence of the meanest appetites, till you sink for ever under all the shame and remorse of a polluted guilty mind, and the almighty vengeance of an incensed God? And can you be so stupid as to imagine this question will bear a debate, or that any of the little interests of time and sense are to be regarded, while these things are forgotten? Surely I may say, with the utmost propriety, as Moses to the children of Israel, I have this day been setting before you life and death, a blessing and a curse, choose which shall be your portion; but make the choice as those that remember, it is not a vain thing for you, because it is your life.

"It is true," may you perhaps reply in your own minds, "these are solid arguments to prove, that religion is to be attended to, sooner or later; but it will not appear from them that it is peculiarly the concern of the rising generation." I answer, (as you have often heard me at large,) If it is to be regarded at all it should be regarded immediately; because all the futurity you presume upon is utterly precarious. The uncertainty of human life, and our entire dependence on that sacred Spirit, who is perfectly free in all his operations, concur to demonstrate, beyond all possibility of contradiction, the madness of delay; and the ruin of thousands bears testimony to it. I might add, that there are many peculiar advantages of early piety which render it vastly preferable to a late repentance, even supposing it were as certain as it is dubious: but I shall not enter into the enumeration of them now, since I intend them for the subject of a distinct discourse.* What I have already said may be sufficient to convince you, if you allow yourselves to reflect, that your own present and future happiness is apparently concerned in the case before us. I add,

II. That it is of great importance to the happiness of others, that you of the rising generation be early tinctured with a sense of religion, or, in the language of the text, be a seed who shall serve the Lord.

And here I would show at large,—that the happiness of all who converse with you may be considerably influenced by your character and behaviour;—that the comfort of your pious parents and ministers is peculiarly concerned in it;—and that the propagation of religion to them who are yet unborn, does, under God, most evidently depend upon you.

1. The happiness of all who converse with you will be considerably influenced by your character and behaviour.

They who have any sense of religion themselves will be tenderly concerned for your happiness. They will rejoice to see you going on in those ways which must certainly lead to it; and they will be heartily grieved to see you choosing your own misery, and rejecting the counsel of God against yourselves. And others of a humane and generous temper, though destitute of the principles of true piety, will be solicitous for the honour, the comfort, and the usefulness of your lives.

But besides this pleasure or uneasiness which will redound to such persons in consequence of these friendly and benevolent sentiments, you ought to consider, that all who converse with you may find their happiness increased or diminished, by your regard to religion, or your neglect of it, as your behaviour to them will be influenced by it.

If you be early delivered into the mould of the gospel, you will quickly learn that you were not born for yourselves. The mercies of God, and the example of a Redeemer, will teach you to exert yourselves to the utmost for the service of mankind, and to do good to all as you have opportunity. And in how many instances may your pious and charitable cares be effectual for the benefit of your fellow-creatures! In the series of life how many in the depths of poverty may be relieved by your liberality! How many in perplexed and intricate circumstances may be guided aright by your prudent counsel! How many weeping eyes may be dried, and how many mourning hearts revived, by your tender sympathy and friendly condolence! And if there be already in your natural temper a tendency towards such expressions of humanity, how happily may it be directed and enlivened, when divine and evangelical motives are brought in to its assistance!

But further, your Christian charity will teach you to be, above all things, solicitous for the spiritual and eternal happiness of those about you. And who can say, how much you may promote it! How many more aged Christians may be excited to shake off their indolence, and quicken their pace when they observe your ardency and zeal! And how happily might your piety tend to awaken, and reclaim those, who are going on in the paths of the destroyer: how amiable would the graces of Christianity appear, as exemplified in you, amidst all the insnaring allurements of childhood and youth! And how affecting might it be to other young people, to hear religion recommended to them, not only by their parents and ministers, but by their brethren and companions!

Thus useful might you be in your earliest years, and as you were advancing in age and experience, your usefulness might be daily increasing: and if God should spare you to the decline of life, you might bring forth much nobler fruits in old age, than you could have done, if your entrance on a religious life had been deferred to that unseasonable time.

Thus may the whole period of your life be filled up with eminent service. And I will add, that your beneficial influence may extend far beyond the circle of your personal converse: you may be blessings to your country, indeed to the whole world, by drawing down the favour of God upon it, in part, as a crown of your piety, and an answer to your prayers. But,

On the contrary, if you neglect religion, you will deprive the world of all those benefits, which it may otherwise expect from you. If you are naturally covetous, you will probably indulge that unworthy temper, so as to withhold relief from those to whom it is most justly due: or if you be of a liberal disposition, your generosity will degenerate into prodigality; or perhaps you will squander away so much of your estates in vanity and debauchery, as to throw yourselves out of a capacity of assisting those, whom you most sincerely pity, and would gladly relieve. And as to the eternal happiness of others, it is not to be imagined that you will have any regard to it while you are negligent of your own.

* Mr. Jennings's excellent sermon on this subject, amongst his other discourses to young people, has prevented the publication of the sermon here referred to. I hope my young friends will furnish themselves with those condescending and useful pieces, if there be any of them that have not yet done it.

Nor is this the worst: for, as hardly any are mere ciphers in life, it is much to be feared, that instead of blessings you may prove mischiefs to the world. The licentiousness to which corrupt nature will prompt you, may lead you by unthought-of consequences, to injure and defraud, as well as to grieve and torment, others. And where your behaviour is most friendly, it may be most pernicious. Instead of restoring and reclaiming the souls of your companions, you may pervert and destroy them by sinful discourses and impious examples. Thus you may draw down the vengeance of God on the places where you live, and provoke him to send some public calamity, as a punishment, for that universal degeneracy which you have abetted. So that (to close the melancholy scene) at the bar of God, and in the seats of torment, you may meet with multitudes of unhappy creatures, who will cry out on you, as the fatal cause of their ruin in this world, and their condemnation in that.

By such a variety of arguments does it appear, that the happiness of those you converse with will be considerably influenced by your temper and conduct. And are you so utterly lost to all sentiments of honour and goodness, as to be unconcerned at such a consideration as this? Again,

2. The comfort and happiness of your religious parents does, in a great measure, depend on your seriousness and piety.

What I have just been saying on the former heads, will evidently prove the truth of this observation. Your pious parents have a generous concern for the happiness of others, and this will engage them earnestly to wish, that you may be blessings, and not curses, to the world about you. And their peculiar affection for you must tenderly interest them in a case, on which your happiness, both in time and eternity, depends.

If they see you under the influences of early piety, unknown pleasure will arise in their minds: they will rejoice in it, not merely as it will be a security to them of a respectful and grateful treatment from you; but as it will, through grace, secure to you, their dear offspring, the entertainments of a religious life, and the prospects of a glorious immortality.

These reflections will give them inexpressible pleasure in a variety of circumstances. Their daily converse with you will be more agreeable to them than it could otherwise be, when they discern the lively impressions of religion upon your spirits, and perceive that you have a relish for those truths and promises of the gospel, which are their joy and song in the house of their pilgrimage. It will sometimes add a sweetness to the social exercises of devotion, to think that your souls are engaged with theirs, and regaled with the same sublime and transporting entertainments. And when they have reason to apprehend that you are retired for the duties of the closet, it will cheer their hearts to think, "Now is my child with his heavenly Father. Now has he separated himself from those vain amusements, which most of the same age pursue, that he may converse with God and his own soul, and be prepared for the business and the pleasures of heaven. And I hope, God is smiling upon him, and teaching him, by happy experience, that those pious labours are not in vain."

With such consolations will their hearts be supported in all the occurrences, which Providence may allot, either to you or them. If they meet with prosperity in their worldly affairs, and have a prospect of leaving you in plentiful circumstances, it will be a satisfaction to them to think, that they shall not consign their estates to those who will meanly hoard up the income of them, or throw it away in foolish and hurtful lusts; but to persons who will consider themselves as the stewards of God, and will endeavour to use what he has given to them for the honour of their Lord, and the good of mankind. Or, if they can give you but little, this thought will relieve them, that they commend you to the care of a Guardian and a Father, who is able abundantly to supply your necessities, and who has engaged, by the promises of his covenant, that those who fear him shall want no good thing. They will have the pleasure to think, that, how low soever your outward condition may be, you will be rich in grace, and in the entertainments of religion now, and in the glories of the heavenly inheritance at last. When they are themselves sinking under the decays of nature, their vigour and cheerfulness will be renewed in yours: or should yours be impaired by an afflictive providence, they will have the satisfaction of believing, that those afflictions proceed from a divine love, and shall at length turn to your advantage. It will revive their hearts in their dying moments to think, that when they are sleeping in the dust, you will stand up in their places, and support the interest of God in the world, with a fidelity and zeal perhaps superior to theirs. Or if an afflictive stroke should take you away before them, they will not mourn over your grave as those that have no hope. Faith will teach them to mingle praises with their tears, while it assures them, that though dead to them, you are living with God in glory: that you are preferred to an attendance on his throne above, where they may hope shortly to meet you on the most advantageous terms.

This is but a faint and imperfect description of the satisfaction which your parents would find in your early piety. And it follows from hence, as a necessary consequence, that if they see you grow up in the neglect of religion, it will pierce their hearts with proportionable sorrow.

It is possible that you may arrive at such a daring degree of wickedness, as to treat them with negligence and contempt, or perhaps to answer all their melting expostulations with insults and rage. Such ungrateful and rebellious monsters we have heard of; and would to God that every parent in this assembly could say that he had only heard of them! But should you preserve some sense of humanity and decency; nay, should you behave towards them in the most dutiful and obliging manner, yet they must still mourn over you; and even your tenderness and complaisance to them would sometimes come in to add a more sensible anguish to their affliction. It would cut them to the heart to think that such dear, and in other respects amiable, children, were still the enemies of God, and the heirs of destruction. When they heard the vengeance of God denounced against sinners, and read the awful threatenings of his word, they would tremble to think that those terrible thunders were levelled against you. How little could they rejoice in that health or plenty which they saw you were abusing to your aggravated ruin! And how would they be terrified, when any distemper seized you, lest it should be the messenger to bear you away to eternal misery! If they were themselves dying, how mournfully must they take their leave of you, in an apprehension of seeing you no more till the day of accounts, and seeing you then in ignominy and horror at the left hand of the Judge! Or if they saw you removed by an early death, to what hopeless sorrows would they be abandoned! With what unknown agonies would they adopt that pathetic lamentation of David, O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom, would to God I had died for thee! O Absalom, my son, my son!

By such a variety of considerations does it appear, that the comfort and happiness of your pious parents does very much depend upon your temper and behaviour. And the argument is confirmed by the repeated testimony of the wisest of men, under the influences of the divine Spirit. He tells us again and again, that a wise son maketh a glad father; that whoso loveth wisdom rejoiceth his father; and that the father of the righteous shall greatly rejoice; and he that begetteth a wise child shall have joy of him. On the other hand, he tells us, that a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother. And though the tenderness of her sex may make the mother peculiarly sensible of the affliction, yet it is not confined to her; for he tells us elsewhere, that a foolish son is a grief to his father, as well as bitterness to her that bare him; yea, a foolish son is the calamity of his father. And once more, he that begetteth a fool does it to his sorrow; and the father of a fool has no joy; for the wickedness of his son impairs his relish for the other enjoyments of life.

Such a multitude of passages to the same purpose, seem intended to teach us the importance, as well as the certainty, of the argument. And it is more than hinted at in those remarkable words, My son, if thy heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, even mine.* As if he had said, make a serious pause, and diligently weigh the importance of that thought, that thy piety will be an inexpressible joy to me, thy father. And then, as if that were not enough, it is immediately added, Yea, my reins also shall rejoice (shall feel unutterable pleasure diffusing itself through all the secret recesses of my soul) when thy lips speak right things, which may manifest a heart under the influence of prudence and of religion.

And let me entreat you, my friends, to reflect for a few moments on the weight of the argument, that you may judge whether it will not bear all the stress which Solomon lays upon it. The happiness of your parents is in question; and can you slight that? Consider how much you owe to your parents, as they were the instruments of your being, and have been, under God, the principal support of it. Think of the tenderness with which they watched around your cradles, and of the many kind offices which they performed for you in your helpless infancy; which parental tenderness made delightful to them, when hardly any thing else could have made them tolerable. Think how liberally they have long contributed towards the supply of your wants; and in how many instances they have denied themselves that they might gratify you. Think how they have rejoiced with you in your joys, and mourned with you in your sorrows; how they have been terrified at your real dangers, and perhaps often disquieted with those timorous apprehensions which fondness rather than reason has suggested to them. And under the impression of such reflections, say, whether it may not reasonably be expected that you should have a most affectionate regard to their repose and comfort, and think with horror of becoming their grief and their torment.

I may add, that as the parents of some amongst you are declining under the infirmities of age, and on that account the objects of a respectful compassion to all, they should be so especially to you who are their children; for it may be, these infirmities have been hastened upon them by an excess of tenderness and concern for you. And will you add afflictions to the afflicted, and bring down with sorrow to the grave those venerable hoary heads, which you have perhaps made gray before their time! Surely you must abhor the thought, or God and man must abhor you.

* Prov. xxiii. 15. See the like emphatical form of speech, ver. 24, 25.

But I would not entertain so harsh a suspicion. I charitably hope, that you are not only impressed with this consideration, but will likewise be somewhat concerned, when you hear,

3. That the comfort and happiness of faithful ministers will be greatly affected by the character of the rising generation.

St. John assures the elect lady, that he rejoiced greatly when he found her children walking in the truth; and a variety of arguments concur to prove, that no pious minister can be indifferent in the case before us.

If we have any thing of humanity and generosity in our tempers, we must be concerned for your seriousness, on account of that influence which it has on the happiness of all about you, and particularly on that of your Christian parents. Many of them are the ornaments and glory of our assemblies, and the most dear and intimate of our friends; we are obliged therefore to take part with them in their sorrows and their joys, with relation to you their children. It must sensibly afflict us to see, that while their wisdom and their piety might command the reverence and the love of all that know them, enemies should arise up against them out of their own houses, and even the children of their bowels should prove their tormentors. Those dear children, from whom they fondly promised themselves the delight and support of their declining years. And when they come and tell us the tender story, when they freely open to us their sorrows and their fears on your account, and earnestly beg our prayers for you, that whatever they suffer, you may not be for ever undone, we are hardly able to stand it; but nature, as well as religion, teaches us to echo back their sighs, and to return their tears.

Thus we are concerned for the rising generation, as we sympathize with those whose happiness is apparently affected by it: but besides this, you may easily apprehend, that much of the comfort of our lives does immediately depend upon it. And this will be peculiarly obvious with regard to those of us who are in our younger years, and are entering on the work of God amongst you.*

Should God spare us to future years, we must expect to survive many of our aged friends; and when your parents are gone, whither must we look for the comfort of our remaining days, but to you their children? And must it not wound us to the heart, to see a generation of vipers rising up, instead of those pious friends, with whom we have taken sweet counsel together, and gone to the house of God in company? Can we easily bear to see the temples and altars of God forsaken, or to see them attended only by wretched hypocrites, who bear the form of godliness, while they are strangers and enemies to the power of it? Must we lose the pleasure of addressing you in public, as true Christians, on the most comfortable and joyful subjects of discourse; and be obliged continually to speak to you in thunders, as those who have no right to the consolations of the gospel? Or must we never have the satisfaction of conversing with you in private, as our brethren in the Lord, and our companions in the way to heaven?

Well might it grieve us to be thus left alone in the midst of a degenerate world; especially when we reflect, that the cause of God was sinking in the time of our administration, and serious religion was lost amongst us, whilst the cultivation of it was committed to our care. Shall we not be suspected of unfaithfulness to God, and to you, if it die in our hands? That were dreadful indeed. May the divine grace preserve us from that guilt! And I trust, my brethren, that it will preserve us; and, in dependence upon that, I plainly tell you, that while God continues us in a capacity of doing it, we will honestly warn you, we will seriously expostulate with you, we will earnestly pray for you; and if it be all in vain, we will appeal to an omniscient God, that your destruction is not chargeable upon us, but upon yourselves.

But in the mean time, it would be dreadful to reflect, that while we are thus endeavouring to deliver our own souls, we are in effect heaping aggravated damnation on yours; while every attempt is resisted by you, and so brings you under a greater load of guilt. You may indeed be insensible of the load now, but we foresee the day when you will sink under it. And here is the accent of our sorrow: in such views as these we fear, that when the ministers of former generations shall appear before their Judge with a train of happy souls, which have been conducted to heaven by their means, it must be our melancholy part to stand out as witnesses against our hearers, that we have stretched out our hands all the day long to a disobedient and gainsaying people. Oh, how shall we be able to advance this dreadful testimony against the children of our dearest friends, against those whom we tenderly loved, and whose salvation we would have purchased with any thing but our own! Yet this is our prospect with regard to you; and we may leave it to you to judge, whether it must not sadden our souls.

Now pardon me, my friends, if I tell you, that we may reasonably expect, that an argument of this nature should not be despised. I hope it is no breach of modesty to say, that we have not deserved so ill at your hands, as that our joy, or our distress, should be indifferent to you. In all the common affairs of life we would cheerfully serve you to the utmost of our power, and therefore at least reasonably expect to stand on a level with the rest of your friends in like circumstances. And our character as ministers, if we be careful to answer it, gives us some peculiar claim to your regard. For you we give up many more splendid prospects in life, which, in other employments, we might possibly have secured; for you we lay out our time and our strength, in study, in prayer, and in preaching. We bear you upon our hearts in our public ministrations, and our private retirements; (and God is witness with what sincerity;) nor would we refuse those laborious services which, in human probability, might hasten upon us the infirmities of age, and the approach of death, if they might be the happy means of your conversion and salvation. And is this the reward of all our friendly care? to weaken our hands, to grieve our souls, and to behave in such a manner, that the more tenderly we love you, the more deeply we must be afflicted by you?

Many of you treat us with a great deal of humanity and decency; with the appearances of affection and esteem. You are ready to serve us in the common offices of friendship, and would express your resentment if you saw us injured, in actions, or in words. We thankfully acknowledge your goodness in such instances as these; but permit us to ask you, why you will not be so kind and so grateful to us, as to take care of your own souls, when nothing could oblige us more than such a care, and nothing can afflict us more than the neglect of them? Let me conclude this head with those pathetic words of the apostle, If there be any bowels and mercies, fulfil ye our joy. And let me entreat you to consider, once more,

4. That the propagation of religion to future generations does, under God, chiefly depend upon you.

For this reason the pious Israelites are represented as resolving to declare the wonderful works of God unto their children, that the generation to come might know them, even the children that should be born; that they might arise, and, in their turn, declare them unto their children, and so the entail might be carried on to the remotest ages.

Now, my brethren, it is evident, that the propagation of religion to succeeding generations does, humanly speaking, depend on you and others, who, with you, are entering upon life. If you are under the influences of serious godliness, you will carry them with you to the end of your days: and when God calls you into families of your own, it will be your desire that you and your houses may serve him. Family prayer and family instruction will be maintained; you will be teaching your children to know the Lord, and exhorting them to serve him, and praying for a blessing on those endeavours: and who knows what a remarkable blessing may attend them? Your children, under the impression of such an education, may be eminent for religion as you have been. They may be equally diligent in the care of their posterity, and God may favour them with equal success; and so there may be thousands of your remote descendants, who never saw you, nor perhaps heard of your name, who yet, under God, may owe their religion and their happiness to you. The prospect of it may now afford you sensible pleasure; and it is highly probable, that when they meet you in the regions of the invisible world, such an important obligation may engage them to treat you with peculiar respect and affection; as surely all other obligations will appear trifling, when compared with this.

On the other hand, if you neglect religion yourselves, it cannot be thought you will be much concerned to transmit it to others. You would hardly be at the pains to give them good instructions; supposing you much more capable of doing it than you can expect to be: or if you do attempt it, those instructions will be like to have little effect, when they are contradicted by the daily language of your example. Nay, it is possible you may arrive at such a height of wickedness, as directly to oppose practical godliness, and breed up your children in the contempt of it; which is often to be seen, even in this Christian country. And what do you think will become of such children as these? If you have been so wicked, notwithstanding all the restraints of a serious education, what will they be, who miss of the advantages you enjoyed, and must be exposed to numberless temptations from which you were free? Shall these be a seed to serve the Lord? Shall these be accounted to him for a generation? It might almost as well be expected, that a race of men should spring up in a desert, where no human creature ever appeared before them, as that true Christianity should be propagated in the world by the children of such an education.

And have you, after all, so utter an indifference to the honour of that Redeemer, into whose religion you were baptized, and whose name you bear, as that you could be contented it should be lost in the world? Was it for this, that the Son of God descended from heaven that he might publish the gospel covenant, and expired on the cross that he might establish it? Was it for this, that the pious labours of our ancestors have transmitted this religion to us through so many succeeding ages; and so many martyrs have sealed it by their sufferings, and their blood? Was it for this, that our sacred liberties have been so courageously asserted by the best of men, and almost miraculously defended by the hand of God? for this, that the precious entail should be cut off by us, and this invaluable treasure, the charge and the glory of so many former generations, should perish in our hands? that the name of Christianity should, for the future, be lost in the world; or, which is altogether as bad, that it should sink into an empty name, and a lifeless circle of unmeaning forms? Yet, humanly speaking, this must be the consequence, if you, and others of the rising generation, will not heartily engage in the interests of it.

Such a variety of arguments concur to prove the great importance of the rising generation. They are so plain and so weighty, that I cannot but think, that you, my brethren, to whom I have particularly applied them, are in your consciences convinced, that they are not to be disputed.

How that conviction should work, I have not time largely to show you; but if it be seriously and deeply impressed on your minds, you cannot long be at a loss for proper directions, among so many pious friends, and excellent books; especially if you consult the Scripture, and seek for the teachings of the blessed Spirit. To these assistances I heartily recommend you, and omitting many other reflections which would naturally arise, shall conclude my discourse with one which I shall immediately address to another part of my auditory.

REFLECTION.

How solicitous should we be in our endeavours for the religious improvement of the rising generation, since its character appears of so great importance!

We have all our concern in the thought, but I would peculiarly recommend it to those of you who are parents and masters, or have the education of youth under any other capacities: imagine not, my friends, that it is an inconsiderable charge which is lodged in your hands. Providence has intrusted to you the hopes and the fears, the joys and the sorrows, of many hearts, and of many families; future generations will have reason to applaud or detest your memory, as your present duty is regarded or neglected; and, which is infinitely more, the Father of the spirits of all flesh will require a strict account of those precious souls which he committed to your care.

It is not for me, at this time, to direct you at large as to the particulars of your duty with regard to them.* In the general, you will easily apprehend that some methods are to be taken to inform their minds with divine knowledge, and to impress them with an affecting sense of what they know. And if you find the work attended with great difficulty, I hope it will engage you thankfully to accept of the assistances of ministers, and other Christian friends, and earnestly to implore those communications of the Spirit, which are absolutely necessary to make them effectual.

* Something of this kind I have attempted in the "Sermons on the Religious Education of Children;" though I have there considered it under some distinct heads which occur here, though in a different manner, and in a different view.

And if God have any mercy in store for so sinful a nation as ours, we may humbly hope, that, in answer to our united supplications, he will revive his work amongst us in the midst of the years: and, according to the tenor of his promises, will pour out his Spirit on our seed, and his blessing on our offspring; so that they may spring up before him as the grass, and as willows by the water-courses: and calling themselves by the name of Jacob, and subscribing with their hands unto the Lord, may be acknowledged by him as a generation of his people. Amen.

SERMON VI.

CHRIST FORMED IN THE SOUL, THE ONLY FOUNDATION OF HOPE FOR ETERNITY.

GAL. iv. 19.

My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you.

IT was the unhappy case of Agrippa, that though almost, he was only almost, persuaded to be a Christian; and I fear it is now the case of many, and particularly of many young persons, who have enjoyed the advantages of a religious education. I believe it is difficult to find any amongst them, who have not been brought under some serious impressions betimes. With regard to the internal operations of the blessed Spirit, as well as external means, the morning of life is generally to them, in a peculiar sense, the day of their visitation; and they often seem to know it, and in some measure to improve it: but in too many instances, we find their goodness as the morning cloud, and as the early dew, which soon passeth away. The blossoms open fair and beautiful, and give a very agreeable prospect of the plentiful fruits of holiness in life; but too often, when storms of temptation and corruption arise, the goodly appearance is laid in ruins; the blossoms do, as it were, fall to the ground, and leave the tree blasted and naked; or at best only covered over with leaves of an external profession, which, however green and flourishing they may for the present be, will not at least secure it from being cut down and cast into the burning. Though they for a while had escaped the pollutions of the world through lust, they are afterwards entangled and subdued, and the consequence is, they prove a scandal to religion, and a discouragement to others, till, in the end, they bring aggravated destruction on themselves; so that on the whole, as the apostle most justly observes, it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than thus, after they have known it, to turn aside from the holy commandment.

This may be in a great measure owing to the mutability of human nature in general, and particularly to the levity and inconstancy of youth, in conjunction with the force of those temptations of life which continually surround and press upon them. Yet I apprehend this is not all, but that it is, in part, to be charged on something defective, even in their best days; on their resting in something short of real religion, and a true saving change. Solomon had seen reason to say, There is a way that seemeth right to a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death: and I believe every considerate person will be ready to own, that in order to prevent so fatal a delusion, and all the train of mischiefs which may follow upon it, great care should be taken in stating this important question; "What is the true and solid basis, on which we may securely ground our eternal hopes?" It is a question of the highest importance, and the most universal concern, both to the aged and the young; so that I trust I need not offer any apology for complying with the request of a pious and judicious friend, who recommended this subject to our consideration, at this time and on this occasion.

In prosecution of this design, I have made choice of these words of the apostle, which I have now been reading, and which may, without offering any violence to them, be very fairly and naturally accommodated to the present purpose.

It is plain from many passages in this epistle, that the great apostle, who had planted the Christian church among the Galatians, had reason to fear that many, who were by profession its members, were not sufficiently established in their holy faith. It is probable that he himself had an opportunity of making but a short stay amongst them: and partly through their own negligence and prejudices, and partly through the artful attempts of false teachers in the absence of St. Paul, they appear to have fallen into a set of notions, and a conduct, which tended not only to impair the glory, but to subvert the very foundation, of the gospel, and with it the foundation of their own eternal hopes. Of this the apostle does, in a very awful manner, admonish them. He tells them, in the very beginning of his epistle, that he marvelled that they were so soon removed from him that called them, (and from the principles he had taught them,) into another gospel. And afterwards he useth these very free and emphatical words: O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched or enchanted you, that you should not obey the truth? Are you so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, (having professed to embrace the gospel, and shown the appearances of some common zeal for it,) can you now hope to be made perfect by the flesh, or by the ritual and carnal observances of the Mosaic institution? Is it thus that you disgrace all you have done, and all you have borne for Christ? Have you then suffered so many things in vain? On the whole, he tells them, he was ready to apprehend that all the agreeable hopes he had once entertained concerning them would be buried in everlasting disappointment, and that it would appear he had bestowed on them labour in vain. Thus did he stand in doubt of them; and that doubt pierced his heart with the most tender concern, and brought upon him, as it were, a second time, those pangs of soul which he had felt on their account, when he saw them in all the ignorance and wickedness of their Gentile state. He was hardly more solicitous then, that they might be turned from dumb idols to the living God, than he was now, that they might give convincing evidences that Christ was formed in them, i. e. that they had cordially received and digested the gospel, and that their hearts were delivered into the mould of it; which it did not appear they were, while they were thus making void the grace of God, and the righteousness of faith, by adhering to the foolish and pernicious doctrine of the necessity of seeking their justification, in part at least, by the observations of the Mosaic law.

This seems to be the most natural sense of the words of the text, where such a latitude of expression is used, as the apostle elsewhere seems to study, on purpose to render his writings universally edifying and useful to them, whose particular circumstances in life are widely different from those of the persons to whom they were originally addressed.

As to the introductory words, "My little children," we cannot imagine they refer to the age of those to whom the apostle wrote. The evident design of them is, to express that kind of parental tenderness which he entertained for them, like that which a mother hath for an infant with which she travails in birth. "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, till Christ be formed in you."

It would be easy to multiply observations from the words. I might especially take occasion to show,—that it is possible, those that once seemed very hopeful, and still maintain an external profession, may appear, after all, in such dangerous circumstances, that judicious ministers, and other Christian friends, may be thrown into a great deal of perplexity and agony on their account; and that the great thing necessary to establish their safety, and the comfort of those concerned for them, is, that the Lord Jesus Christ be formed in them.

That I may more particularly illustrate and improve the text, and take in what is most important in these remarks, I will,

I. Consider several things on which men are ready to build a false confidence, which will bring them into danger, and their judicious friends into perplexity upon their account.

II. I will endeavour to show you what is the only solid foundation of their own hopes, and the joys of others with regard to them; which is here expressed by Christ formed in them. And then,

III. I shall conclude with some more particular improvement, in proper inferences from the whole.

These are plainly matters of universal importance; but as I am now peculiarly addressing myself to young persons, I shall endeavour to fix on those thoughts which may be most remarkably suitable to them; for I am much more concerned that my discourse may be useful, than that it may be critically regular and exact. I hope there are many amongst you, who are experimentally acquainted with the vitals of Christianity, and have received from above an incorruptible seed. There are others, to whom I must say with the apostle to these Galatians, I stand in doubt of you; and to such I hope I can apply myself in the language of the text, My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, till Christ be formed in you. Pardon me, if in this instance I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy. I would endeavour, with the sincerest and tenderest affection, and with such freedom as the importance of the case requires, to guard you against those sandy foundations, which will bury you and your hopes deep in eternal ruins; and to direct you to the rock of ages, on which they who build shall never be ashamed.

I therefore entreat your serious attention, and would humbly ask, both for myself and you, the teachings of that blessed Spirit, whose peculiar office it is, in the most efficacious manner, to show us our danger and our remedy; to aid the labouring minds of ministers, and to cause them to see with satisfaction the travail of their souls, while he gives to their hearers a new birth and immortal life, by forming Christ in them.

I. I am to caution you against several things on which young persons are peculiarly prone to build a false and precarious confidence.

And here let me particularly entreat you, as you love your souls, and value your eternal hopes,—that you trust not to the privileges of your birth,—or the rectitude of your speculations in matters of religion,—or the purity and frequency of your forms of worship,—or the warmth of your passions,—or the morality of your conduct; for none of these apart, nor even all of them united, can, according to the tenor of the gospel, be sufficient for your security and happiness.

1. Trust not to the privileges of your birth and education as the foundation of your eternal hopes.

You are, many of you, the seed of God's servants, perhaps for several succeeding generations. You may be ready to plead, that you were born in his house, that you were early devoted to him in baptism, and have been brought up in the most regular and conscientious manner; you have been surrounded with holy instructions and correspondent examples from your infancy; and repeated fervent prayers, both in the family and in secret, have been sent up to heaven on your account. These are indeed signal advantages, and you may justly rejoice in them; for in these respects you are the children of the kingdom: but rejoice with trembling, for our Lord hath told us, that it is more than a possible case, that the children of the kingdom may be cast out, and have their portion in outer darkness. The peculiar regard shown to the seed of Abraham may perhaps be abused by some of you, as an encouragement to those presumptuous hopes. But remember, that Ishmael was the son of Abraham, and Esau of Isaac; and yet neither the one nor the other inherited the blessing of his father. Remember that beautiful but dreadful parable, which presents a wretched creature in hell, that could cry, Father Abraham, and yet in vain added, have mercy upon me, and send me one drop of water to cool my tongue. Once more, remember those emphatical words of the Baptist, so expressly levelled against this arrogant presumption: Think not (says he) to say within yourselves, we have Abraham for our father; for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham: as if he should have said, "The promises made to those who are the children of Abraham, respect not merely them who are lineally descended from him, but those who are the heirs of his piety and his faith; for if God were to turn these stones into men, and to form them by his grace to a holy character and temper, such, though descended from no human parents at all, would, in the sense of the promise, be children of Abraham." And it were more reasonable to expect such a transmutation, than that God should acknowledge a generation of vipers as his people, because they were derived from holy ancestors. On the contrary, God directly assures us, that if the son of the most religious father forsake the way of virtue and holiness, and prove as the degenerate plant of a strange vine, in his trespass that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die. And surely herein the ways of the Lord are apparently equal; for it is most evident, that a long descent from God's people is a reproach and condemnation, rather than an honour, to those who abandon that good old way in which their ancestors have trod, and, as it were, cut off that entail of piety which has been the care and the glory of preceding generations.

2. Trust not to the regularity of your sentiments, in matters of religion, as the foundation of your eternal hopes.

So various are the workings of men's hearts, and the devices of Satan, that, if I mistake not, there are some that place their confidence in the strictness, and others in the latitude, of their religious opinions; but the one, and the other, will appear equally vain, when considered in the view now before us.

Some may possibly persuade themselves, that their condition is secure, because their sentiments are orthodox. They live perhaps in the midst of the unbelieving and profane, and see daily contempt and derision thrown upon the blessed gospel, or its most glorious peculiarities; but through the influence of a good education, or from some other principle short of true piety, they may nevertheless not only hold fast the faith once delivered to the saints, but even contend earnestly for it: nay, they are, perhaps, learned in the controversies of the times; and can indeed pronounce concerning them in a very rational and accurate manner.

If this, my friends, be the case with any of you, I congratulate you on the happiness of a well-informed judgment, but must caution you against mistaking it for a sanctified heart. The mystery of faith, as the apostle himself assures us, is to be held with a good conscience; and in vain do you profess to retain the one, while you make shipwreck of the other. As precious a treasure as the knowledge of the truth is, if you go no further than mere speculation, it will be to you "but as a talent of gold to a man sinking in the sea, which only serves to plunge him so much the deeper in ruin." *

There are others who err in the contrary extreme. Orthodox notions are their banter, rather than their confidence. They pride themselves in having broke the shackles in which others are confined, and in seeing through the mist in which multitudes have been perplexed. They are sensible, that many things which divide the world, are merely controversies about words; and are not much concerned about others in which there is a real difference, because they are well aware, that the fundamentals of religion lie in a very little room. They are confident of the innocency of error, and the safety of an honest mind under those mistakes which have been branded with the severest names. A wicked life is, in their esteem, the only dangerous heresy; and morality the only thing that is worth contending about; charmed with their own wisdom and happiness in this freedom of thought, they look down with pity on persons under the influence of a contracted education and narrow sentiments, and possibly mingle their pity with a great deal of scorn, not to say indignation. But they are indeed themselves the objects of much juster pity, if, whilst they glory in their freedom, they are the servants of corruption. It is certain, that the most generous speculations will no more save men of unregenerate hearts, and unholy lives, than the most rigid and severe set of notions. For notions and speculations are in their nature so far short of real goodness, that if there be nothing more than these, it matters but little what they are. Yet one cannot forbear observing a peculiar and most absurd inconsistency in the conduct of those, who think so highly of themselves, because they are possessed of this one speculation, that speculation in general is a trifle, and morality is all; as if the whole of morality consisted in bearing this testimony in its favour. I wish such a character were not almost as common, as it is for men to be bigots in defence of catholicism, and uncharitable in pleading the cause of charity. If this be the case with any of you, out of your own mouth must you be condemned; and we may justly apply to you, in the midst of your self-applauses, those awful words of our Lord; If ye were, in this respect, blind, ye would comparatively have no sin; whereas now you have no cloak, or excuse, for your sin.

3. Trust not in the external forms of devotion, as the foundation of your great hopes for eternity.

You are, it may be, joined to a society, which not only wears the Christian name, but separates itself from many other professors, under the apprehension, at least, of a more pure and Scriptural worship. You, perhaps, so much approve and esteem this worship, as to be diligent and constant in attending on the public exercises of it, not only in its stated returns, but on occasional opportunities. You fill your places here from time to time, not merely in obedience to the commands of your parents and governors, but by your own voluntary choice. And, it may be, to these you add the forms of family devotion morning and evening, and, possibly, a few moments of daily retirement for reading and prayer. What can such religious persons have to fear? Nay, rather, my brethren, what can you have to hope, if, while you draw near to God with your mouths and your lips, you remove your hearts far from him? If while you come before him, as his people come, and present yourselves in the posture of humble worshippers, your heart be going after your covetousness? God hath for ever confounded such vain presumption, by declaring, that the prayer of the wicked is an abomination to him; and that his shall certainly be so, that turns away his ear from hearing the law, i. e. that refuses obedience to it. The servant that knew his Lord's will, and did it not, became justly liable to be beaten with many stripes; and it is not to be wondered, if, in this sense, judgment begin at the house of God, and seize first on those who affront and profane his ordinances, by making them to supersede the very things which they were originally appointed on purpose to promote.

* Dr. Bates's Works, p. 948.

4. Trust not to the warmth of your passions in matters of religion, as the foundation of your most important hopes.

Some of you, to whom I now speak, have perhaps experienced very bitter agonies of conscience. You have been roused from the sleep of carnal security, as by an earthquake, which has shook the very centre of your soul; the flames of hell have seemed, as it were, to flash in your faces; and all these mingled horrors have compelled you to cry out, "Woe is me, for I am undone! oh, what shall I do to be saved?" And yet, to allude to the story of Elijah, the Lord hath not been in the earthquake, or in the fire. Consider to what purpose the inquiry after salvation hath been made, and with what resolution it hath been pursued; otherwise you may be fatally deceived. The murderers of Stephen were cut to the heart by his preaching; and we are sure that, if the most deep and terrifying convictions could have secured a man's salvation, the traitor Judas would have been safe, who undoubtedly felt the most violent convulsions of soul, before he proceeded to that dreadful extremity, which sealed him up under everlasting despair.

But you may have been impressed with the sweeter and the noble passions; you have not only trembled at the thunder of the law, but rejoiced in the message of gospel-grace: the news of a Redeemer has been welcome to your souls, and the feet of those messengers beautiful, that have come to publish peace in his name. You have, perhaps, been melted into tears of pleasure and tenderness, when you have heard the representation of his dying love; and when the precious promises, established by it, have been unfolded, and the prospects of eternal glory displayed, your minds have been elevated and transported; so that you have hung, almost with a trembling eagerness, on the lips of the speaker. I readily acknowledge, that such as these are frequently the workings of the blessed Spirit of God, upon the souls of his chosen people; and when found in a due connexion with the great effects they are designed to produce, are highly to be esteemed and rejoiced in. But remember, I entreat you, that every tear of tenderness, and every sally of joy, doth not arise from so divine a spring. You might weep at a mournful scene in a well-wrought tragedy, as you have done at the story of a Redeemer's sufferings; you might find yourselves transported with a fine poetical description of a Pagan elysium, or a Mahometan paradise, just as you have been with the views of a heavenly Canaan, which gospel ordinances have presented. Mere self-love might be the foundation of such a joy in the tidings of pardon and happiness, without the least degree of renewing and sanctifying grace; as it probably was in those hearers, represented by the stony ground, who immediately received the word with joy, but had no root, and so endured but for a while.

But, perhaps, you will say, you are confident it is not merely self-love in you, for you have often found your mind impressed with a grateful sense of the divine goodness; so that, when you own it before God in prayer, or converse with his saints on the copious and delightful subject, your souls flow forth in love to your great Benefactor, and you look up to him in the most thankful acknowledgments of his favours. If it be a gratitude that captivates the soul into a willing obedience, and engages you to yield yourselves living sacrifices to God, then is Christ formed in your souls, and you are not the persons to whom I would give the alarm: on the contrary, I would rather confirm your hopes, and rejoice with you in them. But if your gratitude does not rise to this; if it rest only in some tender emotion of mind, or some transient, external expression of that emotion, I must faithfully tell you, that I fear it is only a nobler degree of that natural instinct which causeth the ox to know his owner, and the ass his master's crib. To find your spirit in this manner impressed does indeed plainly prove that the day of your visitation is not entirely past; it proves you have not sinned yourselves into utter insensibility of soul; nay, it may possibly at length, through the communications of sanctifying grace, lead you on to real religion, and to eminent attainments in it: but at present it falls far short. I have often told you, (and one can hardly repeat it too often, or insist too earnestly upon it,) that there is a very wide difference between a good state and a good frame: and that religion is not seated either in the understanding or in the passions, but principally in the will; which in this disjointed state of human nature, is far from being always in a due harmony with either. So that, on the whole, those illuminations, or those affections, on which you are apt to lay so great a stress, are, perhaps, at best, but the preparatory workings of the Spirit upon your minds, which, if they are not improved aright, may leave you more hard, and more miserable, than they found you.

5. Trust not to the morality of your behaviour, as the foundation of your eternal hopes.

Morality is certainly a very excellent thing, and it were scandalous indeed for any professing Christian to pour contempt upon it. Wherever this is wanting, pretences to faith and Christian experience are not only vain, but insolent and detestable. He that committeth sin, is of the devil; and only he that doth righteousness is righteous: nor hath the grace of God ever savingly appeared to that man, through whatever uncommon scenes of thought he may have passed, who is not effectually taught by it to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly. But it will by no means follow from thence, that wherever there is a sober and virtuous conduct, such a soul is passed from death to life. If the whole of the gospel be wrapt up in the rules of morality, then is Christ dead in vain; or, at least, it is in vain that the notices of his death are published to us. Beware, I entreat you, of so pernicious an error. I think myself obliged more earnestly to caution you against it, because, while the devil is attempting, on the one hand, to engage some, under the specious pretences of an evangelical spirit, to turn the grace of God into wantonness, he seems to be insnaring others, by extolling the virtue which he hates, in order to lead them into a neglect of Christ, and his righteousness, and all the peculiarities of the gospel scheme of salvation; so that it is difficult on the whole to say, which of these devices is most destructive to the souls of men.

From my heart I rejoice to think, there are so many amongst you, my young friends, whose character in life is fair and unblemished. You escape the grosser pollutions of the world; you abhor brutal intemperance; you scorn the mean artifices of deceit, and renounce the hidden things of dishonesty; you honour your parents and subordinate governors; you treat the ministers of Christ with respect and esteem; you are affable and courteous in your behaviour to all: and, on this account, we behold you and love you; we hope, and conclude, you are not far from the kingdom of heaven. But, alas! if things rest here, you will never enter into it. All these things had the young man in the gospel observed from his youth; and many of you have seen, in a very large and beautiful representation, how lovely a youth was then perishing in sin.* He lacked one thing; and the lack of that was the ruin of his soul, as it will be of yours, if you are destitute of it.

I know, that they are especially in danger of being deceived here, who converse frequently with persons of an abandoned character; or who are themselves reformed from some gross irregularities, to which they were once addicted. Comparing themselves with others, or with themselves in a more licentious and corrupt state, they pronounce a favourable sentence, and conclude they are safe and happy: but let me entreat you, my friends, that you would rather compare your hearts and lives with that perfect law of God, which cannot be repealed; weigh yourselves in that balance, and see whether you are not found wanting there. Review even the upright conduct of these days of your reformation, and then say, whether there be such a redundancy of merit in them, as will not only answer present demands, but atone for your past offences too. You will soon be confounded on such a review; you will soon acknowledge, on an impartial examination, that the bed is shorter than a man can stretch himself upon, and the covering narrower than he can wrap himself in; that neither you, nor any living, can be justified by the works of the law.

I will conclude this head with observing, that the instance of the blessed apostle St. Paul serves to illustrate and confirm our discourse, in each of the particulars I have now mentioned. Had the privileges of birth and education been a sufficient security, Paul had been secure before his conversion to Christianity; for he was circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin; (which had not, like the rest, revolted from the house of David;) and by his mother's side, as well as his father's, a Hebrew of the Hebrews. If the exactest regularity in religious notions, or the strictest formality in the externals of worship, could have secured a man, Paul had been secure; for he was, as touching the law, a Pharisee; he lived according to the rigour of that sect, and, both with respect to doctrines and ceremonies, was exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the fathers. If a transport of passion in the cause of God could have secured a man, Paul had been secure; for, concerning zeal, or with regard to that, he persecuted the church, and wasted it beyond measure. And, lastly, if morality of behaviour could have done it, Paul had been secure; for, touching the righteousness which is by the law, he was blameless. In these things, he was once so weak, and so wretched, as to place a great deal of confidence; but when he was illuminated, and called by divine grace, he assures us, that what things were gain unto him before, those he counted loss for Christ, i. e. he most entirely renounced all dependence upon them. Yea doubtless, says he, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord. Which naturally leads me to the second general, where,

II. I am to consider, what will be a solid foundation for hope and joy when all these precarious dependences fail.

This is, with the utmost propriety, expressed in the text, by Christ formed in the soul; which is exactly parallel to that phrase in Colossians, Christ in you, the hope of glory, which is there mentioned as an epitome of the gospel, the riches of the glory of the mystery preached among the Gentiles. When Paul could see that the Galatians were brought to this, the pangs of his labouring mind would be ended, and joy and exultance would succeed; which is plainly intimated in the words of the text. And when you, my dear charge, are brought to it, parents and ministers may rejoice over you, and you will have an everlasting spring of hope and joy, a solid foundation, on which to build for eternity.

* Dr Watts's Serm. Vol. I. Ser. V. VI.

Permit me, therefore, a little more particularly to explain it to you; and let me entreat you to turn your thoughts inward, that you may judge whether you have been experimentally acquainted with the temper and change which I shall now describe, as signified by this remarkable expression in the text, Christ formed in you.

Now, I think, it implies these three things:—That some apprehensions of Christ have taken hold of the heart;—that the man is brought to an explicit choice of him, and deliberately enters into covenant with him: and that, in consequence of both these, something of the temper and spirit of Christ is by divine grace wrought in his soul. I will touch on each of these; but my time will not allow me to manage them in so copious and particular a manner as they well deserve.

1. To have Christ formed in the soul, supposes that some serious apprehensions of Christ have taken hold of the heart.

It evidently implies that the external revelation of him hath not only been admitted as a speculative truth, but attended to as a matter of the highest concern. Previous to the forming of Christ in the soul, there must be a conviction that we are naturally without Christ, and that in consequence of this we are in a most unhappy condition. And this conviction must strike deep upon the heart; for till the evil of sin be felt, what can make the news of a Saviour welcome? since, as he himself has declared, the whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. The man in whose heart Christ is formed, has seen himself condemned by God's righteous law; has seen himself equally unable to answer its demands, or to bear up under the execution of its penalties. And feeling this to be no light matter, but the very life of his soul, he has then been engaged with the greatest seriousness and earnestness to cry out, Woe is me, for I am undone! O what shall I do to be saved? I before told you, there may be these convictions and awakenings where Christ is never formed in the soul; and I now add, that the degree of them may be various, according to the various tempers and circumstances of different persons: but it is most evident that something of this kind must make way for the Redeemer's entrance, who comes to seek and to save that which was lost, to bind up the broken-hearted, and to give rest to the weary and heavy-laden. And I the rather insist on this, because I am fully persuaded, that slight thoughts of sin, and of the misery of our natural estate by it, have been the principal cause of all the infidelity of the present age, and are daily ruining a multitude of souls.

2. The formation of Christ in the soul does further imply, an explicit choice of him, and a deliberate entering into covenant with him.

When such a soul hears of a Redeemer, and of the way of salvation by him, exhibited in Scripture, it cordially approves the scheme, as entirely worthy of its divine author; and though corrupt nature raises up a thousand proud thoughts, in a vain and ungrateful rebellion against it, yet they are, by Almighty grace, subdued and brought into captivity. The man really sees such a suitableness and such an amiableness in the blessed Jesus, under the character in which the gospel reveals him, that he judges him to be the pearl of great price; and as God has laid him as the foundation-stone, he is, in that view, inconceivably precious to him. Far from contenting himself with applauding this plan, as regular, beautiful, and magnificent in general, the true believer is solicitous that he may have his own share in this edifice of mercy; and that, coming to Christ as a living stone, he may himself be one of those who shall on him be built up for a habitation of God through the Spirit. When he considers the Lord Jesus represented as standing at the door and knocking, it is with pleasure that he hears his voice, and opens to him, and, as Zaccheus did, receives him joyfully. He regards him as a nail fastened in a sure place, on which he can joyfully fix all his eternal hopes, infinitely important as he sees them to be. And while he thus anchors his soul on the righteousness, the atonement, and the intercession of a Redeemer, he humbly bows to his authority, as his Lord and his God. It is his desire to seat him on the throne of his heart, and, as it were, to put into his hand the sceptre and the sword, that all the powers of nature may be governed, and all the corruptions of it destroyed, by him. In a word, as he knows that Christ was given for a covenant to the people, he deliberately sets his seal to that covenant, thereby devoting himself to Christ, and, through him, to the Father. Such are his views, his purposes, and his engagements; and by divine grace he is enabled to be faithful to them. Which leads me to add,

3. When Christ is formed in any soul, something of the temper and character of the blessed Jesus is by divine grace wrought there.

I might with ease multiply scriptures in proof of the absolute necessity of this; but it is so obvious, that you must yourselves know, how expressly it is required. You know, how plainly St. Paul has told us, that if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his; and where this Spirit resides, Christ dwells in the heart. The same mind, or temper, is in such a one, as was also in Christ Jesus; and as he professeth to abide in him, it is his care so to walk, as Christ also walked. On which account the true Christian is said to have put on Christ, in allusion to the Hebrew phrase, of being clothed with any temper or affection, that greatly prevails or governs in the soul.*

* Thus we read of being clothed with righteousness, Job xxix. 14.

It is a very pleasing, as well as useful, employment, to trace the lineaments of the temper and conduct of Christ in his people. Our Lord is in a peculiar sense the Son of God; but his people are, through him, taken into the same relation: for they have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, though perhaps they were once subjected to it, but they have received the Spirit of adoption; and because they are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into their hearts, crying Abba, Father. By this Spirit a filial temper is wrought in their souls, by which their obedience to their heavenly Father is so animated, as to be most honourable and grateful to him, as well as most easy and delightful to themselves. Under the influences of this Spirit, the Christian desires it may be his character now, as he trusts it will be his happiness at last, to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; to follow that Jesus, who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. He is indeed deeply sensible, that it is impossible for him, as his Lord did, to fulfil all righteousness; and therefore, when he hath done all, he calls himself an unprofitable servant. Yet he seeth so much of the internal beauties of holiness, so much lustre and glory in the image of God, as drawn on the soul of man, that it is the great concern of his heart, and labour of his life, to pursue it. Nor would he only abstain from grosser enormities, and practise those virtues which are most honourable amongst men, and attended with the greatest secular advantage; but he would, in every respect, maintain a conscience void of offence, and perfect holiness in the fear of God. He hath so affectionate a sense of the riches of the divine grace, displayed through a Redeemer, in adopting so unworthy a creature as himself to the dignity and privileges of a son of God, that he often cries out, in raptures of holy gratitude and joy, What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me? Inspired with this noble principle, he searches his Father's will impartially; and when he hath discovered it, he obeyeth it cheerfully, and it is his meat and his drink to perform it. He loves the Lord his God above all, and loves his fellow-creatures for his sake as well as their own, and entertains the highest veneration and affection for those who most heartily resemble his Father and their Father, his God and their God. It is his prayer, and his endeavour, that he may go about doing good, and be useful to all as he hath opportunity; that he may pass through the world with a holy moderation, and superiority of soul, to the things which are seen and are temporal; thankfully owning every mercy as proceeding from God's paternal love and care, and serenely submitting to every affliction, as the cup which his Father puts into his hand. In a word, he desires, that in all the varieties of life he may still be intent on the views of an everlasting inheritance; humbly looking and longing for that blessed hope, yet willing patiently to wait his Father's time: having this constant expectation, and reviving assurance, that whether he live, he shall live unto the Lord, or whether he die, he shall die unto the Lord; so that whether he live or die, he shall be the Lord's.

This is the Christian;—this is the man in whom Christ is formed; or, rather, these are some faint lineaments of his character: and I will venture to say, that he who cannot discern something in it, even as thus imperfectly described, which is vastly superior to that morality and decency of behaviour, which arises merely from prudential views, or from the sweetness and gentleness of a man's natural temper, is sunk below the boasted religion of nature, and must take refuge in the wretched principles of Atheism, if he would pretend to form any thing of a consistent scheme. But now,

III. I must conclude with hinting at some reflections and inferences, which my time will not allow me to handle at large.

1. How important is it, that ministers should lead young persons into such views as these!

Our great and important business in life is to promote the eternal happiness of our hearers, and to lay a solid foundation of hope and joy in their souls. We have seen now what it is, and other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Here then let all our labours centre. It is the good old way, in which our fathers in the ministry went, and in which they prospered. Let us follow their steps, and exert our most vigorous efforts here. Modern refinements may amuse us in our closets, but they will never feed the souls of our hearers, nor spread the triumphs of a gospel, which was the power of God to the salvation of thousands, before they were ever dreamt of. I hope, God is my witness, that I am heartily concerned for the interest of virtue: (if by that be meant the advancement of practical religion;) but I never expected to see it promoted by the most philosophical speculations concerning its nature, or the finest harangues on its innate beauties, when the name and peculiar doctrines of Christ are thrown off, as unfashionable encumbrances of a discourse. Experienced Christians, who have tasted the bread of life, will not contentedly be put off with such chaff: and if we imagine that the younger part of our auditors may be trained up to a relish for it, we may, perhaps, succeed in the attempt: but I much fear, that success will be the calamity of the church, and the destruction of souls.*

Psal. cxxxii. 9. With humility, 1 Pet. v. 5. With zeal, Isa. lix. 17. With cursing, Psal. cix. 18. With shame, Psal. cxxxi. 18. &c.

* The author has taken a great deal of freedom on this head, as the discourse was delivered before several candidates for the ministry, to whom it had some peculiar concern.

2. We may learn from hence, what are the most valuable proofs of parental affection.

Certainly, there is no reason to esteem, as such, that fond indulgence which suffers ill habits to grow up in the young mind, and fears its present disturbance more than its future ruin: no, nor yet the more prudent care of providing plentiful and agreeable accommodations, for the subsistence and delight of your infant offspring, as they advance to maturity and settlement in life. These things indeed are not to be neglected; but wretched are the children, and I will add, the parents too, where this is the principal labour. Would you express a wise and religious tenderness, for which your children shall have reason to thank you in their dying moments, and to meet you with joy in the interviews of the eternal world? Do your utmost that Christ be formed in their souls; and let them plainly see, that you even travail in birth again, till this happy work be accomplished. But this leads me to add,

3. What need is there of the work of the divine Spirit on the heart, in order to the laying this great foundation!

The language of the text, which speaks of Christ formed in us, naturally leads our thoughts to some agent, by whom the work is done; and when you consider what kind of a work it is, I appeal to your own consciences, whether it is to be thought merely a human production? Were it only a name, a ceremony, a speculation, or a passion, it would not be worth a moment's dispute, whether you or we should have the glory of it. But as it is nothing less than the transformation of a corrupt and degenerate creature into the holy image of the Son of God, it were impiety for either to arrogate it to ourselves.

Let us therefore on the whole learn our duty and our wisdom. Let the matter be brought to a serious and immediate review, and let us judge ourselves by the character described, as those that expect very shortly to be judged of the Lord. If, on the examination, any of you have reason to conclude that you are strangers to it, remember that the invincible battery of the word of God demolishes all the towering hopes you may have raised on any other foundation. Let conscience then say, whether any amusement, or any business in life, be so important, as to be attended to, even for one single day, in neglect of this great concern, on which all the happiness of an immortal soul is suspended. If nothing be indeed found of greater moment, apply yourselves seriously to this, and omit no proper and rational method of securing it. Consider the ways by which Christ uses to enter into a soul, and wait upon him in those ways. Reflect seriously on your present condition, constantly attend the instructions of his word, and the other solemnities of his worship, and choose to converse intimately with those, in whom you have reason to think he is already formed. But in all remember, that the success depends upon a divine cooperation, and therefore go frequently into the presence of God by prayer; go into it this day, or if possible this hour, and importunately entreat the regenerating and sanctifying influences of his Spirit, which, when you earnestly desire them, the gospel gives you such ample encouragement to expect. But if you have reason to hope, that you have already received them, learn to what the praise should be ascribed; and let it animate you to pray, that through further communications from the throne of grace, you may be made continually more and more like to your Redeemer, till you are prepared for that world, where you shall shine forth in his complete resemblance, and shall find it your complete and eternal felicity. Amen.

SERMON VII.

A DISSUASIVE FROM KEEPING BAD COMPANY.

PROV. iv. 14, 15.

Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men: avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away.

IF we have any regard to the judgment of the wisest of men, illuminated and directed by the influences of the divine Spirit, we must certainly own, that ill company is a very dangerous snare, and that young persons should be frequently and earnestly cautioned against it. The excellent collection of moral and religious precepts contained in this book of Proverbs, was especially intended to give subtilty or prudence to the simple, and to the young man knowledge and discretion. As the sacred author well knew, that he should plead the cause of wisdom and piety in vain, while the voice of dissolute companions was heard, and their conversation pursued, he begins his addresses to youth with repeated cautions on this head: My son, says he, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not. As he proceeds in his discourse, the address grows more lively and earnest: and I am sure every attentive hearer will soon discover a peculiar energy in the words of the text. This faithful and compassionate counsellor doth not content himself with dissuading his young reader from joining with notorious offenders in their crimes, but even from going in the way with them, or with any other evil men, nay, from entering upon it, or even approaching it, so much as to pass by it, if there were not a necessity of doing it. Enter not into the paths of sinners, and go not in the way of evil men: avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away. As if he should have said, "Shun the very place where such wretches assemble, as you would if it were infected with the most malignant and dangerous disease: and if you have unwarily taken any steps towards it, stop short, and direct your course another way."

Such lessons did Solomon teach; and such had he himself learnt from David his father. That pious prince, in the very entrance on the book of Psalms, describes the good man as one that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful; and he elsewhere speaks of the citizen of Zion, as one in whose eye a vile person, far from being chosen as an intimate companion, is contemned, while he honours them that fear the Lord. Thus he delineates the holy and happy man; and he had a pleasing consciousness that this character was his own: he therefore appeals to God as a witness to it, that he had not himself sat with vain persons, and was determined that he would not go in with dissemblers: nay, that he was so far from seeking and delighting in their company, that he hated the congregation of evil-doers, and would not sit with the wicked: he resolutely drove them away from him, as one who knew their society would be extremely injurious to the purpose he had formed of devoting himself to a religious course: Depart from me, ye evil-doers; for I will keep the commandments of my God.

The sacred writers of the New Testament recommend to us, that we should have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; that we should not be unequally yoked in any kind of intimate friendship with unbelievers; and that if any do not obey the word, we should note such a one, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed.

Considering such passages of Scripture, as well as the reason of the thing, I think it proper at this time to pursue this subject at large. I well know, that I may succeed in this particular address, and yet leave you strangers to a saving change, and far from the kingdom of God; but if I cannot prevail upon you to refrain from and discard the company of sinners, I fear other admonitions will turn to very little account. In the further prosecution of the subject I will,

I. Briefly tell you, what I intend by that bad company which I would caution you against, and how far I would urge you to avoid it.

II. Offer some considerations to deter you from it; and then,

III. Conclude with a few obvious inferences.

I. I am briefly to show you what I would now caution you against.

And here, surely, I need not be large in telling you what I mean by bad company. It is, in general, "the conversation of those, who are apparently destitute of the fear of God;" and so it takes in, not only persons of the most dissolute and abandoned characters, but those vain and worthless creatures who manifest a neglect of religion, though free from gross and scandalous immoralities. So that what I have to say will be applicable to all sinful companions whatever; but the more notorious their vices are, the more evident will be the force of each of these arguments, by which I shall now endeavour to fortify you against their society.

Neither shall I use many words in telling you how far you are to avoid such company; for to be sure you cannot imagine that I am endeavouring to dissuade you from a necessary commerce with them in the common affairs of life, and the business of your calling; since then, as the apostle expresses it, you must needs go out of the world, considering the state of religion and morality in it. Nor would I lead you to a neglect of any offices of humanity and civility to them; for such a behaviour, instead of adorning the gospel, would greatly prejudice their minds against it. Least of all, would I hinder you from applying yourselves to them by serious admonitions, in order to convince them of their sin and danger, and to engage them to repentance and reformation. In these views the blessed Jesus himself conversed freely with persons of the most infamous characters, though he were perfectly holy, harmless, undefiled, and in that sense separate from sinners. The folly I would caution you against is, "choosing irreligious persons for your intimate friends, and delighting to spend your vacant hours in vain conversation with them." My design does not require further explanation; the great difficulty I apprehend is, what I shall meet with while I am attempting,

II. To fortify you against the danger of such companions, and to engage you cautiously to avoid them.

When I call this the most difficult part of my work, it is not because I am at a loss for arguments, or apprehend those arguments to be either weak or obscure. A variety of considerations immediately present themselves to my mind, so plain, and yet so important, that I am confident, were the matter to be weighed in an equal balance, a few moments would be sufficient to produce a rational conviction of what I am to prove. But oh! who can answer for the effect of such a conviction? When I consider the unaccountable enchantment which there seems to be in such company as I am warning you against; and reflect on the instances in which I have seen young persons of sense and education, who once appeared to promise remarkably well, at length entangled, and some of them ruined by it; I dare not presume on the success I might otherwise expect. Nevertheless, I know that the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword; and I know, that if it be guided by the hand of the blessed Spirit, it will be effectual to divide you from your most delightful carnal associates; since it can separate things as near to each other, as the joints and the marrow, and can lay open the heart to so clear a view, as that it shall seem to have discerned even its thoughts and intentions.

It is this encourages me to make the attempt, and I hope the difficulty and importance of the case will not only excuse my handling it at large, but will also engage all, who have any regard to the happiness of the rising generation, to lift up their hearts to God, that he may assist and succeed me in pleading this weighty cause, in which the interests of time and eternity are so apparently concerned.

Give me leave then to bespeak the most serious attention of all that hear me, and especially of the younger part of my audience, while I urge on your consciences such considerations as these: Seriously reflect on the many unhappy consequences which will attend your going in the way of sinners:—think on those entertainments and pleasures which you give up for the sake of their society:—and consider how little advantage you can expect from thence, to counterbalance the pleasures you resign and the evils you incur by it.

1. Let me entreat you seriously to reflect on the many unhappy consequences which will attend your entering into the path of the wicked, and going in the way of evil men.

You probably will by this means quickly wear out all serious impressions;—you will be exposed to numberless temptations to sin and folly,—and thrown out of the way of amendment and reformation;—and thus will be led into a great many temporal inconveniences, till at last you perish with your sinful companions, and have your eternal portion amongst them in hell.

(1.) By this means you will be in the ready way to lose all sense of religion, and outgrow the impressions of a serious education, if Providence have favoured you with it.

If your hearts are not harder than the nether mill-stone, some such impressions were surely made in your younger years; and I believe few that have been trained up in religious families have entirely escaped them. If these are duly improved, they will end in conversion and glory; but if they are resisted, they lead to greater obstinacy in sin, and throw the soul still further from the kingdom of God. Now what can be more evident than the tendency of vain and carnal conversation to quench the blessed Spirit of God, and hinder the mind from falling in with his preparatory work upon it.

I am persuaded that if they, who are under some prevailing sense of divine things, consider how difficult they often find it to preserve those impressions on their spirits, in the company of some who appear, on the whole, to be serious people, even they will be afraid frequently to venture into the company of the sensual and profane. As Mr. Bolton finely expresses it,* "Throw a blazing firebrand into snow or rain, and its brightness and heat will quickly be extinguished; so, let the liveliest Christian plunge himself into carnal company, and he will soon find the warmth of his zeal abated, and the tenderness of his conscience prejudiced." Now, if it be so detrimental to those who have deliberately devoted themselves to the service of God, and have had some experience of the goodness of his ways, judge how much more dangerous it must be to him who has only some feeble desires, and as yet undetermined purposes, in favour of it. Young people are extremely rash and credulous; and when you see your favourite companions neglecting serious godliness, and perhaps deriding it, it is a thousand to one that you will not have courage to oppose them: you will probably, at first, be silent; and then you will grow ashamed of your former tenderness; till at last, seduced by the craftiness of them that lie in wait to deceive, you may secretly censure religion as an unnecessary and burthensome thing, if you are not transported so far as openly to revile it, and join in the senseless and impious cry against those that appear to be influenced by it.

Again, when you have been used to the pleasures of such company, and, perhaps, of that unbridled luxury which they may be ready to lead you into, you will, no doubt, lose your relish for all the entertainments of devotion. The hours you spend in the exercises of it in public, or in the family, will grow tedious, and almost insupportable to you; and you will rejoice when the dull work is over, that you may return to your beloved companions again. Thus will all regard to religion be gradually worn out of your mind, and this seems to be the argument suggested by St. Paul, to dissuade the Corinthians from being unequally yoked with unbelievers. For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? or what communion hath light with darkness? This alone would be a very considerable evil; but it is far from being all you have to fear, for I add,

(2.) By frequenting ill company, you lay yourselves open to many temptations, and probably will be drawn into a great deal of guilt.

You know, there is a strong force in example. "We are all," says Mr. Locke, "a kind of chameleons, that take a tincture from that which is near us."† So that, if you converse with wicked people, you will probably become like them yourselves. It is an argument, which Solomon urges against forming any peculiar intimacy with those that are passionate; and it is equally applicable to many other cases: Make no friendship with an angry man; and with a furious man thou shalt not go; lest thou learn his ways, and get a snare to thy soul.

Alas, sinners, you are too apt to be led into guilt by your own corrupt hearts, even when you have the fairest advantages against it, amidst the wisest instructions, and the holiest examples. How forcibly then will the temptation assault you, when you see others, and those your most intimate friends, yield to it without any appearance of remorse! and when, it may be, you hear them pleading in favour of the compliance, and endeavouring to persuade you to join them in the practice, as what they have themselves found delightful and advantageous!

It is no small evil for an immortal creature, who was sent into the world to serve God, and to secure a happy immortality, to live in vain, and to trifle away hour after hour in mere idleness and impertinence. Yet this is the least sin that bad company leads a man into. Unhappy as this is, would to God that it always rested here! the world would at least be more peaceful, and your damnation, sinners, would be less intolerable. But daily observation undeniably proves, that by evil examples, and wicked companions, people generally learn gluttony and drunkenness, swearing and uncleanness. It engages them in foolish quarrels, in which they blaspheme the name of God, and injure their neighbour; and it habituates them to such extravagant ways of living, as they are forced to support by secret dishonesty, and very often by open robbery. Thus they gradually fall into those scandalous enormities, which at first they could not have thought of without horror. This fatal effect is plainly hinted at in Proverbs, where the wretch that abandoned himself to the society of sinners, is represented as acknowledging, that he was almost in all evil, in the midst of the congregation and assembly; i. e. he was so hardened in his various crimes, as not to be ashamed to commit, or at least to avow, them in the most public manner.

(3.) By frequenting sinful company, you will throw yourselves out of the way of repentance and reformation.

I before observed, that you will by this means contract a disrelish for the exercises of devotion; and this will probably be attended with the neglect of those ordinances, which God hath appointed as the great means of our conversion and edification. And when these are neglected, how can you expect that God should pursue you with uncommon interpositions of his grace? that when his word is despised, and his house forsaken, he should seize you as it were by violence, amongst your dissolute companions, and convert you in your midnight revels? Your pious friends may indeed have some opportunities in private of expostulating with you; but it will require a great deal of resolution to attempt it; and when they do, they must take it as a peculiar favour, if you give them a patient hearing, and do not affront and revile them for their charitable endeavour of delivering your souls from the pit of destruction, and plucking you as brands out of everlasting burnings.

But if we should allow, that their importunity, or any other consideration, should sometimes bring you within the hearing of an awakening, practical sermon, and some serious impression should be made upon your minds by it, it is very probable all these convictions will wear off, as soon as you return to your wicked companions again. One gay, licentious hour amongst them may undo the labour of many days and weeks, and presently teach you to laugh at yourselves for the former alarm, as if every fear had been vain, and every purpose of reformation needless. And thus your hearts will be like tempered steel, which gathers strength from every blow of the hammer, to make a more vigorous resistance to the next; and you will harden to all the most mollifying methods of Providence and of grace, till at length you provoke the blessed Spirit, so often resisted, entirely to withdraw, and so you be sealed up under final impenitency. Thus the poor foolish creature I mentioned before, who was so fond of the society of sinners, is represented as reflecting too late, that all the wisest and kindest endeavours of his friends for his reformation, had been utterly ineffectual. How, says he, have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof! I have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined my ear to them that instructed me. Thus incorrigibly disobedient will you be, if you enter into the path of sinners, and go on in the way of evil men. In consequence of this,

(4.) You will undoubtedly find yourselves exposed to a great deal of present inconvenience and calamity, with regard to your temporal affairs.

Now, methinks, this consideration should at least have its weight with you, whose guilt it is, and whose ruin it too probably may be, to look only at those things which are seen, and are temporal. I before observed, that by frequenting ill company, you will be under strong temptations to idleness. And thus you will, in all probability, waste your substance, and shorten your days; and in the mean time lay a foundation for many diseases, which may give you an utter disrelish for all the comforts and entertainments of life, when you stand in the greatest need of them. I add, that it is not at all unlikely, that the foolish quarrels, into which it may lead you, may be attended with cost or pain, and perhaps with both. And as for your reputation, which to a generous spirit is one of the dearest of all temporal enjoyments, I must plainly tell you, that if you determine to take no care in the choice of your company, you must necessarily give it up. For if, almost by a miracle, you should be kept from running with your sinful associates into the same excess of riot and folly; yet the very circumstance of taking pleasure in such sort of companions will be enough to overthrow it, in the judgment of wise and considerate people.

Such arguments as these does Solomon use, when cautioning his young readers against so dangerous an entanglement. He pleads the many temporal inconveniences and evils which attend it, and many of which I have just been mentioning. He observes, that it tends to impoverish them: he that follows after vain persons, shall have poverty enough: that however it may seem the cement of friendship, it often proves the occasion of enmity and contention; for who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babblings? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine with the partners of their midnight debaucheries. How much the health is impaired by it, is evidently suggested, when he represents the poor creature as mourning at last, when his flesh and his body are consumed; and to add no more, he expressly tells us, that sinners, by these kinds of confederacies, lay snares for their own blood, and lurk privily for their own lives; which he useth as an argument against complying with their proposals, when they seem most advantageous. And accordingly, we see that most of those unhappy creatures, who are the victims of public justice, and fall by the hand of the executioner, declare with their dying breath, that wicked company was the occasion of their ruin.

(5.) If you choose the society of sinners, you will probably perish with them, and have their company in hell, as you have had it upon earth.

The probability of this dreadful consequence is but too apparent from what I have said under the former heads of this discourse. If you lose those religious impressions which were early made, if you are drawn into a great deal of sin, and thrown out of the way of repentance and reformation, what can the end of these things be? or what can you reasonably expect, but that God should execute upon you all the fierceness of his wrath? And to cut off your vain, presumptuous hopes, and awaken you to that sense of danger, which is so absolutely necessary for your deliverance, he has expressly threatened it; and that not only in general with respect to all sinners, but particularly to such as are fond of wicked company. And it is worth your while to observe, in what language he threatens it: A companion of fools shall be destroyed. So that what Solomon says of one sort of sinful companions is justly applicable to the rest: Their house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

Now let me entreat you to dwell upon this thought, till you feel something of the weight and the terror of it. Be sometimes asking yourselves, "How can we dwell with the devouring fire? How can we lie down in everlasting burnings?" How can you endure those torments yourselves? And in what temper, and with what reflections, will you meet the partners of your guilt and folly there? And in what manner will you converse together? Alas, my friends, in those seats of horror and despair, all that rendered your intercourse on earth delightful, will be come to an eternal period. There will be no opportunities for you and them to gratify your sensual desires together; no delicious food, no intoxicating liquors, no gay tales, no cheerful songs; but instead of these, blackness of darkness for evermore; weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth; the worm that never dies, and the fire that cannot be quenched.

Will it then be any relief to you, to look back on those days, which you shared in luxury, and in sin? Will your friendship still continue? And will you be endeavouring, by tender condolences, and by obliging offices, to mollify and alleviate the miseries of each other? Alas, sinners, hell is not the seat of friendship, but of everlasting enmity and rage. All the wretched inhabitants will live in perpetual discord, and mutual abhorrence. And no doubt your keenest resentments will burn against those, who have been your partners in sin; as your aggravated damnation will be in part owing to them. And on the same principles, will their indignations rise against you. And thus you will lie for ever, continually exercising all the enlarged capacities of your minds, to increase the torments of each other. And perhaps it is the only instance, in which your desires and your attempts will be effectual. Oh! sirs, when I think of the air and form of some wicked creatures, when transported with passion, when I observe how venomous their speeches, and extravagantly furious all their actions are, methinks I see the most lively emblem of the society below: but alas, how much more dreadful must it be, to stand exposed to the rage and revenge of a damned spirit! yet this is like to be your lot; and if it be, the most delightful of your companions in sin will probably prove your fiercest tormentors.

There is reason to apprehend, that these, and such as these, will be the miserable consequences of wicked company with regard to yourselves. And I might now infer from hence, that your frequenting it must be very grievous and injurious to others. I might plead against it at large, from the alarms and sorrows to which your parents and ministers will be exposed by your pursuing it, and the mischievous influence it may have on the circumstances and characters of your own domestics, if ever you appear at the heads of families, as well as of others, with whom you are concerned. Solomon urges one of these considerations, when he says, A companion of riotous men shameth his father. Here would be a large field of argument; but I wave it at present, lest my discourse should swell beyond due bounds, as well as to avoid the repetition of what I was laying before you on a former occasion.*

Nevertheless, I hope you are abundantly convinced, by what has been already said, that the pernicious and dangerous consequences are many and great: let me entreat you further to consider,

2. How much nobler entertainment and pleasure you give up for a converse, which is like to prove so fatal to you.

I would fain persuade you, if already entangled, to burst these bands asunder, and to cast away these cords from you, which will otherwise bind you as victims to eternal wrath. And to engage you to it, I would say, as the wise man doth, Forsake the foolish, and live. It is not only necessary to preserve your life, but you may likewise be assured, it would most happily improve it, and bring you to another kind of life than what you have yet known, in comparison of which your present way of life is but a wild distempered dream. The father of lies may, perhaps, have persuaded your weak and unexperienced minds, that there is no such thing as pleasure to be found out of this enchanted circle which he has drawn about you: but did you know wherein true self-enjoyment consists, I might have declined all those awful arguments which I have so largely been urging upon your consciences. Oh, my friends, could I but this day be so happy as to persuade you to break the chain, and to abandon these insnaring companions, not merely from prudential, but religious, considerations, I should presently lead you into a new world. Instead of being the associates of the idle, the intemperate, and the profane, you would then converse with those who are indeed the excellent of the earth, and would be able to say, with David, I am a companion of them that fear thee, O Lord, and of them that keep thy precepts. And is that a contemptible thought? What think you, if an angel were to descend from heaven to make his abode on earth, or the Lord Jesus Christ himself were to appear again in the infirmities of human flesh; with whom would that angel, or that Redeemer, choose an intimate friendship, and as frequent converse? Your own consciences tell you, that if he were ever found amongst you, it would only be as a physician visits an hospital, to cure others, not to delight himself. And why should you esteem that society unworthy your regard, which you are sure the Lord Jesus Christ would prefer? It is because you imagine it gloomy and melancholy: but that imagination proceeds from ignorance and mistake. Were you to be with them, when they are discoursing together of the things of God, (as, through the divine goodness, many of us have been,) you might frequently discern in their countenances such marks of sweet serenity and composure, and sometimes of elevated hope, and sublime, angelic joy, as would be an ocular demonstration of the pleasure which a serious and regular mind may find in such converse. And to this you might be admitted, if, by forbearing to enter into the ways of sinners, you discovered the marks of a teachable disposition. For, as Solomon declares, the ear that heareth the reproof of life, i. e. that reproof which tends to preserve life, and to make it happy, abideth among the wise; and, as he chooseth their company, he will readily be admitted to it.

I might add, that on this supposition, you would also know what it is to be good company to yourselves. Reflection, which is now your torment, would become your pleasure. The review of a well-ordered mind, of a prudent and religious conduct, would delight you more than the most agreeable prospects, or harmonious music; and instead of holding your happiness, as you now do, in a servile dependence on the presence, nay, I may add, on the humour, of others, even of such as are least to be depended upon, you would have it treasured up in your own breast, and, like the good man described in Scripture, would be satisfied from yourselves.

Nay, which is still infinitely more, you might humbly hope, through the righteousness and grace of the Redeemer, that the blessed God, the eternal and inexhaustible source of happiness, would lift up the light of his countenance upon you, and bid you welcome into his gracious presence. This is an argument which St. Paul urges, in the view in which I now mention it, when, dissuading the Corinthians from forming any intimate alliance with sinners, he pleads, that God hath said, Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. And God forbid, that you should ever arrive at such a degree of impious madness, as to question whether the favour and friendship of the majesty of heaven be preferable to the converse of a vain, sinful worm. O that he would grant you the visit of one hour, of one moment; and you would need nothing further to teach you to say, Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire but thee; none that I desire in comparison with thee; how much less in opposition to thee!

Once more, if you are companions of the saints now, you may enjoy the reviving hope, that you will shortly meet them in the presence of God above, and for ever converse together, with the greatest ardour of mutual affection, as well as the noblest improvement, both in capacity, temper, and circumstances. Nor will you there only meet your pious friends, with whom on earth you took sweet counsel together, and perhaps went to the house of God in company; but you will form many new acquaintances with the most excellent and glorious of created beings; you will come to the innumerable company of angels, and to the spirits of just men made perfect; nay, you will dwell for ever with God the Judge of all, and Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant. But surely you cannot expect a favourable reception into that blessed world, or any of the preparatory felicities I have been describing, if you resolutely adhere to foolish and wicked companions now. David would not have presumed to pray, as he doth, Gather not my soul with sinners, if he could not have said, as in the preceding words, I have not sat with vain persons, neither will I go in with dissemblers; I have hated the congregation of evil-doers, and will not sit with the wicked. And if you think to reconcile such companions with such enjoyments and hopes, you delude yourselves with inconsistent dreams, in direct opposition to the voice of reason, as well as of Scripture. Give me leave, once more, to entreat you to consider,

3. How little advantage you can receive from such society, to counterbalance the damage you sustain, and the happiness you forfeit for it.

I am sure it ought to be something very grand and important, for which you grieve your friends, and provoke God; for which you cut yourselves off from the most valuable enjoyments in this world and a better, and at length plunge yourselves into everlasting destruction. And now show us, I entreat you, the worthy prize; tell us what those friends are, whose company you purchase at so dear a rate; and what important offices they can do for you, to make you amends for all you must lose, and for all you must suffer, on their account? Poor wretches! the most they can do, is to administer something that may gratify your appetite, or amuse your imagination, for a few transient moments. A relishing meal, a cheerful cup, a thoughtless, noisy burst of laughter, are some of the best things they can procure for you. And are these so great? Surely, if it were reasonable in any case, it is peculiarly so in this, to say of laughter, It is mad; and of mirth and luxury, What doth it? It is but a poor entertainment while it lasts, which Solomon elegantly compares to the useless momentary blaze of a few crackling thorns under a pot: and there is a mixture of uneasiness often attending it from a view of the consequences, which will often force itself on the mind; so that even in laughter the heart is sorrowful. But if the satisfaction it gave were ever so transporting, or ever so complete, yet still it would be very contemptible, because its duration is so short. Death is continually advancing towards you, which will very shortly separate you from your chosen companions; and if the most beloved of them were waiting round your bed, they could by no means deliver you from the grave, or moderate the agonies which were bringing you thither. Even before your trembling souls are dislodged from your bodies, your relish for their converse will be entirely spoiled; so that you would think yourselves barbarously insulted by them, if, in the midst of your anguish and distress, they should offer you those entertainments which you once so fondly pursued together, and which were the cement of your precarious and short-lived friendship. Judge then, whether those things are so highly valuable, which, in the near views of eternity, you would behold with horror, rather than with pleasure; and whether your most rational felicity in both worlds is to be sacrificed to such vanities as these.

I firmly believe, that, upon such reflections as these, you must be compelled, even to your own condemnation, to confess that, as Solomon declares, He that followeth vain persons, is void of understanding. And if you are convinced of it, then let me entreat you, my dear unhappy friends, who are entangled in this fatal snare, that, in the strength of divine grace, you would immediately attempt an escape. It will indeed require resolution; but, remember, it will amply reward it: and therefore determine upon it this day, that you will go no more to their assemblies of vanity and of sin, and when they would entice you, consent not to them; but rather tell them plainly and seriously, that you know, and consider, that your souls are at stake; and tell them, you avoid their company now, because you dread it in hell. And who knows, but such a serious and lively admonition from those who were once their brethren in iniquity, may do more to awaken them, than many addresses from the pulpit? Who knows, but it may effectually reclaim them, and be a means of forming them to such characters, as may make their friendship as safe and as honourable, as ever it was dangerous and infamous? At least, you will have delivered your own soul, and may comfortably hope, that your life will be given you for a prey. With this solemn charge, as in the name and presence of God, I dismiss you from this head, and proceed,

III. To those reflections and inferences, with which I shall conclude the discourse.

1. If so many evils and dangers attend the pursuit of wicked company, how careful should parents and guardians be, to keep young people out of the way of it!

You see, from all I have been saying, how necessary this care is, if you desire they should be happy in this world, or in the next. It is a dreadful charge that is brought against Eli, and a dreadful doom is pronounced upon him for it; that his sons made themselves vile, and that he restrained them not. And therefore, as you love your own souls, and those of yours, endeavour, with all possible resolution, to avoid being culpable yourselves on this account.

And here I would observe, that your care must begin very early, and that it must take a great compass. You should endeavour betimes to lay in an antidote against the future poison, by labouring to the utmost to possess their infant minds with a sense of the divine presence, a desire of pleasing God, and a dread of offending him. You should endeavour to inspire them with an abhorrence of sin, and a love to the ways and people of God. Endeavour to find out suitable company for them, and to make your own company as delightful to them as you can. Indulge them in such diversions as duty and prudence will admit; for too rigorous a restraint from these things, makes them eager to pursue them, wherever they are to be found. And if you see they begin to form an acquaintance with such as you think likely to insnare and corrupt them, first gently warn them of it, and endeavour, by the easiest methods, to draw them off. If those will not do, reason with them more largely on the head; lay before them the various dangers they will be exposed to, and show them the instances of those who have been injured and ruined by such company: instances, which, it is to be feared, you will always have near at hand. And if all this be not enough, interpose with the authority God has given you; absolutely forbid them the place and company, and let them see by your after-conduct, that you are in good earnest in the prohibition. At the same time, endeavour to recommend religion to them in the most amiable light, that they may be convinced it carries its entertainment along with it, so that there is no need of seeking pleasure in the paths of the destroyer. I know this is a matter of difficulty, and requires a great deal of prudence and steadiness to conduct it aright; but I am persuaded, if parents and masters were careful in this respect, few would be ruined till they came to be at their own disposal, and the destruction of multitudes would be entirely prevented. May God graciously give you wisdom to know your duty, and faithfulness to perform it!

2. If wicked company be so pernicious, as we have heard, then how cautious should you be in the choice of a companion for life, if you are in such circumstances as to have that choice before you.

It is evident, that, as all bad company is dangerous, so the nearer it is to us, and the more frequent the opportunities of conversing with it, the greater mischief will it probably do us. Those who are in the conjugal relation, should make it their great business and care, to assist and animate each other in the ways of God; and such is the prevalency of our sinful nature, and so many the snares and temptations of life, that, with all possible advantages, our progress will be too slow, and too frequently interrupted. What then could you expect, if you had those, not only in your houses, but in your arms too, from whom you would hardly ever hear a serious word; and who would perhaps be unwilling to give you the hearing, if you should attempt any such discourse: nay, might possibly revile or banter you for it, and by their impious language and wicked example, might greatly deaden religious sentiments in your own heart, and either prevent or frustrate your endeavours for communicating them to those under your care? When Christians of one sex or the other, choose such a companion for life, they seem to lie under great difficulties, and will be in imminent danger, either, on the one hand, of failing in a due affection and regard, or on the other, of being perverted and insnared by that very affection, which both the duties of the relation, and the comfort of life, so evidently require. If any of you have taken this hazardous step, I have nothing to do but to advise you, to be daily looking up to God for that extraordinary prudence which your circumstances require. But this is such a situation that I cannot forbear praying, that, as for those of you who are yet single, no considerations of beauty, wit, temper, or fortune, may ever prevail upon you to bow your necks to so unequal a yoke.

3. How much reason have you to be thankful, if God has delivered you from the snares of wicked company, and given you a relish for such as is good.

Think how easily you might have been entangled and undone. Think how many, in other respects, at least your equals in wisdom and capacity, are in this instance making a foolish choice; and bless the Lord, who has given you counsel. It is his mercy that gives you serious and useful friends, and gives you a heart to value them. By their converse you may gain many advantages directly opposite to the evils I have been describing. Be humbled, that you have improved these advantages no better; and pray for the aids of divine grace, that for the future they may be more diligently regarded. And if Providence ever lead you into the company of carnal sinners, which the most pious and resolute cannot wholly avoid, labour that they may be something the better for you, and you not the worse for them; and consider all the irregularities you observe in them, as further motives of thankfulness to God, for making a difference betwixt them and you, and giving you company so much more amiable than theirs. Once more,

4. Let young persons of a regular character take great heed that they do not, by insensible degrees, become dangerous companions to each other.

That social turn of mind which is natural to men, and especially to young persons, may perhaps lead you to form yourselves into little societies, particularly at this season of the year, to spend your evenings together. But let me entreat you to be cautious how you spend them. If your games and your cups take up your hours, till you intrench on the night, and perhaps the morning too, you will, to be sure, quickly corrupt each other, and soon degenerate into a club of rakes and debauchees. Farewell then to prayer, and every other religious exercise in secret. Farewell to all my pleasing hopes of you, and to those hopes which your pious parents have entertained. You will then become examples and instances of all the evils I have so largely been describing. Plead not, that these things are lawful in themselves; so are most of those, in a certain degree, which by their abuse prove the destruction of men's souls and bodies. If you meet, let it be for rational and Christian conversation; and let prayer and other devotions have their frequent place amongst you. And if you say or think that a mixture of these will spoil the company, it is high time for you to stop your career, and call yourselves to an account; for it seems by such a thought, that you are lovers of pleasure, much more than lovers of God. Some of these things may appear to have a tincture of severity; but consider, whether (in present circumstances*) I could have proved myself faithful to you, and to Him in whose name I speak, if I had omitted the caution I have now been giving you. I shall only add, that, had I loved you less tenderly, I had perhaps warned you more coldly, of this dangerous and deadly snare. May God render the admonition as successful as I am sure it is seasonable and necessary!

SERMON VIII.

RELIGIOUS YOUTH INVITED TO EARLY COMMUNION.

Isa. xliv. 3—5.

For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring: and they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water courses. One shall say, I am the Lord's; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel.

On the first hearing of these words, you will easily apprehend that they afford abundance of very proper matter for a discourse to young people; but you may perhaps be surprised when I tell you, that I shall take occasion from them to address religious youth, with a large invitation to an early attendance on the table of the Lord.

This is a surprise which I do not at all affect to give; for to press in a scripture to serve a purpose foreign to its original design, and to turn a mere allusion into an argument, is, in its degree, to handle the word of God deceitfully, and is indeed an injury to it, rather than an honour. So that I much fear, that by thus attempting to make every thing of the Scripture, we shall at length come to make nothing of it; for those seemingly distant extremes approach nearer to each other than some seem to be aware.

But I hope, my friends, you have learned to judge of the pertinency of Scripture to any purpose in hand, not merely by the first sound of the words, but by an attentive view of its sense and connexion; and when the words I have been reading are diligently examined, they may appear more suitable to my design than you at first apprehended.

Though God had before been reproving Israel with great severity, and setting their sins in order before them, he intimates purposes of grace and mercy, which he yet entertained toward them, unworthy as they were. And in order to prepare them for further favours, he promises, in the words of the text, to pour out upon them an abundant effusion of the blessed Spirit. Now we well know, by a multitude of scriptures, which I must not particularly enumerate, that it was to be in the latter day, i. e. the gospel times, that this glorious promise was most eminently to be fulfilled.

The blessed effects which were to attend its accomplishment, are described in great variety and elegance of language. They are represented by the refreshment which water gives to him that is thirsty, and which plentiful floods of it afford to the dry ground, when scorched with the summer's heat. Accordingly, it is said that they, and their offspring too, should flourish in religion, like the grass when thus abundantly refreshed, or like willows by the water courses, the verdure of which is so delightful, and the growth so speedy, that no more proper emblem could have been chosen. Thus should the souls of the children flourish, through the divine blessing, on the instructions of pious parents, and other methods appointed by God for their religious improvement. And in the next words the prophet uses still greater plainness of speech, to let us know that their number should be considerable, and their resolutions for God firm and determinate. One and another, this man and that, should come and own his relation to God, should publicly enter himself into the engagements of his covenant, and put in a humble claim to the important blessing it was intended to convey. One shall say, I am the Lord's; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel.

Some very celebrated translators and critics understand the words, which we render, "Subscribe with his hand unto the Lord," in a sense a little different from that which our English version has given them. They would rather render them, "Another shall write upon his hand, I am the Lord's;"* and they suppose it refers to a custom which formerly prevailed in the East, of stamping the name of the general on the soldier,† or that of the master on the slave.‡ As this name was sometimes borne on the forehead, so at other times on the hand; and it is certain that several Scriptures, which may easily be recollected, are to be explained as alluding to this.§ Now from hence it seems to have grown into a custom amongst some idolatrous nations, when solemnly devoting themselves to the service of any deity, to be initiated into it by receiving some marks in their flesh, which might never wear out.‖ This interpretation the original will certainly bear; and it here makes a very strong and beautiful sense, since every true Christian has a sacred and an indelible character upon him, which shall never be erased. But if we retain our own version, it will come to nearly the same, and evidently refers to a practice which was sometimes used among the Jews, and which is indeed exceeding natural, of obliging themselves to the service of God, by setting their hand to some written articles emphatically expressing such a resolution. So that you see it must imply, that they who were, by the influences of divine grace, brought to a serious sense of religion, should, in a public and solemn manner, express their subjection to God, and their readiness to enter into covenant with him; and whatever rites should by him be appointed as the tokens of such a resolution, the text must intimate a cheerful compliance with them. For it would be most unreasonable to imagine that any, of such a character, and in such circumstances, would prefer any form invented by themselves, or dictated merely by human prudence, to the express ordinance and institution of God. Now, forasmuch as it is evident, that, under the Christian dispensation, the Lord's supper is appointed to such purposes, the text must imply an attendance upon it; and when we see young Christians presenting themselves at this holy solemnity, and joining themselves to God and his church in it, we may properly say, they subscribe with their hand to the Lord, and surname themselves by the name of Israel; just as we may say, in the Old-Testament phrase, that incense is offered, and a pure offering, when holy souls are pouring out their prayers and supplications before the throne of grace, though odours and victims no longer accompany their devotions.

I have surely said enough, and perhaps more than enough, to account for my choosing these words to introduce the discourse I have in view; in which I am to press those young persons, whose hearts God has touched by his sanctifying grace, to subscribe, as it were, with their hand, by entering themselves early into Christian communion, and eating and drinking with our Lord at his table. In order to which I shall,

I. Propose some plain and important arguments, to engage such to an early attendance on this sacred institution.

II. Answer some objections, which are most frequently urged to excuse the neglect of it; and,

III. Conclude with hinting at some reflections and inferences, which seem naturally to present themselves.

May divine grace render this attempt the means of leading many young persons into a conviction of their duty and interest, and of adding unto the church such as shall be saved!

I. I am to offer some plain and important arguments to engage religious youth to an early attendance on the supper of the Lord.

And, before I enter on these, I must entreat you to remember, that it is to religious youth only, that I address the invitation. I well know, my friends, that the sacred institution I am recommending, is a most awful and solemn thing. I know it was

And in another place, we read of an angel, that had the seal of the living God, to seal his servants in their foreheads, Rev. vii. 2, 3. In allusion to this also our Lord promises, Rev. iii. 12. I will write upon him that overcometh, the name of my God, and my new name. On this account Christians are said to be sealed by the Spirit unto the day of redemption, Eph. iv. 30. as by his operations God owns them as his, and secures them to himself, and to this God seems to refer, in those condescending words, Isaiah xlix. 16. I have graven Zion on the palms of my hands. See also Ezek. ix. 4. To this custom some think St. Paul alludes, when he speaks of the marks of Christ, which he bare in his body, Gal. vi. 17. intended, not only as the commemoration of a Redeemer's dying love, but as a seal of our covenant engagements to God through him; so that to attend upon it without a sincere desire of receiving Christ Jesus the Lord, and devoting ourselves to him, is a profanation that renders us, in some degree, guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. I am very sensible, that for any to approach it in so unworthy a manner, is not only in itself a sinful action, but may, in its consequences, prove a snare to their own souls, a stumbling to others, and a dishonour to the church. And therefore, far from encouraging such persons to come, I should think it a very necessary duty to labour to the utmost to dissuade them from it, and, if Providence gave me an opportunity, to prevent their admittance.

But I have frequently found, and I believe it has been the experience of many of my brethren in the ministry, that young persons, not only of a very sober and regular conduct, but even those who have appeared most deeply impressed with the concerns of their souls, and experimentally acquainted, so far as we can judge, with regenerating grace, have, in many instances, shown a strange coldness to this blessed institution; and we have known not a few who have grown old in the neglect of it. I apprehend therefore, that a regard to the authority and glory of my great Master, to the comfort and improvement of your souls, and to the edification and joy of the church in general, concur to require, that I offer you, my young friends, some public admonitions on this head; to which I now desire your very serious attention.

And here permit me more largely to plead the weight of a dying Redeemer's command, as well as the honour, the pleasure, and the various advantages of an early compliance with it.

1. The ordinance to which I now invite you, is the known command and institution of a dying Redeemer.

I need not enlarge on the proof of what is so apparent. You undoubtedly know, that Matthew, and Mark, and Luke, agree in giving us the history of its institution. And St. Paul afterwards received it by express revelation from Christ, and accordingly relates it in a very circumstantial and pathetic manner; telling us, not only that Christ commanded that this should be done in remembrance of him, but also that, by an attendance upon it, our Lord's death is showed forth till he come; plainly intimating thereby, (what the ends of the ordinance do further evince,) that it was to continue in the church to its remotest ages. So that, on the whole, you exceedingly mistake if you imagine this to be mere matter of choice, in any other sense, than as all the duty of a rational creature is so. Our Lord has plainly determined the matter by his own sacred authority, leaving this ordinance in charge to all his followers I say to all, for there is no limitation as to the age of those that should attend it. It is a command to young and old, as well as to rich and poor; and all, that are capable of understanding it, are obliged to comply with it, and thereby to do their homage to their exalted Sovereign, and express their gratitude to their most generous Friend. And can you in reason refuse your compliance? Methinks the name of the Son of God should carry along with it an authority too great to be despised, and the name of your Redeemer a constraining love too forcible to be withstood, especially the name of a dying Redeemer. Surely, my friends, if a dying parent, or brother, had given you a charge almost with his expiring breath, you could not lightly have acted contrary to it. How much greater regard do you owe to what the blessed Jesus appointed (as the apostle most pertinently observes) the same night in which he was betrayed! Had it been some hard thing that he had then enjoined, and had the reason of it been unknown, so that it had appeared as a mere arbitrary institution, the neglect of it had been foolish and ungrateful. Had it been a more painful rite than that of initiation amongst the Jews, more laborious than their frequent journeys to Jerusalem, and more costly than the sacrifices they offered there, the precept of our dying Lord had carried in it an abundant answer to all that ease or interest could have pleaded against it: how much more, when the reason is so evident, and the observation, in all respects, so easy! Judge, I pray you, whether it should be neglected. Judge whether it be a decent thing, that when we are sitting down to break and eat bread, and to pour forth and drink wine, that we may represent the breaking of Christ's body, and the pouring forth of his blood, and seal our covenant-engagements with him, more than one half of the professing Christians should rise, and either leave the place, or withdraw to a distance from the holy table. What is this but to say, "We will now have nothing to do with the memorials of a crucified Saviour?" Will you, my friends, thus separate yourselves from us? What if others were to learn of you, and to imitate your example? Where would the ordinance quickly be? Nay, where would it already have been, had this temper prevailed? Where, but in our Bibles? For there it would still have stood, to condemn our ungrateful disobedience, as it condemns yours.

2. An early attendance upon this ordinance will be truly honourable to you.

I wish I could say, that the omission of it were, in the repute of the generality of professing Christians, so dishonourable as it ought; but it is now grown so common, that much of the just infamy of it is worn off. Nevertheless, if we will seriously consider it, we must own, that where reason and duty require any practice, (which I have already proved to be the case here,) the more frequently it is neglected, the more honourable is a regard to it; as it argues a laudable fortitude of mind, to oppose a prevailing evil, by which multitudes are borne away. And who, that hath any sense of generosity and goodness, would not wish to signalize himself on such an occasion as this!

I appeal to your own hearts, my brethren, even when you have divested yourselves of every sentiment of ostentation and pride, (which I would not desire to press into the service of the sanctuary,) would it not afford you a rational and pious pleasure to reflect, that your fellow-christians might say, with regard to you, "These are persons who are happily distinguished from most of their companions, by obedience to God and gratitude to their Redeemer; they dare stand up for the honour of his institutions, and of his name, in the midst of all the languor and all the impiety of a degenerate age. Far from running with others to the same excess of riot, they do not only secretly retire, that they may converse with God, and devote themselves to him, but they have the courage openly to appear in so good a cause. Far from being ashamed of Christ, or of his words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, they readily expose themselves to all the glorious reproach of a determined adherence to him. Thus do they publicly declare, that their hearts are touched with a sense of his love, and inspired with resolution for his service. And as they are thus planted in the house of the Lord, we hope they will flourish to old age there; so that generations, which are yet unborn, shall be refreshed by their shade, and nourished by their fruit." Thus will you, like Jabez, be more honourable than all your brethren, if, like him, you call upon the name of the Lord, or, in the language of the text, subscribe with your hand unto him.

3. Let me plead the pleasure which this ordinance affords, as a further argument for an early attendance upon it.

If your hearts have been touched by regenerating grace, you must surely know that communion with God through a Mediator is unutterably delightful; and must own, that when you enjoy it, your souls are satisfied, as with marrow and fatness. If this be the case, I am sure you would look with a holy scorn on any sensual gratification that could be brought into comparison with those sublime and sacred entertainments. Now, when you consider the Lord's supper as an ordinance of divine appointment, you have just reason to hope, that God will honour it with his gracious presence; nay, when you consider the nature and design of the institution, you may probably expect some peculiar sweetness and delight in it, beyond what you have hitherto known. I say not, that you can be absolutely secure of your finding it; for it becomes the sovereignty of the ever-blessed God, not to confine himself invariably to any method of operation; lest his agency should at length be disregarded in it, and the honour transferred to the instrument: but I speak of what may probably be found; and I think I might here appeal to all considerate persons, who know any thing of the workings of the human mind; for I persuade myself they would be compelled to allow, that a regular attendance on such a solemnity has a direct tendency to produce the most delightful sensations in a soul deeply impressed with the great principles of our Christian faith.

Oh, my friends, what a scene is there opened, when, by these lively memorials of his dying love, the Lord Jesus is evidently set forth as crucified among us! Surely the spectacle must be delightful, even to creatures who are themselves perfectly innocent and holy! Surely the angels, who probably are present in the churches while the solemnity is performed, must attend it with a pleasing mixture of admiration and of joy! "Thus," may they be ready to say to each other, "thus was the great design accomplished! In such sufferings did the Son of God expire! By such surprising steps of condescension and of love, were apostate creatures recovered to their God! Thus was the flaming vengeance of the Divine Majesty atoned! And now he is graciously smiling upon them; and these happy souls are sitting, as around their Father's board, and anticipating the entertainments of our celestial world."

But the guest, who is called to sit down at such a banquet, may well be supposed to feel some tender and transporting pleasure, beyond that of such an angelic spectator. "These," O my soul, may the believer say, when the bread is broken, and the wine poured out, "these were the painful sufferings which the blessed Redeemer endured for such a wretch as I am: for he loved me, and gave himself for me: he was wounded for my transgressions, he was bruised for mine iniquities. All these dreadful conflicts of nature did he pass through, to avert from me that weight of wrath, which would otherwise have overwhelmed me beyond all hope of deliverance. And here are the emblems of his dying love and his living care. Here are the precious seals of that everlasting covenant established in his blood, which, as it is well ordered in all things, and sure, is all my salvation, and all my desire. By these tokens doth a faithful God assure me, that my sins are pardoned, that I am admitted into his family, and entitled to all the invaluable blessings of his children. Delightful thought! I have nothing now to do, but quietly to sit down, and wait with a holy silence and tranquillity of soul for the intimations of my Father's will, till he calls me to dwell in his house above. Yet a little while, O my soul, and thou shalt rise to nobler enjoyments than even these; for the bread thou hast now been eating, and the wine thou hast been drinking, are pledges of a divine banquet above, in the visible and immediate presence of the blessed Founder of this sacred feast. The security of the covenant I have this day been sealing, will continue in full force when the bands of nature are dissolved: if I drink no more with my Saviour of this fruit of the vine here, I shall drink it new with him in his Father's kingdom; and therefore may encounter death in the triumphant accents of good old Simeon, Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

Through the divine goodness, I hope we can say, we speak what we know; and testify, not only what we have heard from the experience of others, but what we have ourselves tasted and felt. Thus is God visiting and refreshing our souls, while we are attending at the blessed ordinance: and why will you not come and share with us in the entertainments so sincerely and so freely offered? Is he not saying to you, Eat, O my friends; and drink, yea, drink abundantly, O my beloved? Why then do you wrong your own souls, as well as affront his goodness, by neglecting the invitation? Would you come thus early, you might promise yourselves a peculiar welcome, and a peculiar pleasure. Many painful reflections might by this means be prevented, and the evidence of your sincerity be more happily secured; not to say, that while your spirits are brisk and active, you may feel the impression of those sacred passions, which are so suited to this occasion, with greater energy, and greater tenderness, than could be expected under the decays of nature, in the evening of life.

I shall only add, that these sublime pleasures are not limited to the happy moments which you spend in an immediate attendance on this feast of love; but they may be renewed, and perhaps sometimes increased, by reflection? whereas that often brings a sting along with it, more than sufficient to balance all the sweetness to be found in irregular, sensual delights.

4. An early attendance on the Lord's supper would be very useful, as well as entertaining.

It may probably be useful, both to yourselves, and others. I say,

(1.) It might be useful to yourselves in a variety of respects.

I consider, that I am now speaking to them that look upon improvement in religion as their highest interest; and therefore shall only endeavour to show you, what a tendency this ordinance has to assist you in this, and that is so evident, that I need not dwell largely on particulars, which, when suggested in a few words, may furnish you with matter of ample meditation. I shall but mention then the following hints:

The preparatory exercises of devotion might be very awakening and edifying to you. The review of your conduct, which you would be taking on the approach of these solemn seasons; the prayers and praises you would then be addressing to God, and the meditations in which your minds would be employed, would rouse you out of that lethargy in which you might be ready to sink, and which the best of men find too frequently prevailing.

The views of a bleeding Redeemer, of a reconciled God, of a confirmed covenant, and of a world of approaching glory, which this ordinance so naturally exhibits, would strengthen, as well as delight, your souls; and, by virtue of the refreshments received at these solemnities, you might be enabled to go on your way rejoicing, and to make a sensible progress in your journey towards the heavenly Canaan.

The remembrance of those solemn engagements, with which you would then be binding your souls unto the Lord, would be a ready answer in hours of future temptation. You would start back with horror at the thought of alienating your services from a God, to whom you had so seriously and publicly devoted them; and of returning to those follies and sins, which you had in a peculiar manner covenanted against: for this would appear to be adding sacrilege and perjury to the guilt of all your other offences.

I shall only add here, that, by entering thus early into the communion of a church, you will be brought under the more immediate inspection of the pastor of it, and likewise of your Christian brethren; whose faithful and tender admonitions may be of great assistance to your unexperienced youth, and happily promote your progress both in the paths of prudence and of holiness. Nay, the very thoughts of having drawn upon you the eyes of a society, and of others too, would engage you to some more than ordinary care, that you might not incur their censure, or disappoint the expectations which many have raised of you. And, in confirmation of all this, I cannot but observe, that many of the most eminent Christians I have ever known, were found amongst those, who in their early days took this method of giving themselves to God and his people.—I might further show you,

(2.) That your compliance with the exhortation I am now enforcing, might be useful to others, as well as to yourselves.

This is indeed, in part, a consequence of the former; for, the more your own souls are advanced in knowledge and holiness, the more capable and the more ready will you be, to promote the interest of Christ in the world, and to do good to those that are round about you. But I would especially lead you to consider, that your attendance itself, separate from these remoter consequences of it, might probably be useful to others.

Other young persons would, very probably, be awakened to a sense of their duty by your example; and those who are more advanced in years may be shamed out of their neglect, when they see those, who are so far below them in age, getting the start of them here. Nor have instances been wanting within the circle of our own acquaintance, where parents have been stirred up to a holy emulation, by the early zeal of their own children in this respect. It will be a joy to all that wish well to the cause of a Redeemer, to see that God is giving him youth, like the drops of morning dew, and causing converts to flock to him, like doves unto their windows: but ministers will have a peculiar share in the pleasure, when they see of the travail of their soul, and find, that there are at least some instances, in which they do not labour in vain, and spend their strength for nought. Especially shall those of us, who are entering on the work of the Lord,* rejoice to meet our younger brethren at this ordinance, as it will give us encouragement to hope, that religion will not die in our hands, and be buried in the graves of our more aged friends; but will be supported and adorned by you, and transmitted to those that are yet unborn. The joy of our heart on this occasion may add vigour, as well as pleasure, to our labours; and so, through the concurrence of almighty grace, may have a tendency to render them still more successful.

Let me then entreat and conjure you, by the authority of the King of glory and of grace, and by a regard to the honour, the pleasure, and the usefulness, of your lives, that you no longer persist in the neglect of an ordinance so sacred and noble, so delightful and advantageous.

I am persuaded, you must know and own, that the arguments I have urged are both evident and weighty; and yet I fear, you will find something to oppose to them, which if it be not examined, may prevent, or at least diminish, their success. I proceed, therefore,

II. To obviate some objections, which may be offered in excuse for a longer delay.

And here I shall not raise difficulties merely to canvass them, but confine myself to such objections as I have heard some urge on this occasion; and shall briefly suggest some hints, by way of answer to them. And if the enumeration of them be not so large, or the reply so full, as you could wish, you know where you will be always welcome to propose your scruples as freely, and to state them as amply, as you please.

1. The most obvious reply to the preceding address is, that "you fear you are not prepared for this ordinance, and therefore apprehend, that your attendance would prove dangerous, rather than beneficial."

To this I answer; if the case be indeed thus, I have already told you, that you are not the persons to whom I have been addressing. Nevertheless, give me leave to remind you, that you ought not rashly to form such a conclusion against yourselves. I am sure the matter requires a very attentive examination; and perhaps, on such a review, you may find things are not so bad as you imagine.

You say, you are not prepared; but I hope you know, that there is a great deal of difference between the nature and importance of an actual and habitual preparation. It is plain, that actual preparation consists in those extraordinary devotions, which, when opportunity permits, we should use in our approach to this sacrament; and therefore supposes such an approach to be determined, and consequently there can be no room, in the present case, to object the want of that.

But you fear, that you are not habitually prepared, i. e. that you are not persons of such a temper and character as Christ, the great Lord of the feast, has invited, and will welcome to it. To determine that, consider the purposes for which the ordinance was appointed, and observe how far your present temper corresponds to them. It was appointed to commemorate the death of Christ, and, in this view, all are fit for it, who regard him as the great atoning sacrifice, and desire that their hearts may be affected, and their lives influenced, by a sense of his dying love. It is a pledge of our mutual affection to each other, even to all our brethren in the Lord; and in this respect, all are prepared for it whose hearts are divested of all turbulent and unfriendly passions, and overflow with undissembled charity and diffusive benevolence. True, will you perhaps say; but is it not also designed as a seal of the covenant of grace? It certainly is; and it must be a very criminal profanation to attend it, while an alien from that covenant: your determination therefore must turn on the answer which conscience will make, as to your readiness to enter yourselves into it. For if this be your prevailing desire, and stedfast resolution, you have not only a right to the ordinance, though it be a seal of the covenant; but its being appointed by Christ, in this view, is an additional and very weighty argument for your immediate and frequent attendance upon it. And here the question is in short this; "Do you sincerely desire to make an unreserved surrender of yourselves to God, as your owner, ruler, and supreme felicity, with a humble dependence on the mediation of his Son, and the enlivening and sanctifying influences of his Spirit?" If this be your prevailing desire, and sincere purpose, you may assure yourselves of the kindest welcome, though your graces may be attended with a great deal of imperfection and weakness. But if you are strangers to such a desire, I must allow the objection in its full force, and own that you have no business at the table of the Lord.

Nevertheless, I cannot part with you so. Oh, my friends, is there nothing mournful, and, I will add, is there nothing dreadful, in such a conclusion as this? "I have no business at the table of the Lord; I have no part in this blessed repast, because I have no part in that Redeemer, whose death is commemorated there: and therefore I am shut out, by his own appointment shut out! and is not that a sad intimation with respect to what is yet to come! When I enter upon the invisible and eternal state, as I this night may, will he admit me to live and reign with him in a world of glory, who would not allow me so much as an approach to his table on earth? Oh, my soul, it is too plain thou must be separated from his blissful presence, and driven to an eternal distance, whence thou wilt behold with despairing eyes those pious souls, who have eaten and drank with him here, sitting down with him in his kingdom." This will not seem a little matter then: O that it might now be duly regarded!

From all this it will appear, that if this objection from an unprepared temper be true, it ought not to be lightly passed over, but should rather be seriously considered, and the removal of it, through divine assistance, immediately attempted; since, till you are prepared for this sacrament, you cannot be prepared for heaven; and consequently are in circumstances of the extremest danger, and daily walk on the precipice of eternal ruin.

But I would hope, many of you, on inquiry, find this is not your character and case. The unfitness you object will amount to no more than this; that you find grace weak and languid in your souls, though you have reason to hope you are not wholly destitute of it. And is this a just excuse for absenting yourselves from so confirming and edifying, as well as so delightful, an ordinance? It is just as reasonable, as if you were to plead, "I am very faint, and therefore I will not take the most noble, reviving cordial. I am very weak, and therefore I will refuse the most nourishing and strengthening food." Thus much for the first objection. It is more than time that I proceed to those that remain.

2. Others fear, that "the society of Christians, to which they would join themselves, may be unwilling to admit them into such a relation."

Now I must own, that if this objection be made by persons who have been notorious on account of their immoralities, and who are but lately recovered to a sense of divine things, it will not admit of an immediate answer; nor can I invite such to this sacred ordinance, till they give evidence of the reality of a change in their heart, by an apparent reformation of life, and some steady and prevalent resolution in a religious course: in the mean time, a regard to the honour of Christian society may oblige the church to be a little reserved towards such persons, and such a reserve is consistent with the greatest tenderness towards them, and the most affectionate concern, that they may not break the bruised reed, or quench the smoking flax.

But as for such young persons, or others, who have been preserved from such irregularities, whose conduct has been fair and honourable, and who have not only arrived at a competent knowledge of the great truths of Christianity, but have for some time been impressed with them, so that they have formed a determinate resolution for the service of God, and, it may be, for some years made trial of his ways; far be it from us, my brethren, to say one word to discourage your approach. On the contrary, we would rather invite it; for we know it is most evidently reasonable, that when the Spirit appears to say, Come, the bride, i. e. the church, should echo back the call. We know, my friends, that we are not the masters of this holy feast: we know, that it is not for us to set bounds of our own about this sacred table, and say, "Thus low must you bow to us, before you take your seats there." This is a conduct, which we not only abhor, as inhumanity to you, but dread, as an insolent usurpation on the rights of our common Lord. If you have indeed tasted that the Lord is gracious, you will not sure be unwilling, with meekness and modesty, to give some reason of the hope that is in you: and blessed be God, we have not so learned Christ, as to make our own phrases, or forms, or any thing singular in our own experiences, or the customs of our own society, the standard by which we judge either of the faith or the piety of our brethren.

3. You may, perhaps, further plead, that "you fear lest, if you should enter into the church, you should dishonour it by an unsuitable behaviour, which might bring a reproach on religion, and its blessed Author."

But give me leave to say, that this very fear argues such a tenderness, and such a humility of soul, as may in a great measure answer itself. I hope you go forth in the strength of the Lord, as well as making mention of his righteousness alone: and you must know, that if a bare possibility of falling into sin were to exclude from this ordinance, the most confirmed Christian upon earth could not dare to approach it. But while you see your own weakness, and maintain, on the one hand, such a jealousy over yourselves, and, on the other hand, such a zeal for the honour of religion, it is a certain evidence, that you are not yet left of God, and a most comfortable sign, that he will never forsake you. Nay I will add, that I know none more likely to prove the ornaments of a society, than those who have such humble apprehensions, lest they should prove its reproach.

4. Others may be ready to excuse their absenting themselves from this ordinance, "because it is so commonly neglected by professing Christians."

Now as for this, I bless God, it is far from being a singular thing amongst us, to see the table of the Lord furnished with guests, and young Christians taking their places there. I speak it with great pleasure and thankfulness. But suppose it were otherwise; what if the neglect of this institution were much more common, both amongst the aged and the young, than it is in most worshipping assemblies; could you have the heart to draw an argument from thence: "My dearest Friend, my most gracious Benefactor, is generally neglected; his dying command, his dying love, is in a great measure forgotten; and therefore I will forget him, and I will neglect him?" Say, Christians, could a generous mind reconcile itself to such a thought? Could a pious soul draw such a consequence as this? Methinks the argument lies quite the contrary way: "Therefore, O my compassionate Saviour, will I attend with the greater solicitude, that I may, if possible, shame others out of their neglect; or at least, may in part supply their lack of service, and bear my own testimony against an ungrateful generation, who call themselves thy disciples, and neglect this distinguishing badge of their profession, this gracious memorial of thy dying love."

5. Others may plead "the apprehensions of aggravated guilt and ruin, if, after sacramental engagements, they should apostatize from God."

To this I answer, that I hope you, my friends, are not so unacquainted with the nature of this ordinance, and the constitution of the gospel, as to imagine that it consigns us over to certain damnation, if in any instance we afterwards deviate from the paths of our duty; for, if it were so, who then could be saved? But it is probable your fears refer to total apostasy. If so, I readily own that, should this be the case, it would in a dreadful degree inflame your guilt and aggravate your misery, that you had not only known the way of righteousness, but that you had eaten and drank in the presence of the Lord. But have you any thoughts of drawing back from him, that you are thus cautious to avoid an instituted ordinance, merely because, in that case, it would aggravate your ruin? So would every prayer you offer, and every sermon you hear; but should that thought prevent your coming to the throne of grace, or drive you from the house of God?

Nay, to strike home, I will add, that with regard to you, my friends, the caution comes too late. I speak of those who have not only tasted of the good word of God, and of the powers of the world to come, but have made trial of the ways of wisdom and piety, and have had some experience in them; and as for you, I must plainly and faithfully declare, that it is not for you, of all people in the world, to think of gentle flames and tolerable damnation. No, my brethren, that hope, wretched as it is, if you shall fall away, is unavoidably cut off from you; and all your schemes must be for nothing less than certain salvation and exalted glory. And to your comfort let me tell you, that though it is always the duty of him that thinketh he standeth, to take heed lest he fall, yet you have all imaginable reason to trust the promises of an everlasting covenant, and to rely upon the great Redeemer, who hath declared, that he will give unto his sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of his hand, or be able to separate them from his love. If, then, you fear the dreadful consequences of apostasy, which would, indeed, be dreadful beyond all your fears, keep near to him as the great Shepherd; and let those very fears rather engage you to an early and diligent attendance on this, and every other appointed method of approach, than drive you away from it. It is most reasonable to say, "Since there are so many professors that draw back even to perdition, I will wait upon the Lord, that I may renew my strength, and so be enabled to endure to the end, that I may receive the end of my faith in the salvation of my soul." If your fears operate thus, they may be a means of preventing the evil, of which you are so apprehensive.

On the whole, I hope, that when you weigh all I have been saying, and compare it with whatever can be objected against it, you will be convinced of your duty, and engaged to an immediate compliance with it. I have enlarged so copiously on these things, that, in the last place,

III. I can only mention two or three inferences, which will naturally arise from what I have been laying before you.

From hence we might infer, that great care ought to be taken to instruct youth in the principles of religion; that they may not be destitute of such an acquaintance with them, as is one necessary part of preparation for this ordinance, though far from being alone sufficient.

We may also infer, that more aged Christians ought carefully to cultivate serious impressions, which may be made on the minds of their children, servants, and others of the rising generation, that they may be engaged to an early compliance with their duty; while, on the other hand, great care ought surely to be taken, that there be nothing rigorous and severe in the terms of admission, which may bear hard upon that modesty and tenderness of spirit which is generally to be found in young Christians, and most eminently in those of the most hopeful and amiable characters.

As for those of a more advanced age, who have lived in the continued neglect of this great and excellent institution, I hope they have long before this inferred the guilt and folly of their omission, which so evidently appears from all I have been saying, and it is attended with many other aggravations, which my time will not now permit me to mention.

I shall therefore conclude with observing, that those young persons, who, through grace, have been convinced of their duty in this instance, and brought to an early compliance with it, have abundant reason to reflect upon it with pleasure and thankfulness. I think it is one of the most important blessings of my life, that there are many such in the church here; many who, through the divine goodness, have lately been added to it. It would not be easy for me, my dear brethren and friends, to say how great pleasure your presence and society adds to my sacrament days; or what a delightful prospect it gives me, not only as to the comfort of my own more advanced age, but as to the support of religion here, when I am no longer amongst you. I, and our more aged friends, have reason to rejoice on this occasion; but surely you yourselves have much greater reason. Permit me to remind you, that it will be a most proper expression of your thankfulness, to labour with the utmost care to engage other young persons, your brethren and companions, to come and share with you in this feast. I hope your own experience of the pleasure and advantage which attends it, may be added to the other arguments I have been pleading. As for your own conduct, let me most affectionately entreat, and most solemnly charge you, not only by all other arguments, but by your sacramental vows; by the eyes of God and of man, that are upon you; by all our expectations from you, and all your engagements to us; that as you have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so you would walk in him. And may almighty grace strengthen and quicken you in your progress; and crown that fair morning, which is opening upon us, in so delightful a manner, with a long, a bright, and a prosperous day! Amen.

SERMON IX

THE ORPHAN'S HOPE

PSALM xxvii. 10.

*When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up.

THERE are few precepts of the gospel which will appear more easy to a humane and generous mind, than that in which we are required to weep with them that weep. And surely there are few circumstances of private life, which will more readily command our mournful sympathy, than those of that afflicted family, to the poor remains of which you will naturally, on the first hearing of these words, direct your thoughts, and, perhaps, your eyes too. The circumstances of a family, which God hath broken with breach upon breach; of those distressed children, whose father and mother have forsaken them, almost at once; and who have since been visited with another stroke, which, if alone, had been very grievous, and when added to such a weight of former sorrows, is, I fear, almost insupportable.

I believe all of you, who are acquainted with the case, sincerely pity them, and wish their relief: but I am under some peculiar obligations to desire and attempt it; not only on account of my public character, but as I know the heart of an orphan, having myself been deprived of both my parents, at an age, in which it might reasonably be supposed a child should be most sensible of such a loss. I cannot recollect any scripture, which was then more comfortable, as I think none could have been more suitable, to me, than this which is now before us; and I the rather choose to insist upon it, as it will naturally lead me into some reflections, which I hope, by the divine blessing, may be of general use. "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up."

As for the psalm from whence these words are taken, we are told in the title, that it was composed by David, but are left to conjecture the particular occasion of it. Dr. Patrick refers it to the latter end of his time, and to the combat that he had with the Philistines in his declining age; when we are told that David waxed faint, and was in great danger of being killed by a giant, if Abishai the brother of Joab had not seasonably rescued him; upon which it is added, that his subjects sware he should no more go out to battle, lest he should quench the light of Israel. To these words David is supposed to allude, when he says, The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? Mine enemies come upon me to eat up my flesh: and, I had fainted unless I had believed. But I am rather inclined to conjecture, that this psalm was composed by him in his younger years, when he was under persecution from Saul. There is not a line in it which doth not agree to this supposition; and there are several verses which cannot so well be accommodated to the other; especially the 12th, in which he represents his dangers as arising from false witnesses. Now it is not easy to imagine what mischief they could have done him amongst the Philistines, who opposed him in a national, rather than a personal, quarrel; but he expressly declares elsewhere, that the lying words of some treacherous persons had exasperated Saul against him; and complains of false tongues, in those psalms which are by their title fixed to this period of his history. I might add, that the words of the text seem to favour this supposition; for David doth not here say, that his father and mother had already forsaken him, but only speaks of it as what might happen. Now, as we are elsewhere told, that when David was but a lad, his father was an old man, it is very improbable that both Jesse and his wife should have been living at the time of this Philistine war, when David himself was grown old and feeble.

If this argument be of weight to fix the general occasion of the psalm, it is probable that this verse may lead us to the particular time of its composure. We are told, that when David had taken shelter at Adullam from the violence of Saul, and had raised a band of men for his defence, he conveyed his father and mother to the king of Moab, desiring that, till Providence had brought his affairs to a determination, that prince would shelter them from the fury of Saul, which might otherwise have proved fatal to them, as it had just before done to the priests of the Lord. Perhaps this was the pious reflection of David, about the time his parents were to remove: When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up. As if he should have said, "Though a host of my enemies be encamping against me, and the nation be rising in arms to oppose me; and though I be forced to dismiss my aged parents, at a time when I have the greatest occasion for their prudent advice, and their tender consolations; yet this is my comfort, that God is with me. He will supply what I lose in them; he will take me up, and nourish me as his own child, when their parental tenderness can afford me no further support."

The words will naturally afford us these two plain remarks, which, with the improvement of them, will be the foundation of the present discourse.

I. The dearest of our relatives, and the most valuable of our friends, may possibly forsake us.

II. When good men are abandoned by their dearest friends, they may find more in God than they have lost in them.—When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up.

I. The dearest of our relatives, and the most valuable of our friends, may possibly forsake us.

You see David speaks of it, as at least a supposable case, with regard to himself, that not only his followers, his companions, and his brethren, but even his father and his mother, might forsake him. All the intimacy of relation, all the endearment of affection, could not secure him from being deserted by them. And this may be our own case;—our friends may abandon us through their own unkindness,—or God may remove them by the stroke of his providence.

1. Our dearest friends may abandon us through their own unkindness.

It is the remarkable saying of one, who had made many serious reflections on this head;* "If you put so much confidence in any friend, as not to consider, that it is possible he may become your enemy, you know man but little, and perhaps may be taught to know him better to your cost." Change of circumstances, contrariety of interest, our own mistakes, the misrepresentations of others, and sometimes mere caprice, and inconstancy of temper, render those indifferent, and perhaps averse, to each other, who were once united in the bonds of the most endearing friendship. Nay, it is certain, that sometimes an immoderate and ungoverned fondness on both sides, may not only justly provoke God to disappoint our hopes from each other, but may prove, in its natural consequences, an occasion of mutual disgust, and perhaps of separation. For, when the mind labours under this disorder, it contracts a kind of sickly peevishness, which turns every trifling neglect into an offence, and every offence into a crime; so that men find the extremes of love and hatred more nearly connected, than they could once have believed. Sudden fear will drive away some friends when we are in danger; and a much meaner principle will lead others, who, in better days, have called themselves our friends, to abandon, and, perhaps, to censure us, when we are reduced to low circumstances, and so have the greatest need of their assistance.

Such is the vanity of human friendship. And I will add, that neither, on the one hand, the sincerity of our affection, nor the worth of our character, nor the urgency of our affairs; nor, on the other hand, the former appearance of goodness in them, nor the highest obligations of gratitude; nor yet, the nearest ties of blood, or alliance, can secure us from disappointment in this tender article. David and Job, under the Old Testament, and Paul, and even his blessed Master, under the New, though all such excellent persons, were forsaken, and in several respects injured, by their friends; nay, I may say, as to most of them, by pious friends too. Such treatment therefore may we meet with from ours, even from those to whom we are related in the bonds of nature as well as affection. What union can be more strict and endearing, than that of marriage? Yet, you know, Job complains, while he was in circumstances which might have drawn tears from the eyes of a stranger, that his wife seemed to have forgot, not only the tenderness of her sex, and the intimacy of her relation, but even all sense of common humanity towards him. My breath, says he, is strange to my wife, though I entreated her for the children's sake of my own body. From whom could we expect greater tenderness, than from parents to their children, especially from mothers to their infant offspring? Yet God expressly declares, what has indeed been seen in some amazing instances, that this may fail. Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the child of her womb? The little tender creature, that she has borne in her body, that she has been used to lay in her bosom; the poor innocent, that never offended her, that has all his dependence upon her; whom nature would therefore prompt her most resolutely to defend, most tenderly to cherish; can she forget it? Yea, they may forget, saith the Lord. This strange case may happen; it may happen in repeated instances. Thus may our dearest friends, and even our parents themselves, abandon us through their own unkindness. But be they ever so constant and affectionate, it is certain,

2. They may be taken away from us by the stroke of divine providence.

Whilst we are in the most delightful manner conversing with our friends, God may bring us into such circumstances, that we shall see ourselves obliged in duty to quit the dearest of them, possibly even contrary to their judgment and advice, as well as their importunate entreaties; or they may see themselves obliged, on the same principles, to quit us; so that we may seldom have the opportunity of seeing each other, and enjoying the pleasure of mutual converse.

But the severest trial is, when God sees fit to remove them by death. When that awful messenger gives the summons, we must part, though ever so desirous of continuing together. None can by any means deliver his brother from going down to the grave, nor give to God a ransom for him, though he should offer his own life under that view. Our fathers, where are they? And, I may add, where are many of our brethren of the same age, and once in the same stations of life with ourselves? What multitudes of them are already removed by death! Perhaps, more than are left behind. We have followed them to the grave, we have left them in the dust, and their places that knew them, know them no more. And if we are not quickly taken away ourselves, we must expect that our breaches will soon be multiplied upon us; and that nothing will remain of those dear creatures whom we now behold with tenderness and with transport, but a mournful remembrance that we once enjoyed them, and a despair of recovering them again, till we meet in the eternal world.

I will only add one very obvious reflection upon this head, and then proceed to the next.

May the dearest of our friends so soon forsake us? Then how careful should we be, that we do not value them too highly, and love them too fondly!

We find in Scripture, that the inconstancy and the mortality of human nature, are each of them urged as an argument against trusting in man. Thus we are cautioned to take heed every one of his neighbour, and trust not in any brother; for every brother will utterly supplant, and every neighbour will walk with slanders. And elsewhere we are bid to cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of? And how indeed can we reckon on any thing as certain, which is suspended on so uncertain a life? The words of Solomon are applicable to friends, as well as to riches, when he says, Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for they make themselves wings, and flee away; often swiftly and irrecoverably, as an eagle towards heaven. To set them up as idols, therefore, in the place of God, is the readiest way to provoke him to remove or imbitter them: and then our own iniquity, in this respect, will correct us. Our confident expectation from them will increase our perplexity and our shame, if they should forsake us through their own unkindness; and our excessive fondness for them will add new pangs to the agonies of a last separation. One way or another, they will prove broken reeds, that will not only fail and sink under us, but will go into our hand, and pierce it with a wound, which will be deep and painful, in proportion to the stress with which we have leaned upon them. On the whole, then, let us love our friends heartily, but let us love them cautiously, as changeable and as mortal creatures: and, from a conviction that it is possible they may forsake us, let us make it our greatest care to secure an interest in such consolations, as may be a support to us when they do. Which leads me to the second observation:

II. That when good men are abandoned by their dearest friends, they may find more in God than they have lost in them.

So David in the text declares his assurance, that when his father and his mother forsook him, then the Lord would take him up; i. e. would approve himself a friend and a father to him. And if we be Christians indeed, we may promise ourselves all that tenderness and care from him, which David and other saints of old expected and found. He hath said to every one of us, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee; and for our peculiar support under the loss of the dearest and most useful relatives, he has more particularly added, A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation.

When our friends are dead, we are generally more sensible of their value than we were before; but let the tenderest heart, under the immediate impression of this severe calamity, set itself to paint the character of a departed friend in all its most amiable colours; let it reckon up all the advantages which fondness could have taught it to hope for; and I will answer for it, that all this, and a great deal more, is to be found in God. Let the dejected orphan, that is even now weeping over the dust of a parent, yea, of both its parents, say, what these parents, in the greatest supposable advantages of character and circumstance, could have done for its support, and its consolation; and the complaints of the most pathetic sorrow shall suggest thoughts which may serve, in a great measure, to answer themselves, and to engage the mind joyfully to acquiesce in the divine care, though deserted by the best of parents, or any other friends, however hopeful or useful.

"Alas!" will a dutiful and affectionate child be ready to say, in such a circumstance, "do you ask what my parents were? They were my dearest, my kindest, my most valuable friends:—Their counsels guided me;—their care protected me;—their daily converse was the joy of my life;—their tender condolence revived me under my sorrows;—their liberal bounty supplied my necessities. Is it to be inquired, what they were? Say rather, what were they not? And now they are gone, where must I seek such friends? And how justly may I say, that my dearest comforts and hopes lie buried with their precious remains?"

Let us more particularly survey each of these thoughts, and consider, with how much greater advantage each of these particulars is to be found in the paternal care and favour of God.

1. Could your parents have advised you in difficulties and perplexities? God is much more able to do it.

You will perhaps say, "Our poor giddy unpractised minds have been hurried with a variety of schemes and projects, and we have soon found ourselves bewildered and lost: but then it has been the greatest pleasure to us to apply to our parents, from whose more advanced age, and riper experience, we might well hope for considerable assistance. We were sure they would not upbraid our ignorance, or despise us for our weakness; but would give us their best advice, with endearing tenderness, and a cordial concern for our welfare." I allow, my friends, that if they were wise and good, (which we now suppose,) they were valuable counsellors indeed; and that it was your duty, and your happiness, to use them as such while living, and as such to lament them now they are here no more. Yet, were they ever so prudent, you must still acknowledge they were fallible creatures. They could only form probable conjectures concerning the future consequences of things; and as those conjectures were always precarious, so, no doubt, they were sometimes erroneous; and you were, perhaps, in some instances, misled by their mistaken apprehensions. But the only wise God knows the end from the beginning; his views of the most distant futurities are not conjectural, but certain; and his wisdom is far more superior to that of the most sagacious and experienced mortal, than the wisdom of such a mortal can be superior to that of an infant. It is he that teaches man knowledge, in whatever degree he possesses it. He instructed our parents, that they might instruct us; and he has expressly promised his direction to all those that humbly seek it. The meek will he guide in judgment, and the meek will he teach his way. You may therefore, according to his own instruction and command, cry unto him, My father, thou art the guide of my youth; and you will find him such a guide, as can give wisdom to the simple, and to the young man knowledge and discretion.

2. Could your earthly parents have protected you from injuries? God is much more able to do it.

Nature has implanted, even in irrational animals, such a regard to the safety of their offspring, that many of the most weak and timorous of them become strangely courageous in their defence. The little bird, that will at other times fly from every noise and every motion, will hover over her young, when they are assaulted with danger; and, rather than she will forsake them, will share in their ruin. It is easy to perceive the spirit of parents naturally rise on the least injury that is offered to their children, even sometimes when it is only accidental, and undesigned; and all the professed enemies of their children they of course reckon to be their own. Nor do they only watch over them in their infancy and childhood, to defend them from the many dangers which surround those tender days; but in more advanced years, they are ready to use all their power and their influence, to shelter them from the unworthy usage which they might otherwise expect from an ill-natured world: and I own, it is a very melancholy thing for young people to lose such a guard, at a time when they are most exposed.

But surely the defence of the Almighty must be a much juster and nobler confidence. It is amazing to observe, in how condescending a manner he expresses his care for the protection of his people. In one place he says, He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye; and elsewhere, He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust; i. e. he shall defend thee, as the bird shelters her little helpless brood, from the assault of any thing that would injure or destroy them. And could we desire a better guard? There are many seasons, when our earthly parents must of necessity be separated from us; and a thousand calamities might overtake and destroy us, even in their presence, while they stood by helpless and amazed; but God is always with his children, and as there is no danger of ours unseen by him, there can be none from which he is not able to deliver us. When David was forsaken by his father and mother, and surrounded with a whole army of inhuman enemies, he speaks of this as his comfort. The Lord is my light, and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident; for in his help I shall be safe, though I stood single against united legions.

3. Did you hope for agreeable entertainment in the company of your earthly parents? You may expect far nobler pleasure in conversing with God.

I acknowledge there is something peculiarly delightful in the company of a wise, a pious, and an indulgent parent; and I doubt not, but many of us can easily recollect it. Even in our infant days, when we were fondly prattling to them, we perhaps often saw smiles of complacency sitting on their cheeks, and even tears of tenderness and pleasure rising in their eyes; especially if, with the dawnings of reason, they discovered in our minds any early impressions of religion; we can perhaps recollect the condescending air with which they talked to us, and the kind caresses which they intermingled with the discourse. And as we grew up to a riper understanding, we were still more charmed with the company of such parents. We had not only the manly pleasure of rational converse, but there was a mixture of reverence and of gratitude in our hearts, which much increased the delight. We were assured of their candour towards their children, and their prejudice in favour of what we might say; and that inspired us with spirit and cheerfulness. We were encouraged to attempt to please them, because we concluded we might easily do it; and the sense we had of the superiority on their parts, made every expression of their kindness so much the more sweet and obliging.

The loss of such conversation is indeed to be greatly lamented; and it would argue a strange mixture of stupidity and inhumanity to be unaffected with it. But still remember, that though your parents are gone, you are not left entirely alone; for not to mention other surviving friends, your heavenly Father is with you, if it be your prevailing desire still to be with him. Though your father and your mother be removed, and you can no longer go to them, unless it be to mourn over their grave, and to mingle your tears with their dust; yet you may go to God, and with pleasure pour out your soul before him. And what you find in him, may give a more transporting exercise to those sweet affections which added a relish to the conversation of your earthly parents. The first imperfect accents of prayer and praise will be a pleasing offering to him. Great and glorious as he is, he will bow down an indulgent ear, through Jesus, your dear elder brother; he will smile upon your souls, and allow you a holy freedom in all the endearments of filial converse.

Your earthly parents were not always at leisure, nor always in temper to receive your visits; but wherever you are, and whatever you are doing, God's gracious eye is always on his children; his indulgent ear is always open to their addresses. You may come and tell him how heartily you love him, how affectionate a sense you have of his favours, how sincerely you are concerned for his interest in the world, and how earnestly desirous of taking every opportunity to advance it; how well you are satisfied with his paternal care, and how cheerfully you can refer yourselves to his wise and gracious disposal. Our Lord intimates, that we may use such a holy boldness with God, when he teaches us to say, Our Father, which art in heaven; and the apostle further expresses it, when he speaks of the Spirit of adoption, as teaching us to cry, Abba, Father.

4. Could your earthly parents have pitied your sorrows and complaints? The like compassions may you expect from God, if you apply to him under the character of a father.

It is natural for a child, when any thing grieves it, to go to its parents, and complain to them; and if they cannot redress the grievance, at least they will be ready to condole it. Now we are expressly told in the word of God, that, like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him. And how much more valuable are the compassions of God, than those of our earthly parents could possibly have been! In many cases theirs was only a mourning pity, and all that they could often do for our relief, was to sit down and weep over us: to afflict themselves with us; and to give us their company in distress: but the compassions of an almighty God can redress the grievances which he commiserates. Be our afflictions ever so many, or ever so great; in sickness and in pain; in the agonies of conscience, or the agonies of death; when parents and other friends are but miserable comforters, he alone can support the soul; can soothe it into serenity and peace; and can exalt it to the most triumphant joy.

5. Could your earthly parents have supplied your wants, and have made provision for your future subsistence? God is infinitely more able and ready to do it for his children.

In our years of infancy, though we had hardly any thing we could call our own, we made ourselves easy in this, that our parents would take care of us; and sometimes the circumstances of families are such, that their care is almost all that the children have to depend upon. When this is the case, none can wonder that it is considered as a great aggravation of the loss. But, surely, when God proclaims himself a Father to the fatherless, he intends to suggest some encouragement to such helpless orphans as these; and it becomes them to take the comfort of it.

Earthly parents may sometimes be so indigent that they cannot, and sometimes so unkind that they will not, relieve their children, at least in such a proportion as their necessities require. But the most high God is the possessor of heaven and earth, and his goodness is as extensive as his dominion; we may therefore conclude, that he will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish. There is not one parent in ten thousand so unnatural, as that he could stand by and see his child perish for hunger, while it was in the power of his hand to relieve him. Now our Lord hath taught us to argue thus: If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give good things unto them that ask him?

God has the estates and the hearts of all in his hands; and therefore can, with the utmost ease, raise up friends to us in the most abandoned circumstances, who shall act the part of parents to us, and do more for us than they could have done. And it is further to be remembered, that the bounties of God are far more excellent, than those of any mortal friend could possibly be. Their bounty, be it ever so great, cannot reach beyond the grave; but it is our Father's good pleasure to give us a kingdom, incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away: in the believing, though distant, views of which, we are rich amidst the extremest poverty, and happy in the most miserable circumstances that can be consistent with such a hope.

You see then, on the whole, how much more the good man may find in God, than he can possibly lose in the most valuable earthly parents.

It only remains, that I conclude the discourse with a few reflections on this second observation.

1. Let us thankfully acknowledge the gracious provision which God has made to support his people under the loss of parents and friends.

We should bless his name, that he does not leave us to sink under the burthen; or at best to collect some uncertain comfort from the precarious conclusions of our unassisted reason; but that, through the blood and righteousness of his Son, he has given his plain and express promise for the encouragement of such inconsiderable and undeserving creatures.

You, whose parents are living, ought to be thankful, that God hath provided such reviving cordials for you against the mournful time when they may be taken away.

And we, who have lost our parents, and have found relief in our extremities from such declarations as these, should recollect it with pleasure, and often repeat our songs of grateful acknowledgment.

And I will further add, we ought not only to rejoice and be thankful on our own account, but also on account of those afflicted friends who may receive support from such strong consolations. We pity children that have lost their parents; and it is delightful to see other generous persons rising up to take care of the orphans, and in some respect to make up their loss. But how much more delightful it should be to us, to hear an Almighty God proclaiming himself as their great guardian, and saying, that when their father and their mother forsake them, he will graciously take them up. How should we rejoice, that when we set ourselves to comfort and encourage them, we can not only advance our own conjectures, but can thus speak to them in the language of God himself. And indeed this reflection may be applied to all the other promises. We ought to rejoice, that our pious friends have an interest in them, and that God hath consulted their support and consolation, as well as our own.

And surely, when we are reflecting upon such a promise as this, our affectionate thoughts and praises should arise to him, in whom all the promises of God are Yea and Amen. It is natural to say, "Whence is it that thou, the holy Majesty of heaven, wilt appear under such endearing and tender characters to sinful mortals? that thou wilt speak of taking them up? of bestowing one gracious look upon them, and much more of extending an arm of mercy to raise them from that helpless condition in which they naturally lie, like abandoned outcasts? Whence is it that thou wilt take them into thy family now, and into thy kingdom at last?" (For all this is intimated in this expression.) "Lord," may each of us say, "I humbly ascribe it to the riches of thy gospel grace. I would declare it to the everlasting honour of Jesus thy Son, that it is through him we have received the adoption."

2. What an engagement should this be to young persons, to endeavour to secure an interest in God through Christ!

You must own the consolations, which I have now been representing, to be far from being small: and surely, when you consider how soon the best of your mortal friends may fail, you cannot but wish for an interest in them: but you wish it in vain, unless you seek it in the gospel way; unless you deliberately and resolutely choose God for your Father in Christ, and devote yourselves to him in the bonds of an everlasting covenant. If you refuse this, you have reason to regard him under the character of an enemy; and to fear, that when he removes your friends, it is in judgment that he visits you with such a blow. Your hearts may justly meditate terror, if this be the case; especially when your pious parents are taken away. You are then deprived of their prayers, their exhortations, their advices, and their examples; and so seem to be thrown further out of the way of repentance and reformation. And let me add, that if almighty grace doth not prevent it, the trouble which you now feel, in being separated from such dear relations while you continue on earth, will be the smallest part of your unhappiness; for you must finally be separated, not only from all the most valuable persons you have ever known here, but, which is infinitely more, from the presence of the blessed God himself; must fall unpitied victims of the divine justice, and be delivered over to dwell with your father the devil, whose works you have chosen to do. And oh! how unutterably dreadful is it to think, that in the awful day, when this sentence is to be pronounced and executed upon you, there will not be one friend to plead in your favour! That though your pious parents be then present, yet, in a most terrible sense, father and mother will then forsake you indeed; and, instead of interposing their entreaties for you, will applaud the righteous vengeance that dooms you as obstinate rebels to eternal death; to those abodes of distinguished misery which are prepared for such as have broke through all the peculiar advantages which will then be found chargeable to your account.

3. Let what I have been saying be considered by parents, as an encouragement cheerfully to leave their religious children in the hands of God, when Providence shall see fit to make the separation.

When through the riches of gospel grace, a Christian parent sees his own eternal concerns so safe in a Redeemer's hands, that he can say, with respect to them, I desire to depart; yet sometimes he feels reluctance mingling itself with the holy desire, when he considers that he must leave his dear children behind him; perhaps in a destitute, and always, if they be very young, in a hazardous, condition. And this thought presses with peculiar weight on the minds of those who have lost the companion of their lives; as, upon their decease, their children will become entirely orphans. But may it not revive you to hear, that God will be their guardian, if they be willing to choose him as such? Surely you may be abundantly satisfied with his care. Alas! what were you yourselves, with all your parental tenderness, but instruments which God made use of for conveying some few of his favours to them? And cannot he do that by others which he hath been doing by you? Distrust not his power or his faithfulness; but turn all your anxious care about future events, into a religious concern to do your duty to your children, and by all the most prudent and affectionate methods of address, to lead them into the early knowledge of God in Christ; that so, through the mercies of an everlasting covenant, they may stand entitled to the special protection of a heavenly Father, who can never be separated from them; and who, as he is never unable, will never prove unwilling, to help them. Once more,

4. Let distressed orphans have an immediate and frequent recourse to such supporting considerations as these:—

Do not allow yourselves to suspect the truth of these exceeding great and precious promises, which have now been set before you; and, for your further encouragement, consider in how many instances they have been confirmed by experience.

There are, my friends, I am sure there are, those amongst us this day, who can set their seal to the truth of what has now been spoken; and can say, in the language of the text, That when our father and our mother did both of them forsake us, then the Lord actually took us, and proved a most gracious parent to us. He supplied the breaches that he had made, and by a train of providence, which we cannot but admire in the review, raised up other friends for us; and, it may be, inspired almost with the tenderness of parents, persons who were ever unknown to us, when the last of our parents was taken away. Nay, perhaps, some of us may say, that the death of a valuable parent, which we feared would be our ruin, has proved, in some of its then unthought-of consequences, on the whole, a very great mercy to us.

Let such reflections as these encourage you, my young friends, for whose admonition and consolation this discourse was peculiarly intended, to hope, that as your afflictions are the same, your consolations will also be the same. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid. Your father and mother are dead, but your heavenly Father can never die. I would willingly hope, that it has been your early care to secure an interest in him; and I would solemnly charge it upon you, as you value your present peace, or your eternal happiness, that it be the great business of your life to keep close to him: and then you may assure yourselves, with the most cheerful confidence, that he will never fail nor forsake you.

If therefore your hearts are almost overwhelmed within you, in the melancholy circumstances into which his providence has brought you, fly into his presence, prostrate yourselves before him with humble importunity, and turn your tears of sorrow into tears of devotion.

"Behold, O most compassionate Father," may you reasonably and confidently say, "behold, thou hast plunged me even into the depths of distress; but blessed be thy name, thou hast not left me to sink in them without any support. I have this day received some kind assurances from thy word, and I now entreat thee to remember that word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope. My father and my mother have forsaken me: Lord, wilt thou not take me up? Wilt thou indeed abandon me? Wilt thou add affliction to the afflicted? the insupportable affliction of seeing myself deserted by thee, when I most evidently need thy succour? That be far from thee, O Lord! and be the unworthy suspicion far from me!—I have lost my most prudent and faithful counsellors, but I look unto thee, as the guide of my youth.—I have lost those who were once my guardians and my protectors; but I come to take shelter under the shadow of thy wings. Their eyes are closed, and their mouths are sealed up in death: no longer can they look with compassion on my sorrows; no longer can their converse cheer or delight me. O may thy compassionate eye regard me, and thy comforts delight my soul! Permit me, O God! a humble freedom in approaching to thee, and in pouring forth all my heart in thy presence.—My parents are now returned naked to their dust, and, should my wants be ever so pressing, are now incapable of affording me any relief. May thy rich bounty supply me, thy unwearied providence take care of me! But, above all, withhold not thy covenant blessings, and let me share in that eternal inheritance which thou hast prepared for all thy children in Christ."

If these be the daily breathings of your souls before him, you have abundant reason to hope that he will return an answer of peace. In all your difficulties he will wisely direct you; in all your sorrows he will compassionately relieve you; in all your dangers he will powerfully protect you; in all your wants he will bountifully supply you; in a word, you will be conducted safely, and I hope, notwithstanding this gloomy prospect, you will be conducted comfortably, through this mortal life, till you come at length to your Father's house in peace. And when you are arrived thither, and take a view of all the various occurrences of the way, you will see apparent reason to acknowledge, what is now so difficult to believe, that the present awful dispensation was sent with a gracious design, and that all the paths of your heavenly Father have been mercy and truth to you. Amen.

SERMON X.

THE REFLECTIONS OF A PIOUS PARENT ON THE DEATH OF A WICKED CHILD, CONSIDERED AND IMPROVED.

2 Samuel xviii. 33.

And the king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept: and as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

As the providence of God calls me this day particularly to address myself to young persons, so the words I have been reading suggest some very awful thoughts, which are well suited to such an occasion. And there is one circumstance, relating to this discourse, which I cannot forbear mentioning to you, because I hope it may be a means of engaging a more than common attention to it, from the auditory to which I am now speaking.*

It is this: The substance of the sermon, which I am now to deliver, was drawn up some time ago, at the desire of your late reverend and worthy pastor Mr. Jennings, and preached to a society of young persons then under his charge.† The text was chosen by him; and his tender and obliging care to assist his pupils in their first labours, engaged him to draw the plan of the discourse, and to furnish me with several of the most important thoughts, which I am now to offer.

So that, I think, I may properly say, that though your eyes will no more see him, nor your ears any more hear his persuasive voice, which has so frequently, and so affectionately, addressed you from this place, yet this day by me, he being dead, yet speaks, speaks to you, young persons; to many of whom, I fear, he hath often spoken in vain. Let me, therefore, solemnly charge you by your veneration for the memory of so excellent a friend, as well as by the authority of God, and the importance of your eternal interests, that you give these things a diligent hearing, a serious recollection, and a religious regard. And, indeed, if such a subject, introduced by such a circumstance, will not command them all, I can have very little hopes of impressing you, by what I may say in the course of my ordinary ministry amongst you.

The words of the text are the pathetic lamentation of good old David, on the death of Absalom; a favourite but wicked son. His pious father had no doubt given him a religious education; and it is very probable, that, considering the remarkable beauty and gracefulness of his person, he was ready to hope, that he would be endowed with virtuous and holy dispositions of soul, the correspondent beauties of the mind. But these hopes were dreadfully disappointed: for the darling, the beautiful Absalom proved a murderer and a rebel: he went in unto his father's concubines, in the sight of all Israel, and openly attempted to take away the life of him, from whom his own was derived, and by whose indulgence it had been spared, even when forfeited to justice. Yet, nevertheless, David had such paternal tenderness, as, under all these trying provocations, expressly to order the generals of his army to deal gently with the young man Absalom for his sake. But the righteous vengeance of God determined otherwise, and, notwithstanding all his father's fond precautions, brought him down to the grave with infamy and blood. He was snatched away by a violent and very terrible death, in the prime of his days, and the very act of his sin; and this was the occasion of those moving words, O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

* N. B. This sermon was preached at Kibworth in Leicestershire, towards the beginning of the year 1725, about eighteen months after the death of the Rev. Mr. John Jennings, who had long been minister there, and was author of those excellent discourses on Preaching Christ, and Experimental Preaching, which have met with such great acceptance at home and abroad.

† At Hinckley, May 7, 1724.

We may charitably, and I think very reasonably, suppose, that they are not only the expressions of David's natural affection, on the death of a son whom he tenderly loved; but that they arose from the views of that state on which he entered by death, which must certainly be very dreadful; so dreadful, that David, whose eternal interests were secure by the promises of an everlasting covenant, would have been willing even by his own death to have delivered him from such complete and such hopeless ruin.

It will be my business from these words,

I. To consider the reflections which may naturally arise in the mind of a pious parent on the death of a wicked child. And,

II. To draw some inferences from such a survey. O that all, and especially the degenerate children of religious parents, would attend with a becoming seriousness!

I. I am to consider the reflections which may naturally arise in the mind of a pious parent, on the death of a wicked child.

I cannot pretend to enumerate them all, or to describe them in such pathetic language as a bleeding heart will speak itself on so sad an occasion; but probably the chief of them may be such as these:

1. A pious parent will reflect on such an occasion, that his expectations from his child have been sadly disappointed in the past course of his life.

Parents are apt to flatter themselves with fond hopes from their infant offspring; they look upon them as the blossoms of future delight and support. They comfort themselves under the other burthens of life, and the additional cares and labours which a growing family brings upon them, by looking forward to future years, and anticipating the pleasures hereafter to arise from the duty, gratitude, and usefulness, of their children. "But, alas!" will the good man say, "could I have seen what this poor creature would have proved, instead of rejoicing in his birth, I should have mourned over it as a calamity to me and my family. I promised myself other things. My heart trembled for him in the various dangers of infancy and childhood. I congratulated myself on his arrival at a more confirmed age. But when I looked that this pleasant plant should have brought forth grapes, behold, it brought forth wild grapes. Well did Solomon say, A foolish son is a grief to his father, and bitterness to her that bare him. So, alas, have we found. Oh! how often has our authority been affronted, and our love slighted, for a mere trifle! Or when he was treating us better, what a thorn has it been in our very hearts, to think that our child was in a state of spiritual death, and on the borders of that eternal ruin, into which we have reason to fear he is now fallen. So that with regard to what is past, we have cause to say, Blessed, in comparison of us, are the barren, that never bare, and the breasts that never gave suck." These thoughts will be aggravated, when, in the next place,

2. The pious parent reflects with concern on the fruitless pains he has taken for the reformation and conversion of his child.

"He that searches my heart," will the Christian say, "is witness, that, next to its concern for my own salvation, it knows not a more affectionate wish than this, that Christ might be formed in the soul of my children. That how little soever of this world I could give them, they might be the children of God, and the heirs of glory. And with relation to this unhappy creature, I was not entirely wanting in such endeavours as lay in my power. What knowledge of the things of God I myself had, I was willing to communicate to him: I urged them seriously upon him; I frequently reminded him of them; and, to supply the defects of my personal instructions, I put the book of God into his hands, and engaged him in an early and constant attendance on public ordinances. When I saw him wandering in the paths of folly and sin, I endeavoured to convince him of the fatal consequences of such courses, and in the most affectionate manner to dissuade him from them. I have again and again urged him to pray for himself; and I have frequently been praying for him. I have desired that he might be remembered in our worshipping assemblies; I have borne him on my heart before God in the family and the closet, and God alone knows with what overflowing tenderness. How importunately have I pleaded, and how unwilling have I been to take any denial! But, alas! all my prayers and my tears have been like water spilt on the ground; and in all the endeavours I have been using for his conversion and salvation, I have been labouring in vain, and spending my time and my strength for nought. Nay, as to him it has proved worse than in vain; for every instruction, and every correction, every reproof, and every prayer, has aggravated his guilt, and increased his misery; so that, on the whole, while I thought I was acting the kindest and most affectionate part, I was only treasuring up for my child aggravated wrath and damnation." But this leads me to add,

3. That the pious parent, on such an occasion, cannot but deeply reflect on that state of everlasting ruin into which he has reason to fear that his child is fallen.

"Oh!" will the afflicted Christian say, "how comparatively light would my sorrows be, if, while I am looking on the breathless corpse, and mourning the disappointment of my hopes as to the present life, I could by faith look forward to a world of glory, and see the branch of my family which is cut off from earth, transplanted thither, and flourishing there: joy would then mingle itself with my parental sorrows, and praises with my tears. But, alas! I have reason to apprehend it was cut down that it might be cast into the burnings. On the former supposition I might have comforted myself with the thought of meeting my child again, of meeting him on terms of infinite advantage, no more to be separated from him. But now, alas! I have not only lost my child for a while, but I have lost him for ever; for the unhappy creature died a stranger to God and Christ, and therefore what can I imagine, but that he has fallen into the hands of divine vengeance? Overwhelming thought! While he lived, my bowels yearned for him when he was under any affliction; when I saw him struggling with illness and pain, I pitied him, and I wept over him. Oh how can I bear to think that he is now tormented in that flame, and that God is pouring forth on him the vials of his wrath! O that the blood of the parent could redeem the soul of the child, how willingly, how gladly, would I part with it! O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" But once more,

4. The pious parent cannot but be much distressed in such a circumstance as this, at the thoughts of meeting his child at the tribunal of Christ.

"It would be mournful," may the good man say, "to think that I should see him no more; yet, as the matter now stands, even that would be some alleviation of my distress; but the immutable decrees of God forbid it. I know, that when all the dead, small and great, stand before his throne, I and my child must appear together there; and oh, what a dreadful interview will it be! When God committed his education to my care, he did, as it were, put his soul into my hands, and at my hands will he require an account of it. And when he comes to make the inquiry, what will the issue be? Will my son accuse me? Or must I be a witness against him? How terrible an office! to bear my testimony for the condemnation of one whom I tenderly loved, of one whose soul I would have died to deliver! I know I shall not dare to interpose in his favour, and plead the cause of my Saviour's enemy; or if I were so far transported by the fondness of a father, I should plead in vain. Sooner, much sooner, would the mountains be removed for me, or the earth carried out of its place, than the sentence of heaven, its final solemn sentence, would be repealed. And if it must not be repealed, how shall I bear to hear it pronounced, to see it executed? to hear my own child separated by an everlasting curse from the presence of the Lord; to see the ministers of divine wrath hurrying away the helpless creature, and dragging him down to unquenchable burnings? O that, if no shelter must be allowed him, God would hide me in the grave till this tremendous scene of his indignation be overpast; lest the anguish of a parent mingle itself with the joys of a rising saint, and, to me, overcast the triumphs of the day!" Hardly can a good man refrain from such sentiments as these, though some of them be dictated by passion rather than by reason.

After this survey of the reflections, which such a sad event might naturally produce, I would proceed to draw some inferences from it; yet I cannot but delay them for a few moments, in compassion to the sorrows of those pious parents, if any such be amongst us, whose case this has been. Are there any of you, Christians, that experimentally know the anguish of such thoughts as these? any of you that have thus been mourning over your dead children, when God has on a sudden called them to his bar, with all their follies and sins on their head, without giving you any probable hope, that his grace had first recalled them to himself, and washed their souls in the blood of a Redeemer?

It grieves me, my friends, to have been forced by a sense of duty, as I have now been, so largely to represent a scene which must call up your sorrows afresh. But permit me to remind you, that, even in this dreadful circumstance, the consolations of God are not small. Your hopes in your children have been sadly blasted; but you have hopes in God, your heavenly Father, which nothing can shake. You have reason to fear, their souls are lost; but is it nothing to you to reflect, that your own are given you as a prey? And that, though your house be not so with God, as in this respect you could most affectionately wish it, yet he has made with you an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure. As to these unhappy creatures who are now lost, you have indeed laboured in vain, and spent your strength for nought; but still your work is with the Lord, and your reward with your God; and you, like the faithful minister, may hope, that you shall be unto God a sweet savour of Christ, not only in them that are saved, but even in them that perish. And, as to the final interview, which appears so grievous in the prospect, remember, that you are not to carry along with you the fond instincts of nature into a world of perfection and glory. All your passions will then be refined; your wills so entirely resolved into the will of God, and your souls so completely satisfied with his presence and his love, that no creature-regards will be able to disturb their sacred serenity. You will look on the whole assembly of the enemies of God with so deep an apprehension of the malignity of their character, and of the wisdom and equity of that divine sentence by which they fall, that you will not distinguish any of them from the rest, by the sentiments of a painful compassion. Nor will your concern for those of them, who now lie nearest your heart, prevent your concurrence in that song of triumph, so proper to the solemnities of that awful day: Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true thy ways, thou King of saints. In the mean time, let the expectation of so happy an improvement in your temper moderate the excess of your present sorrows; and when they are moderated aright, the remainder of them will be a sadness of the countenance by which the heart may be made better. And now,

II. I proceed to draw some inferences from the sad survey we have been taking of the pious parent's reflections on the death of a wicked child. And hence we may infer,

1. That wicked children are acting a very cruel and unnatural part, while they are exposing their pious parents to such reflections as these.

I say it with a sorrowful heart, but so it is, that I fear there are several of you, my young friends, who live in the neglect of your own souls, and whose consciences will presently charge it upon you. How soon that awful Being, whom you now forget, may cut off the number of your months in the midst, and add you to the number of the dead, you know not: but this is certain, that if you die as you live, and your parents survive the stroke, they will feel the weight of these terrible reflections; and even now they cannot but fear them. Doubtless, if they be present here, their hearts are bleeding whilst I speak, and they are looking upon you with unknown anguish. And does not the thought grieve you, and does it not shame you? Ungrateful creatures! are these your returns for all their bounty, for all their tenderness; to be a sword in their bowels, and to pierce their very hearts? Alas, they did not expect such scenes as these, when you hung about them with your infant arms; when you answered their fond smiles, and lisped out the first broken accents of endearment. I wonder how you can bear the thought! I wonder you are not ashamed to be conversing with them daily, and daily receiving new favours from them; while you are behaving in such a manner that, the better they love you, the more they must be afflicted and terrified for you. O that you would have compassion on them! or, if this will not move you, O that you would have compassion on yourselves! for your own interest is still more nearly concerned than theirs. Which leads me to add,

2. We may further infer, that a dreadful counterpart to those reflections will be the portion of the ungodly child.

Alas, sinners, if your pious parents weep thus for you, how bitterly will you weep for yourselves! for if these things be done in a green tree, what will be done in the dry? If they, the children of God, perhaps even then under the smiles of their heavenly Father, and in the near views of their own complete salvation, may utter their griefs in such melting accents, what agonies will take hold of your hearts, when you are actually entered on those scenes of horror and despair to which the righteous vengeance of God has doomed you? It is impossible fully to describe them; yet something relating to them we may certainly infer from what has been already said. Give me leave to offer it to your view, if peradventure, through the agency of divine grace, to have heard of these reflections may be the happy means of leading you to escape them.

Your parents may reflect "on the disappointment of their expectations from you:" but oh, how heavy will the disappointment of your own hopes and expectations then sit upon your souls! How will you then bear it, sinners, when you see all your enjoyments and all your prospects blasted in a moment, and irrecoverably lost?

It is true, you are lifting up your souls unto vanity; but these vanities are your all. You pursue them with the utmost vigour and intenseness of mind, and have a great many fond and chimerical schemes for years of pleasure and happiness yet to come. But if God cut you off in the prime of your life, and in the very flower of your hopes, in that day all your thoughts will perish. And how will you be confounded to see all the beautiful and enchanted scenes that now charm you to the neglect of God and religion, vanished like the shadowy glories of a dream, and your souls left naked and destitute, upon an inhospitable shore, where, in all your indigence and distress, there will be no eye to pity you, no hand to relieve you!

And it will be so much the more dreadful, as you will go down to these melancholy regions with your appetites and your passions warm about you, and by frequent indulgence strengthened and inflamed; so that, for want of their proper objects, they will prey upon your heart, and an insatiable thirst will continue, while you will not have one drop of satisfaction or comfort. Nay, I may add, that as, in these unripened days, you have had little experience of the vanities and disappointments of life, and have entertained a great many fond and extravagant hopes of what you would never have found in it, your regret, in being cut off from them, will not be in proportion to what they really were, but to what your error and folly imagined them to have been.

Your pious parents will reflect upon it with unutterable anguish, "that your souls are for ever lost:" but how much more sensibly will you yourselves feel it! They, in their present situation on earth, can have but a very faint and imperfect notion of the horrors of the infernal prison; for to those we may accommodate the language of the apostle on a very different occasion, and say, that neither has eye seen them, nor ear heard them, nor has it entered into the most terrified heart fully to conceive them. But how will the change affect you, when you are just entered on those realms of woe; when you look round about you, and think, This is my last abode, my only remaining inheritance! Alas, how will your hearts be overwhelmed when you compare that place of torment with all the cheerful scenes of the world from whence you came; where you had been surrounded with so many delights; where it had been your chief care to make provision for the flesh; and where you had, perhaps, spent your days in mirth, till in a moment you went down to the grave! when, instead of the light of the sun, you see nothing but the flames of the divine indignation; when, instead of all that soothed and regaled your senses, you feel the never-dying worm, and exchange the gay and agreeable companions that did surround you, for the society of devils and damned spirits!

I appeal to your consciences; can your hearts endure, or your hands be strong, in such a circumstance as this? You, that are so impatient of every little anxiety of life; you, that cannot bear the fatigues of duty, nor the restraints of religion, how will you bear the agonies of damnation? How will you live in those doleful regions, where joy and cheerfulness are everlasting strangers, and nothing remains but weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth?

Were this to be your case only for a thousand or a hundred years, how miserable would you be! but oh, how much more miserable, when you think, that it is an everlasting destruction! when your thoughts weary themselves in search of some distant point, where a glimmering of hope may break in upon you, and you go onward, and onward, and onward still, and find nothing but blackness of darkness for ever! when you feel yourselves plunged in a boundless ocean of distress, without a bottom, and without a shore! "Must the smoke of my torments ascend up for ever and ever? Must I lie in this infernal prison, till I have paid the uttermost farthing? Surely then I must bear indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, as long as an immortal soul can sustain it, as an eternal God can inflict it."

It is almost insupportable, to think that this should be the case of any of our fellow-creatures. How much more insupportable must it then be, to feel that it is your own!

Again, your pious parents will lament, "that all their kind endeavours for your salvation were in vain:" but with what aggravated sorrow and despair will you then reflect on those endeavours, and on all the other religious advantages you enjoyed!

"Alas!" will you then be ready to say, "if there could be any thought of comfort in the midst of this dark gloom of desolation and horror, it would be to transfer the blame of my ruin upon another. O that I could say, there was some powerful, arbitrary being, by whose irresistible hand I was forcibly borne away, as by a mighty torrent, and swept into this burning gulf! O that I could say, that I was wicked and miserable by a fatal necessity! But there is not a wretch, amidst all the rage and blasphemy of such a dwelling as this, who can dare to assert that to have been the case; how much less then can I assert it!

"When I look up," may you justly say, "when I look up to yonder seats of unapproachable glory, from whence I am now cast out, as an abominable branch, why was not my portion there? Wretch that I am, I was once numbered among the children of the kingdom; I was born in Emanuel's land; I was educated in a religious family: and oh, my parents and my ministers! how diligently did they instruct me! how awfully did they admonish me! how tenderly did they expostulate with me! I had indeed line upon line, and precept upon precept; and therefore I have now stroke upon stroke, and wound upon wound. The blood of a Redeemer was once offered me as a healing balm, and I despised it; and now it is poured out as a burning corrosive on my bleeding soul. I was once lifted up even to the gates of heaven, and now I am cast down to the very centre of hell: I am now looking with envy, and with rage, on the milder torments of Tyre and Sidon, of Sodom and Gomorrah." There, sinner, thou wilt perhaps curse the compassionate heart, which is now almost sinking under this necessary representation of thy danger, and those unavailing tears, which one or another of us may now be shedding in the distant views of thy ruin.

Yet I must add once more, that as your pious parents will tremble " at the view of meeting you at the tribunal of God," so the thoughts of such an interview must be insupportably dreadful to you.

If Satan now draw you from your allegiance to God, and harden your heart to final impenitency, being partakers of his sins, you will be partakers likewise of his plagues, and like him be reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day. And how will your haughty hearts brook it, when you are to be brought out to that judgment? Oh, how often will your anxious, foreboding thoughts anticipate the shame and horror of that dreadful day!

" I must stand forth," will you then say, " I must stand forth before my inexorable Judge; my sin and my folly must be publicly proclaimed before the assembled world, and my parents too must be the witnesses of it. But oh, how shall I be able to lift up my face before them, blackened with the marks of guilt and despair? If I call, will there be any to answer me; or to which of the saints shall I then turn? Shall I turn to my parents, and entreat them, by all their former tenderness for the children of their own bowels, to plead with the Judge in my favour, if, perhaps, they may mitigate the rigour of his wrath? Alas, I know him, and myself, and them too well, to expect any such attempt, or to ask any such favour. Will they not rather stand up as swift witnesses against me, and call for an increase of wrath on my guilty head? Will not all their former tenderness be turned into stern and awful severity? Will they not upbraid me with their instructions, their reproofs, their prayers, and their tears; and applaud the triumphs of the divine vengeance, in the condemnation of so wicked, of so incorrigible, a creature?" - With these awful remonstrances I dismiss you, and conclude with a reflection of a more comfortable nature.

3. From this survey of the reflections of a pious parent on the death of a wicked child, we may certainly infer, that the parents of religious children have abundant reason for thankfulness.

They have reason for thankfulness, both as they are free from such melancholy reflections and apprehensions; and as a foundation is laid of other views, as full of cheerfulness and joy, as these are of terror and distress. My brethren, I congratulate the happiness of those of you, who can say, through grace, that God has established his covenant with you, and with your seed after you, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto you, and unto them. It is the joy of my heart, to think how much it must be the joy of yours, to see your children walking in the truth; and to see them flourishing in the courts of your God, as well as growing like olive plants round your own tables; to see that they have not only escaped the grosser corruptions, which are in the world through lust, but subscribe with their hand unto the Lord, and surname themselves by the name of Israel his people. With what sweet tranquillity may you look forward to all the uncertainties of life and death, for yourselves and for your children, while you have such a joyful persuasion, that you leave them in the hand of your Father, and of their Father, of your God, and of their God!

And give me leave, on so natural an occasion, to address myself to you, my dear friends, from whom the great Sovereign of life has been pleased to take away pious and promising children, by (what we are apt erroneously to call) an immature death. You are ready to say, with a peculiar accent, that you are the persons who have seen affliction. The images of those lovely creatures rise in your memory on such a hint as this, and crowd into your minds afresh. You saw them growing up, and flourishing under your care; growing up, perhaps, to ripeness of years, and flourishing in some remarkable degrees of knowledge and of grace. And you fondly promised yourselves, from what you saw in them, that they would not only have been the comfort and delight of your declining, broken age, but the support and honour of the church, when you were here no more: and now all these pleasing prospects are vanished, all these important hopes are buried with their dear dust.

Nay, perhaps God hath, in this respect, broken you with breach upon breach, has taken away one desirable branch of your family after another, till all the branches are lopped off, and you stand like the naked trunks of trees which were once diffusing a thick and extensive shade. Yes, I am aware, there are some of you, that know the peculiar agony (to all but such as yourselves probably unknown) of following your last child to the grave. I fear, I come too near you, and that some of your wounds are bleeding anew. Would the balm of sympathetic tears administer any relief to them, how easy would it be to pour it out in abundance! but, in a case like yours, there is a much more efficacious and sovereign relief.

I am speaking to Christians. You sometimes plead the indications of wisdom and piety, which you discerned in your children as an aggravation of your sorrow for the loss of them: and I acknowledge, in one view, they are indeed so; but in another view, how greatly do they extenuate it!

You saw them, it may be, when they were under a languishing distemper, for some time, as it were, daily dying before your eyes: but did you not likewise see the divine rod and staff comforting them? It may be, sometimes to such a degree, that you regretted not so much, that they were going off the stage, as that you were not accompanying them in the same way, and with the same spirit. You heard their expiring groans; but did you not also hear some songs of praise mingled with them: perhaps you heard them strengthening their feeble voices, and summoning up all their little remainder of spirits, to say, as from their very soul, My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.* And does the recollection afford you no pleasure? or does your pleasure terminate even here?

Your dear children are now dead to you; but do you not believe, that they live to God, and live with him? What if they had been still continued on earth, answering all your schemes, and possessing all that you intended or desired for them? How low had those services been, and how worthless those possessions, in comparison to the services which they now render, with the riches and glory which they now inherit!

Methinks it should be, and surely, Christians, it sometimes is, matter of rejoicing to you, to reflect, that the desolation of your houses is, in some degree, the prosperity and joy of that celestial society, to which you are more intimately allied, than to any thing here: to think, that your families should have been nurseries for heaven, and that God should have honoured you so far, as already to have taken some of your children to minister around the throne of his glory, and so to be the associates of angels in their highest honour and joy.

And is it not most delightful to think of meeting them again? Had they still survived, the thoughts of leaving them might have sharpened the pangs of dissolving nature, which now the remembrance of them may moderate. You had left them in an insnaring, calamitous world: perhaps some of you had left them in circumstances of difficulty and distress. But now all those apprehensions are over; and what would otherwise have been the stroke of painful separation, will now be the means of ending your separation, and bringing you, once for all, to the embraces of each other. And O, with what mutual congratulations will the converse be renewed; with what delightful overflowings of parental complacency on the one side, and of filial gratitude on the other! How thankfully will they for ever acknowledge your pious cares and early instructions, to which perhaps, under God, they owe their first religious impressions, and, in some sense, even their present glories! And in the great day of the Lord, with what unutterable transports of holy joy will you stand forth, and say at once, in the most literal and the most sublime sense, Here are we, and the children that our God hath graciously given us!

Surely, when you think of these things, your joys may abundantly counterbalance your sorrows: and I appeal to your own hearts, even in the midst of all this tender distress, whether such a circumstance as yours, supposing it ever so aggravated, be not much more tolerable than that which we have been describing; of a pious parent bewailing the death of a wicked child, or even looking upon him in life and health under the tyranny of Satan and of sin, and in the probable way to everlasting misery.

And thus I have finished my meditations on this pathetic and important subject. Let me conclude with my most affectionate prayers to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, for all of you to whom the discourse has been addressed.

May young ones be brought, by the blessed Spirit of God, to know, in this their day, the things that belong to their eternal peace; that they may apply to Christ for life and salvation, and join themselves to the Lord in an everlasting covenant! There all our applications to you centre; there may all your attendances on our ministrations issue!

May those, who have been effectually taught this lesson, who are the joy of parents and ministers, and the hopes of the church, as to the rising age, be very deeply sensible of the distinguishing grace of God to them! may they be spared to rise up in the stead of their parents! and may they labour with great success, to spread a spirit of seriousness amongst their companions, and to maintain it continually in their own souls!

May the pious parents of pious children be suitably affected with the goodness of God to them and theirs! and may the parents of others be stirred up, as they value the souls of their children, and their own comfort and repose, to renew those attempts which have hitherto proved unsuccessful, and to exert the most vigorous efforts, for plucking the unhappy creatures, as brands out of the burning!

In a word, may divine grace so cooperate with all, that all of you, according to your different relations and characters, may have reason to bless God for those awful thoughts which I have now been laying before you; that such cutting reflections, as I have so largely described, under the former heads, may never be known by one parent or one child in this assembly, otherwise than by description, by imagination, by reason, and by faith! never may they be known by heart-rending and overwhelming experience! On the contrary, may parents and children be mutually growing joys and comforts to each other, in life, and in death, at your appearance before the solemn tribunal of Christ, and throughout all the ages of a glorious eternity! Amen.

* Some, into whose hands these discourses will probably fall, know that these were not imaginary circumstances; and cannot but remember, they have since attended the death of some of those young persons to whom this sermon was first preached.

SERMON XI.

YOUTH REMINDED OF APPROACHING JUDGMENT.

ECCLESIASTES xi. 9.

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thine heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

My dear young friends! if it were possible for me, while I am speaking, to lay open my whole heart before you, in such a manner as that you should be witnesses to every secret sentiment of it with regard to you, I should do it with a great deal of pleasure. You would see a tenderer concern for your present and everlasting welfare than words can express, and a proportionable desire of approving myself your faithful servant for Jesus' sake. I know not how far you may have considered what I have largely laid before you, concerning the importance of the rising generation;* but I am so thoroughly convinced of this importance, and so impressed with the conviction of it, that there is no part of my public work to which I arise with a greater solicitude about the success, than I feel when I am thus particularly applying myself to you; and there is no prayers which I offer to God with greater earnestness, than that I may have the joy to see you walking in the truth, a seed to serve the Lord, which shall be accounted to him for a generation.

This is what I wish and pray with regard to all of you. It is with inexpressible pleasure that I see so evidently, as to many, that my prayers and my labours are not in vain. Many of you are my joy now; and I trust, through divine grace, will be my crown, in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ at his coming. But would to God there were none of whom I had occasion to say, I stand in doubt of you! Would to God I could see that spirit of serious piety universally prevailing amongst you, which, wherever it doth prevail in young ones, is such a token of good to themselves, to their friends, and to the church of Christ!

Where it is otherwise, I look upon you with compassion and sorrow; but blessed be God, not with despair. I am not without hope that God hath purposes of love and grace to serve on many of you; especially those who have been the children of so many good instructions and so many prayers, as I have reason to believe many of you are; and who can tell but this is the day, and this the ordinance, in which these gracious purposes are to take place?

I know that the first step to your safety is a sense of your danger. We live in a world so full of snares, that the righteous scarcely are saved; and yet I fear some of you have very little apprehension of this danger, very little concern about the whole armour of God, so necessary to preserve you from it. And, therefore, not to give you any vain and groundless alarm, but to produce, if possible, that holy caution and solicitude of soul which may be the happy means of your security and preservation, I am now setting myself to discourse on some of the most awful words, which are any where in the whole book of God, addressed to persons of your age. I hope you will listen to them, and that God will make them as a kind of solemn trumpet, whereby those that are spiritually dead may be awakened;—so awakened, as that the other trumpet to which they refer, and which will surely awaken your sleeping dust, may be heard, not with sorrow, but with delight.

It is observable, that Solomon had a great regard to young people in his writings; and it is an evidence of his wisdom that he had so, for youth is the age of discipline. He therefore gives them line upon line, and precept upon precept. Sometimes he soothes, and sometimes he rebukes; sometimes he beseeches them with paternal tenderness, and sometimes persuades them, as knowing the terrors of the Lord; and saves them as with fear, plucking them out of the fire. And this he doth in the words I have now been reading: Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thine heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

It will be my business—to explain, and—to enforce the caution, and then—to conclude with some reflections upon it. May the plain but awful things I am to deliver be, as the words of the wise are, like goads, to pierce and rouse your minds, and like nails fastened in a sure place by the skilful masters of assemblies, which being given out from the one great Shepherd, are succeeded by his grace, and improved to his glory!

I. I am to explain the words I have been reading.

And, in order to fix the sense of them, I shall only observe, that some understand them, as intimating Solomon's readiness to allow young people in the innocent pleasures and gaieties of life; whilst others interpret the whole as a solemn and a lively warning of the great danger they were in, of running into the most fatal excess. I shall in a few words give you my reasons, both why I mention the former, and why I prefer the latter of these senses.

1. Some understand these words, as an intimation of Solomon's readiness to indulge young people in all the innocent entertainments of life.

They paraphrase the words in a soft and easy manner, as if he had said: "Do not imagine, O young man, that I give thee lessons of morality and piety in a gloomy humour, or with any rigorous and unkind design. Far from desiring to lay thee under any unnecessary restraint, I rather exhort thee to rejoice in the days of thy youth, those best days, in which the spirits are brisk and lively, and all the powers of nature in their most vigorous state. Let thine heart then cheer thee: wear an habitual smile upon thy countenance, and indulge that gaiety which is so natural to the spring season of life; so natural, and indeed so decent. Walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes. Seek out every innocent object of amusement; gratify thy genius, thy temper, thy relish, in all the particularities of it; provided only that thou dost still remember thy future account, acknowledging God in thy ways, and guarding against every abuse of his goodness, every thing that would on the whole be offensive to him, and detrimental to thyself."

My brethren, I readily own, that there is nothing in this paraphrase of the words which is unbecoming the piety and wisdom of the author, and that he has, in effect, said the same in several passages of this very book. There is hardly a sentiment which he more frequently repeats than this. There is nothing, says he, in express words, again and again, there is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of his labour. It is good and comely for one to eat and drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun; for it is his portion, and a heart to rejoice in it is the gift of God. Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart: let thy garments be always white, and thine head lack no ointment. And once more, I recommend mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat and drink, and to be merry. The sense of which, if we would find a sense worthy of the author, must, no doubt, be this, "that religion is far from forbidding a cheerful use of the enjoyments of life; and that without such a use they are given to the possessor in vain:" who indeed can otherwise hardly be called the possessor, but rather the steward and purveyor for the next heir, who may perhaps be as profuse as his predecessor was penurious and insatiable.

And I hope you will not imagine, that in what I have further to say I intend any thing inconsistent with these observations and advices. To be devout, and to be melancholy, are two very different things; and the greatest enemies of religion could not call it by a more invidious and unjust name, than a walking mournfully before the Lord of hosts. Instead therefore of dissuading you from a life of true pleasure, I would rather direct you to it, and only urge you to despise that which is visionary and mean, and to secure that which is solid and noble: in a word, to decline no delights which will not interfere with others much more valuable, none which will not be mingled with regret, or followed by a lasting anguish, a thousand times more than an equivalent for them. And so far as these precautions will admit, I will venture to say, even in this sense, Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth. Nevertheless, I am well persuaded this is not, and cannot be, the original sense of the words; and therefore add,

2. They are rather to be understood as an awful and lively caution to young persons, to be upon their guard against those gratifications whereby conscience might be wounded, and God dishonoured.

I suppose, with the general stream of commentators, that the words are an ironical way of expressing, in a more pointed and lively manner, the very contrary to what they seem literally to speak; like that speech of Elijah concerning Baal, when he said, Cry aloud, for he is a god; or that of Micaiah to Ahab, Go up to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper; or that of our Lord to his disciples, Sleep on now, and take your rest: to which, I suppose, we may add that saying of God concerning Adam after his fall, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil. Thus do these words most strongly forbid what they seem to allow, and are as if he had said, "Thou poor thoughtless creature, who in this giddy intoxication of youth art so madly bent upon sensual pleasure, take thy fill of it, and withhold not thine heart from any joy. Follow all the most impetuous appetites of nature, and wantonly bound over every restraint of reason and piety; trample on the admonition of all thy teachers, shake off the fetters of a strict education, and burst the bonds of religion, like threads of flax when they are touched by the flame. But think not, O sinner, that thou shalt always carry it off with that haughty triumph; know, that as thou hast thy day, God will also have his: a day of strict account, and of ample recompence. Know, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment; and if thou canst find out no expedient to conceal thee from an all-seeing eye, or to defend thee from an omnipotent hand, a deluge of wrath will bear thee away to everlasting destruction. Dearly shalt thou then pay for every present indulgence, and every sweet morsel shall then be turned bitter, and be as the gall of asps within thee."

This, I say, appears to be the evident meaning of these words. And that for this plain reason; that some of the phrases made use of are such as are never taken in a good sense, and therefore cannot admit the former interpretation. Solomon doth indeed, as you have heard, exhort his readers to eat and drink, and enjoy the good of their labours; but where can you find him, or any other sacred writer, exhorting or allowing men to walk in the way of their heart, and in the sight of their eyes? I am sure that phrase generally signifies an indulgence to the irregularities of appetite and passion, in the neglect of reason and of Scripture. Thus the Israelites are charged to wear fringes on their garments, that they might remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; and might not seek after their own heart and their own eyes; that is, (as it follows,) that they might not go a whoring from God after those gay and luxurious idolatries, which regaled the senses, while they debauched the soul. And thus the wicked Israelite, whom God would separate to evil out of all the tribes, is represented as vainly and arrogantly saying, I shall have peace though I walk in the imagination of mine heart; that is, (as it follows,) to add drunkenness to thirst, or one riot to another. And once more: to judge after the sight of the eyes, is a proverbial expression, to signify partial and corrupt judgment. We have no reason therefore to imagine, that Solomon would vary the signification of a phrase already so expressly fixed in some of the sacred writings, which he was himself obliged not only to read, but to transcribe, as he undoubtedly did on his accession to the throne; where he had also read it again and again, that the imagination of man's heart is only evil from his youth; and he had himself elsewhere said, that foolishness is so closely bound up in the heart of a child, that not only words of admonition, but the rod of correction, is necessary to drive it away. To these general remarks on the usual signification of the phrases occurring here, we may also further add, that the connexion of these words would lead us to understand them as an ironical rather than a serious concession, since they conclude with what seems a very awful menace: But know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment: as if he should have said, "Assure thyself, thou must answer for all." Which sense is further illustrated by what follows in the last verse of this, and the first of the next, chapter: [which are very unhappily divided from each other, as several other passages are, which have indeed a very close and necessary connexion:] Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart; (i. e. the regret which would follow these sensual indulgences, if thou walk in the way of it,) and put away evil from thy flesh, (i. e. those carnal pleasures which religion forbids, or those punishments they would certainly draw down upon them;) for childhood and youth are vanity, and remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, instead of sacrificing them to vanity and folly. You easily see, there is a beautiful and lively opposition between the several parts of the period on this interpretation, which on the other must be much injured, if not entirely destroyed.

I would further observe, that the judgment to which Solomon here refers, must undoubtedly be that of a future state; since he had expressly asserted above, that here all things come alike to all; and no man knoweth either love or hatred, (i. e. the favour or displeasure of the Divine Being,) by all that is before them: that there is a wicked man to whom it happeneth according to the event of the righteous; and, on the other hand, many a righteous man to whom it happeneth according to the event of the wicked; i. e. that very bad men often prolong their lives through a long series of prosperity, while good men are cut off by an untimely stroke, or linger out their days in a painful succession of sorrows. This led him to conclude, Surely God will judge the righteous and the wicked; which in many of these cases could only be done in some invisible state, to which both should be reserved. And of this judgment he solemnly warns the young sinner, as a most powerful antidote against the baits of sensuality; as an awful thought, which might fix the most roving eye, and be a means of reducing the most ungoverned heart to the discipline of wisdom and piety.

As I conclude that this sense of the words is now sufficiently illustrated and established, I proceed, II. To enforce the admonition by such considerations, as are expressly suggested in the text, or may naturally arise from it.

I importunately beg your serious attention; for I say not these things either to grieve or to shame you, but as my beloved brethren and children, I warn you. And here let me prevail upon you to consider,—the depravation and corruption of your own hearts,—the many delusive charms which are continually offering themselves to your eyes:—consider, that the blessed God is now the spectator of your conduct,—that he will certainly bring you to an account for it,—an account which will be inexpressibly strict and awful. These are the arguments, which I shall more largely enforce; and if they make no deep impression on your mind, there is the utmost reason to fear, that you will go on hardened in your evil ways, till you actually come to that tribunal which you now forget or contemn.

1. Think of the depravation and corruption of your own hearts, to deter you from walking in the ways of them.

The heart of man is described by that God who alone perfectly knows it, as deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. The imagination of it is, by him, said to be only evil, and that continually. It is a very sad truth though perhaps you have never seriously considered it, that a degenerate and corrupted nature is conveyed down from [illegible] to another, so as still to leave room for that expostulation of Job, What is man that he should be pure, and how can he be clean that is born of a woman?—for that confession of David, Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me!—for that declaration of the apostle, whether in his own name, or that of another, In me, that is, in my flesh, there dwelleth no good thing. If you know not the plague of your own heart, it is a plain argument that you know little of God, or of yourselves; and you had need be seriously reminded of it, lest, with Solomon's fool, you should trust it, and the blind lead the blind, till you fall into the pit of destruction.

Do you not know the degeneracy and corruption of your own hearts? I beseech you to review what has passed there. Think of the advantages which you have enjoyed for knowing and serving God; of all the mercies you have received, of all the instructions you have heard, of all the convictions you have sometimes felt, and of all the good resolutions you have probably formed in consequence of them. And then think, how little all this hath produced; how you have forgotten God, days and times without number, and started back from him like a deceitful bow; how you have been delivered over, in a foolish circle, from one vanity to another, wearied with the pursuit of trifles, and yet rising, after a little respite, to pursue them again. Think, my friends, how you have overborne the dictates of your own consciences, and grieved the Holy Spirit of God, when he hath been pleading with you in the most importunate manner, and saying unto you, Oh do not this abominable thing that I hate. Yet you have done it, and sacrificed the repose of your own minds, and the hopes of glory, to mean, vile considerations, which you would be ashamed to hear mentioned before an assembly. And this not in one instance, but again and again. You have formed good purposes, and broken them; and formed them again, and broken them again; and run such a round of folly and sin, that I am persuaded many of you could not have suspected yourselves of such a conduct some time ago, nor have believed, if one had told you, that you should act such a part. And must these treacherous hearts still be trusted, and will you go on to walk in the ways of them; when they have already led you into so much sin, when they have already plunged you into so much distress?

2. Think how many delusive charms are daily offering themselves to your eyes, that you may not heedlessly walk in the sight of them.

Remember, Sirs, I beseech you, that you are in a very dangerous situation, and walk among snares. The most mortal poisons are often mingled with the sweetest dainties, and the most dangerous enemies of our souls accost us in the fairest forms. The fruit which undid our common mother, and brought death and a curse upon us all, was a fruit which appeared to be good for food, and which she saw to be pleasant to the eyes.

It is an awakening saying of one of the most lively and pathetic, as well as of the most pious, writers which our age has produced,* "That the condition of man in his natural state seems to be like that of a person sick of a variety of diseases, knowing neither his distemper nor cure, but unhappily inclosed in a place where he could hear, or see, or taste, or feel nothing, but what tended to inflame his disorder."

Not that the world in its original constitution, and considered as the work of God, is by any means to be blamed. The whole system of it is such, as would lead a regular mind to wise and pious reflections; and its most pleasurable scenes would be the natural occasion of exciting correspondent gratitude and devotion to the great Author of every good and perfect gift. But our souls being corrupted, those things become dangerous to us, which might otherwise have been innocent, and even beneficial; as some of the most wholesome and nourishing foods are fatal to a person inflamed with a raging fever.

I am persuaded, that nothing is so likely to make us truly wise, as observations on facts: let me therefore beseech you, my young friends, seriously to consider how many, within the compass of your own knowledge, have been ruined by the blandishments of the senses; and, perhaps, some of them persons, in other respects, of no contemptible characters. We may indeed say of the world, that specious harlot, She hath cast down many wounded, and many strong men have been slain by her. Do not, therefore, walk in the sight of your eyes, lest you also be like the bird, that, struck with some gay promising appearance, hasteneth eagerly to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life. But endeavour to open the eye of the mind, and by faith to behold the great realities of the invisible world, that you may govern your lives with a regard to them, and so secure, not the deceitful forms, but the substance, of true happiness.

3. Let me seriously remind you, that the blessed God is the spectator of all your conduct.

This is strongly implied, though it be not expressed, in the text: For all these things God will bring thee into judgment. And we are apt to imagine, that he is like earthly judges, who must have recourse to witnesses, to inform them of what they would otherwise be ignorant. He is not, he cannot be, far from any one of us, seeing in him we live, and move, and have our being. Nor can we be concealed from his eye, should we fly on the wings of the morning, and with the swiftness of light, to the uttermost ends of the earth: for his hand must lead us thither, and his right hand support us there. Remember this, my friends, he sees you when you overlook him; sees himself neglected by you, and his laws violated, and his grace despised. And all for what? You have reason to blush and be confounded, when you think of that; for every vanity that offers itself to your pursuit, for trifles lighter than air, for which you would not violate the common rules of decency to a fellow-creature. As if it were to be taken for granted, that his favour is a thing of no consequence, or that nothing can forfeit it. O, Sirs, he hears me while I am speaking to you; and sees, perhaps, that some of you hardly give me an attentive hearing. He observes how many admonitions are despised by you, how many convictions are overborne, how many vows are broken, how many vain words are spoken to him, in those formalities which you call your devotions; and, perhaps, with regard to some of you, I may add, how many bold words are spoken against him, when those mouths are set against the heavens, whose tongues have walked through the earth. All those slights of religion, which, for want of understanding, you may be ready to call wit; all that licentious contempt which you throw on his sacred word and ordinances, and fancy it is freedom of thought. You may go on, and presume upon it, that your lips are your own; but I must tell you, that the Lord hearkens and hears, and a book of remembrance is written for you likewise; —a book, which will another day be thrown open, and read to you with a voice of vengeance and terror: which leads me to urge you,

4. To think how certain the judgment of God is, and your own personal appearance before him.

You know, there is not any doctrine of the gospel more plain and evident than this, That every one of us must give an account of himself to God; and indeed it was a doctrine of the Jewish revelation, and even of the wiser heathens: but I would desire you particularly to observe, how strongly it is expressed in the words of the text, Know thou, that God will bring thee into judgment! Thee, O young man, thee, O child, whoever thou art that hearest me this day, to thee is the word of this admonition sent, God will bring thee into judgment. His trumpet will sound, his tribunal will be set; thou wilt be summoned, and thou must obey. In vain will be every attempt to conceal thyself, or to excuse or dispute an immediate attendance. He will bring thee; his hand will be strong upon thee, infinitely too strong for thy feeble resistance. And therefore the assembly of the whole world before him is beautifully described, by driving together a flock of sheep or of goats. Bear witness, O sinner, and let thy conscience record it, I warn thee of this solemn, this dreadful, day. I tell thee, that as surely as thou art now in the house of God, thou shalt then be standing before his bar. And how will you stand? Look you to that. We are to give the warning, and knowing the terrors of the Lord, are to persuade men. Hear now therefore this admonition for yourselves, and know it for your good. Consider this, ye that forget God, lest he tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver. And to increase the weight and efficacy of the thought, reflect, once more,

5. How strict and awful this judgment will be. For all these things God will bring thee into judgment; which naturally implies, that it will be particular and final.

Every particular will be reviewed. All these things; or, as it is yet more strongly expressed elsewhere, every work, and every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil. He hath sworn by himself, that he will not forget any of thy works. Poor thoughtless creatures! you sometimes conceal your irregularities from parents and masters, or others to whom you are accountable; you disguise them in so artful a manner, or form such excuses for them, as may impose upon men: and you value yourselves on the dexterity with which you do it. But be not deceived, God cannot be thus mocked. For all these things, and a thousand times more than you can remember; actions, and words, and thoughts of vanity, which passed with you unobserved in the crowd, or, if at all observed, were forgotten in a moment; for all these will he reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes, i. e. he will marshal them in dreadful array, as a host of enemies armed for thy destruction. Have you never seen a criminal at the bar, how he is confounded, when the force of evidence bears him down, and the sagacity of a judge detects the idle, foolish pleas, with which he flattered himself before his trial, and imagined he should easily come off with impunity? Then did you see an emblem of yourselves, and your own state; thus will you, if you go on in your sins, be entangled and silenced, and shamed and condemned. All your crimes will be produced, in all their circumstances of aggravation. Nor will God forget this present admonition and expostulation, though you may forget it, or though you should remember it only in scorn, and wonder what occasion there is for all this earnestness and importunity. You may, if you please, make a jest of divine judgment; but you will find it dreadfully serious. Nothing so easy, as to despise it; but, O sinner, nothing so hard, as to endure it: for I add,

It will be a final doom, and your eternal state will be fixed by it. It is no light crime of which you will then be convicted: no less than wilful, obstinate, incorrigible rebellion against the Majesty of heaven, against the God of your lives, and the Father of all your mercies; and it will be no light punishment to which you will be consigned, for following the way of your heart, and the sight of your eyes, in opposition to all the authority of his law, and all the methods of his recovering grace.

Read over the sentence, as recorded from the lips of him by whom it is to be pronounced. There is but one for those on the left hand, and hearken to it: Depart from me, ye cursed:—sinner, thou must be separated from God. But that perhaps you can bear; it is but calling him by some bold name; it is but dressing him up in your imagination under some false odious character, and you may perhaps think it is best to be at a distance from him. Wretched creature! but thou must depart, as accursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. And canst thou reconcile thy mind to that? To dwell for ever in darkness and horror, in such a scene, and with such associates! To have nothing to entertain the eye, nothing to cheer the heart, nothing to divert painful reflection, nothing to allay the most cutting remorse! To see every pleasurable object, for which you forgot God, and sold yourselves to destruction, removed to an eternal distance; to feel all the irregular passions of your own hearts let loose at once, like so many hungry vultures to prey insatiably upon them; and hope, the last of supports under the last of evils, shut out for ever!—Oh, Sirs, this is the result of the judgment of God. Lo, this is the portion of the wicked, and this the heritage appointed to him by God. It is a grief to a tender heart to think of it, to hear the very report. Oh! what will it be to you to meet it and feel it, in all its force and all its terror? Can your heart endure, or can your hands be strong, in the day that God shall deal with you?

Alas, my heart is pained for you, and my bowels yearn over you! Methinks I see all the haughtiness of your spirits broken, see you pale and trembling on the very brink of that pit, from whence there is no redemption, and into which the flaming sword of divine justice is driving you. And can nothing be done to save you? Alas, what should be done? Can any rescue you from the hand of Omnipotence? Can any intercede for you with that then inexorable Judge? It cannot be. But he is not yet inexorable. He has not yet laid aside the character of a Saviour, of a compassionate friend to perishing creatures. And I present these things to persuade you, if possible, in this your day, to know the things that belong to your peace, before they be for ever hid from your eyes. May divine grace effectually do it; and teach you so to judge yourselves, that you may not then be condemned of the Lord! And now,

III. It only remains, that I conclude this discourse with some plain inferences from it. And here,

1. The young sinner has surely a great deal of reason to be thankful, that he hath not already been brought into judgment.

You have indeed the greatest cause to say, it is of the Lord's mercy that you are not consumed. Your breath is in your nostrils; and perhaps you can recollect times and circumstances, in which it seemed just ready to take its flight, when you appeared to be in the extremest danger, so that there was but a step between you and death. And what if that little interval had been passed? where had you then been? how low had you then fallen? Why, it is most certain, as to some of you, that had you been thus cut off, the torrent had swept you away into eternal ruin. Even now, while we are worshipping God in his house, rejoicing in mercy and hope, your miserable spirits had been in the regions of the damned, feeling more than mortal language can express, and fearing yet more, much more, than you felt; being, like the apostate angels, reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day. Adore the divine patience and forbearance, that your case is so different; for most happily different it is. I have the pleasure to testify to you this day, in the midst of all these terrible things which faithfulness to your souls extorts from me, that the Lord waiteth that he may be gracious, and does, as it were, raise himself up that he may have mercy upon you: he rises from his throne to stretch out the golden sceptre to you, to open his compassionate arms to embrace you, if you approach him as humble penitents. Jesus the judge will become your friend; he will receive you, he will shelter you and bless you; if, with believing hearts, you seek his mercy, after having so long dared his vengeance. This day do I testify, that he is ready to bestow upon you far more valuable pleasures than those which he calls you to resign, and to give you much greater satisfaction in contradicting the corruptions of your heart, and controlling the impulse of your senses, than you ever have found, or could possibly find, in gratifying them. May you be persuaded to the wise and happy exchange! Then will the patience of God be salvation to you, when his goodness leads you to repentance.

2. The young Christian hath apparent reason to be thankful for that grace, which hath sanctified his heart, and turned away his eyes from beholding vanity.

My brethren in the Lord, permit me to remind you, that you were sometimes foolish and disobedient, serving divers lusts and pleasures; but there is now room for us to congratulate you, and say, Blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear. You now know your true interest; the fear of the Lord is implanted in your heart, and your eyes are directed heavenwards. You are experiments!y acquainted with the pleasure which religion brings, and see that you have exchanged your tinsel for gold; your shadows for the most valuable substance; the momentary blaze and crackling of thorns, for the steady light, and influence, and glory of the sun, which is shining more and more till the perfect day.

Let me invite you to the most cheerful acknowledgments of the riches of divine grace to you. Bless God for the new nature he hath given you; for that heart of flesh into which the rock is transformed by a new-creating power; for those new hopes which he hath opened upon you. Bless him, that you are now sheltered from the storms of divine wrath, and that, instead of looking forward to the judgment-day, with the horrors of a malefactor, who is then to be condemned and executed, you are rather lifting up your heads to meet the prospect with triumph, as knowing that your complete salvation will then be manifested, and your redemption be perfected.

3. We may further infer, from what we have now been hearing, that the gospel of the blessed Jesus gives us very great advantages for reclaiming young persons from the snares of sensuality and ruin.

The text abundantly intimates the importance of those considerations, which are taken from the final judgment. Now it is certain, the gospel discovers this in the strongest light. Therein is the wrath of God revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; and some more awful views of judgment are given, than even the language of the prophets, emphatical as it is, can furnish out. In the gospel, we are not only told in general, that God will judge the world in righteousness, but particularly assured, that he will do it by that man whom he hath appointed, even the Lord Jesus Christ, who for that purpose shall descend from heaven, in his own glory, and the glory of the Father, and all the holy angels with him; that the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised; that small and great shall stand before God; while in the mean time the world is in flames around them, the sun being darkened, and the moon not giving her light, the stars falling, the heavens passing away with a great noise, the elements melting with fervent heat, the earth with all things in it being burnt up, and departing out of its place. And can any thing be more awakening and awful than all this pomp of horror, this conflagration and confusion of nature? Yes, Sirs, there is one thing yet more awakening; and it is that which the gospel expressly pronounces, that, in consequence of all, the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, and the righteous into life eternal. Eternity, eternity, my brethren, is the declaration of the gospel. Nature might lead us to suspect it, the law might give some intimation of it, but the gospel alone asserts it; and not only asserts it, but describes it too. It lends to our faith that perspective by which we descry the paradise of God, and it lays hell open before us, so that destruction hath no covering. The Christian preacher may then say it, with an energy beyond what Solomon could conceive, merely on the principles of the Jewish revelation, Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, &c. but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

Nor must I by any means omit that grand advantage which the gospel gives us in these addresses, by the discovery of the blessed Jesus under the character of a Saviour. It displays him as the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely; as inviting, as waiting, as pleading, as weeping over sinners, yea, as bleeding and dying for them: as describing the terrors of judgment, that he may awaken them to flee from it, and may gather them as a hen gathers her chickens under her compassionate protecting wings. But is this a simile that we may use, when speaking of him who is to appear under the character of "the worthy Judge eternal?" Yes, my friends, low as it may seem, it is a simile that he himself uses, and perhaps uses it in part because it is so low, that the language itself may be a specimen of that condescension which it is intended to express.

Such is that wonderful contrast of what is most awful, and most engaging, in the gospel; and this gospel, Sirs, do you daily hear. To you is the word of this salvation sent; to you is the whole counsel of God declared. May you never be left to reject it against yourselves, but may divine grace render it a savour of life unto life! Once more;

4. We may further infer, that the serious thoughts of death must be very useful to young persons, since judgment is so nearly connected with it.

It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment; and though the final solemnity of that judgment may be delayed to distant ages, the state of the soul is in a moment unalterably fixed: and, in this sense, as the tree falls, so it must lie, for there is no device nor working in the grave.

Now, as this is generally acknowledged, we may naturally conclude, that those who remember death will not forget judgment. Let me, therefore, my young friends, call down your thoughts to the grave; and methinks, among so many monuments of mortality, it should not be difficult to do it.

Recollect, I beseech you, what of that kind you have seen the year past. How many of you have attended the funerals of youth like yourselves, of children much younger than yourselves! They have given up the ghost, and where are they! What a change hath death made! Where are they? Why, perhaps, what remains of them, within the walls of this place, under the feet of some of you. Could your eye penetrate a few feet of earth, you would see them; but oh, what spectacles of horror would you discover! Yet perhaps a year ago they were in the number of the most amiable objects of your sight. And such is your bloom, such is your vigour: and will you presume upon it, presume so far as to continue exposed to all the terrors of divine judgment, in a vain dependence that some years hence you shall consider and escape it?

O that you were wise, that you understood this, that you would consider your latter end! O that you would be willing to converse with the dying, and the dead! you will, no doubt, soon have renewed opportunities of doing it. Some will probably be called away for lessons to the rest; and before the year rolls round, you may perhaps see some pious youth going with joy and triumph to glory, or some careless incorrigible creature dying in terror, or, which is yet more dreadful, in a stupid insensibility of soul. Reflect, my brethren, on what of this kind you have seen; attend to what you may further see: and remember, that the house of mourning may prove a school of the most useful discipline, if the living will lay it to heart.

But why do I mention the house of mourning? You are perhaps going to that of feasting.* The leisure of the season invites to it; and custom hath established it into a law, to close the old year and begin the new with some peculiar vanities, in some more than ordinary forgetfulness of all the important purposes for which time and the opportunities of it are given. Such is our wisdom, such is our gratitude, such is our consistence with the name we bear, and the profession we make!

* N. B. This sermon was preached at Northampton, Dec. 25, 1745.

You are perhaps, some of you, impressed with what you have heard; but I am much afraid there are those that within twelve days, or even twelve hours, will have lost the impression, and be as unconcerned about this great judgment, as if God's own hand had sent them a discharge from appearing at it. It is a discouraging case, and it makes us your ministers almost dread this season, cheerful as it is thought, as that in which former convictions will be worn off, and the heart of unthinking youth will be steeled against those that might otherwise be made: as the season, in which we do, as it were, see the infernal lion bearing away the lambs of our flock, even before our faces.

But we will at least cry out for their deliverance, we will lift up our voice like a trumpet; and may hope, that some of you will take the warning, and hide the word of God in your heart. Sinners will no doubt be enticing you, to walk as they do in the way of the heart, and according to the sight of the eyes; but consent not to the solicitation, if you would not be destroyed with them, in that day when they shall appear, as they have now been represented, unable to stand in the judgment, and shall perish from this unhappy way which they have taken; and that in a moment, when the wrath of him, whom they now despise, shall but begin to be kindled against them: for it shall be kindled with such terrors, that they shall say to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand? The Lord grant, that you may all find mercy of the Lord in that day! Amen.

SERMONS

ON THE POWER AND GRACE OF CHRIST, AND ON THE EVIDENCES OF HIS GOSPEL.*

DEDICATION.

To the young persons of the auditory and society under my stated ministerial care, these ten Sermons, at first preached and published with a peculiar view to their edification, is now, with the most cordial prayers for their temporal and eternal happiness, inscribed by their

Most affectionate friend,
And faithful servant in the bonds of our common Lord,

P. DODDRIDGE.

PREFACE.

GROWING experience convinces me, that I have no reason to fear lest candid and judicious readers should be offended with me, for having given way to some warmth of devout affection in the greatest part of these discourses; the subjects are of a nature not only to excuse but to require it. And while I have any reverence for Scripture, or any knowledge of human nature, I shall never affect to speak of the glories of Christ, and the eternal interest of men, as coldly as if I were reading a lecture of mathematics, or relating an experiment in natural philosophy. I hope I shall always remember how unworthy the character of a man and a Christian it is, to endeavour to transport men's passions, while the understanding is left uninformed, or the judgment unconvinced: but so far as is consistent with a proper regard to these leading powers of our nature, I heartily pray, that I, and all other gospel ministers, may so feel the energy of divine truths on our own souls, as to preach and write concerning them with a holy fervency and ardour; nor can I imagine it would bode well to the interest of religion in general, to endeavour to lay all those passions asleep, which surely were implanted in our hearts by God, to subserve the religious, as well as civil, life; and which, after all, will probably be employed to some very excellent or very pernicious purposes.

I would hope that these Sermons, and those on Regeneration, will be of some service to religious families, especially on the evenings of the Lord's day. We are happy in a great number of excellent discourses suitable to such an occasion; and perhaps in none more suitable than in the two volumes of sermons at Berry street, of which I can with great cheerfulness repeat what I said, when making my acknowledgments to the founder, immediately after their publication: "That I cannot recollect where I have seen a set of important thoughts on such various and weighty subjects more judiciously selected, more accurately digested, more closely compacted, more naturally expressed, or in so few words more powerfully enforced, than I have generally found in those sermons: on account of which, I doubt not but the thanksgivings of many are often abounding to the glory of God."

I esteem it my great felicity, to be engaged with those worthy authors in the same great design of assisting to form men's minds to a scriptural religion and a Christian temper: and though many provinces may appear much more splendid in the eyes of the learned and the polite world, I trust ours will be at least as favourably remembered in the presence of the Lord Jesus Christ at his coming; and I would have no standard of honour, wisdom, and happiness, which will not stand the test of that important day.

SERMON XII.

THE ABILITY OF CHRIST TO SAVE TO THE UTTERMOST.

HEB. vii. 25.

Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

A VARIETY of trifles in life are daily breaking in upon us, and hurrying us away into a forgetfulness of God and ourselves. But how much soever we may be careful and cumbered, agitated and distracted, about many things, one thing is needful, viz. the approach of the soul to God, that it may see and enjoy his salvation. The most important question, is that of the awakened and trembling jailer, What shall I do to be saved? And the only pertinent answer to that question, is that which the apostle gave, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.

And have these latter days, these ages (as we are ready fondly to imagine them) of greater refinement and reason, discovered any new method of salvation? God forbid there should ever be any pretence to it! When we see a person, like our Lord, appearing in an opposite cause, with an equal pomp of miracles, with equal demonstration and power of the Spirit, we may perhaps let go that anchor of our souls, which we now esteem as sure and stedfast; but till then we will, by divine grace, strenuously retain that gospel, which is recorded by those, who first preached it, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven: and if an angel were to appear, in robes of the purest light, and with all the charms of a celestial eloquence, to establish any other foundation, far from yielding to the evidence of such a single wonder, in opposition to so many greater, we would hold that angel accursed; as we might certainly conclude, that he wore a deceitful form, and was a messenger from the father of lies.

If the gospel be indeed of divine original, and we are not following cunningly devised fables, it is most certain that those doctrines, which are peculiar to it, are not only true, but infinitely important. And shall we, who are stewards of the mysteries of God, decline insisting upon them, because they are such common topics, and because we must in effect be obliged to say the same things again and again? As well might we despise bread, because it is an old-fashioned diet, on which our ancestors have fed for a long succession of ages, and on which the lowest of our species are subsisted. As reasonably, and much more safely, might the physician decline the use of all the most celebrated medicines, recommended by the experience of many hundred years, and pride himself in trying only such, as had hitherto been entirely unknown: nay, he might much better do it; for it is possible, that there may yet lie hid, amongst the secrets of Nature, some plant or drug of unknown virtues, some richer cordial, and more sovereign antidote, than has ever yet been discovered: but we are as sure, as we can be of any thing in the revelation we profess to believe, that there is salvation in no other, neither is there any other name under heaven given among men, but that of Jesus, whereby they can obtain righteousness and life.

I hope therefore it will not (as, I am sure, it should not) be disagreeable to you to hear, that after the many sacred hours we have spent together in meditations on such subjects as these, I am again to resume the theme, and to discourse to you from it for some succeeding sabbaths. I do it at the desire of a friend,* who has recommended the subject to me with a peculiar regard to the rising generation, for whose use these discourses are to be made yet more public. And I would hope, they will not be the less agreeable to my younger friends, or any of my other hearers, because they are equally the concern of all; and such a concern, as to be the very life of our souls, and (as I have largely shown elsewhere†) the only foundation of our eternal hopes.

The holy apostle Paul had (as he elsewhere very emphatically expresses it) a continual most tender and zealous affection for his brethren of the Jewish nation, his kinsmen according to the flesh; and this epistle is a remarkable monument of it. It was indeed directed to the believing Hebrews, and its most evident design is, to animate them to adhere resolutely to the Christian faith, whatever dangers or difficulties might attend that resolution. But the mind of this excellent man was very capacious, and continually filled with a variety of schemes for the advancement of the gospel, the glory of his Lord, and the salvation of souls: and as he could not but know, that it was highly probable that this, rather than any other of his epistles, would fall into the hands of many as yet unconverted Jews, he not only conceals his name, against which he knew they were strongly prejudiced, but in a very wise and happy manner makes use of such sentiments and such language here, as might be very proper to awaken and convince the unconverted, as well as to assist the faith and the joy of them who had believed in Christ, that they might be justified by him, and not by the works of the law. And if any have not made this remark, I apprehend they have lost much of the strength and beauty of this excellent epistle.

In pursuit of these great and very harmonious designs, the sacred writer insists largely on the dignity of the person and offices of our great Re-decree. He represents him as far superior to the most exalted angels, and therefore much more to the most excellent of the children of men; superior to Moses, that most honourable servant of the Lord, who was faithful in all his house; superior to Abraham, the friend of God, and father of the faithful; superior to Aaron the priest of the Lord, and all the holy family descended from his loins. And it is on this branch of the argument that he is now insisting. He labours at large, by a chain of reasoning which I have not time to trace, to show that our Lord was made after the order of Melchizedec, in many glorious and important circumstances, in which the priesthood of Melchizedec was superior to that of Aaron and his sons: amongst other instances, this is one of the most considerable, that whereas in the family of Aaron there were successively many high priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death, this illustrious person, the Lord Jesus Christ, because he continues ever, in immortal life and glory, hath an unchangeable priesthood, or (as the word* most exactly signifies,) a priesthood which does not pass from one successor to another. Now from hence the apostle draws that important inference in the words of my text, "Wherefore he is able to save to the uttermost," completely and perpetually to save, all, that in the remotest ages and nations of the world desire to come unto God by him, (or to make use of his mediation, when they approach the throne of God as humble worshippers,) seeing he ever lives, to make a most prevalent intercession for them; of which, (as the apostle elsewhere more largely states it,) the intercession of the high priest before the mercy-seat on the solemn day of atonement was but a very imperfect type.

It will be the business of several succeeding discourses on these words,

I. To consider what we are to understand by Christ's being able to save to the uttermost.

II. To prove that he is really so.

III. To consider the particular argument for it, which the apostle draws from his ever living to make intercession for them. And,

IV. To state the character of those who may expect salvation from him, which is here expressed by their coming to God by him.

You see the copiousness of the subject we are entering upon. I shall endeavour, in the prosecution of it, to lay before you the genuine doctrine of the gospel on these various and important heads, with plainness and seriousness. And I humbly implore the influence of the divine Spirit, to open mine eyes, that I may behold the wonders contained in his word; and to open your ears so to hear them, and your hearts so to embrace them, that every soul here present may be an eternal monument of Christ's being able to save to the uttermost, and may for ever live to receive the fruits of that intercession, which our blessed High Priest is ever living to make. Amen.

First, I am to consider what we are to understand by Christ's being able to save to the uttermost.

For clearing up this matter I would only offer these three remarks.——It implies the danger and calamity of those, to whom Christ is proposed as a Saviour;—it expresses a power of working out complete deliverance for them;—and it further imports the continuance of that saving power without diminution or decay, throughout all succeeding generations.

1. When Christ is spoken of as able to save, it strongly implies, "That those, to whom he is proposed as a Saviour, are, without him, in a state of danger and calamity."

It would be a foolish mispending of time to attempt to prove at large, that in Scripture, as well as in ordinary speech, to save, and to deliver, are words of the same import. "Jesus shall save his people from their sins;" and "he delivers us from the wrath to come."

It is a most obvious remark, but so necessary, as not to be lightly dismissed, That the whole have no need of a physician, but they who are sick; and the secure have no need of a Saviour, but they who are in danger. And as the apostle argues, that if Christ died for all, then were all dead, all were in a state of death, or they would not have needed such an expiatory sacrifice; so we may assure ourselves, that if Christ is to be offered to all as a Saviour, then were all in a state of ruin. And if he is of God to be made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption, then are we without him destitute of all these, foolish and guilty, polluted and enslaved, condemned and perishing.

This is expressly asserted in a variety of scriptures, largely and laboriously proved in the three first chapters of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and generally acknowledged by all who pretend to believe the gospel; as indeed it must be, if they would not in the most notorious manner contradict themselves. Yet, alas, how little is it felt! We see it in the indolence of men's lives, we see it in the air of indifference with which the tidings of salvation are commonly received. The greater part of mankind are soothed into an insensibility of their danger; they are amused with the dreams of sensual pleasure, with the vain rovings of a gay imagination, and the fond expectation of a thousand satisfactions, which they never have found and never will find, in life. And hence it comes to pass, that they hear not the thunder of God's law, loud and dreadful as it is; nor see the flaming sword of his vengeance, stretched out against them, and just ready to give them the mortal blow. And probably it is the case of several amongst you. Perhaps many of you may find, even on the most transient reflection, that you were never alarmed with a sense of your danger, nor saw yourselves perishing without a Saviour: but if it be so, give me leave to proclaim it aloud, with all the earnestness which is suited to a matter of life and death, that it is time, high time, for you immediately to awake out of sleep; for you nod on the brink of a precipice, and there is but a hand's breath between you and eternal ruin.

In the name of God, Sirs, and as you love your own souls, rouse up your stupified senses, and open those drowsy eyes. Look into the holy law of God, and read over the records of conscience; and see the agreement, or rather, the dreadful disagreement and contrariety between them: such a contrariety, that one would almost think, you imagined that the commands of God were given to tell you what you should not do, rather than what you should. And dare you imagine, that the eternal God, with all his almighty power, and all his unspotted holiness, will look with indifference on the violation of his law, merely because you have the boldness to violate it with indifference? Do you think he had no meaning, or that it was not a meaning full of terror, when he told the Israelites of old, that if they presumed thus to walk contrary to him, they should be cursed in the city, and cursed in the field, cursed in the fruit of their body, and in the fruit of their ground, cursed in their coming in, and cursed in their going out; nay, that a fire should be kindled in his anger, that should burn even unto the lowest hell; that should consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains? Think you the Scripture speaks in vain, when it says such terrible things as these? Or will you say these things were only spoken to the Jews of old? Can you imagine, that sins committed in the land of Canaan, some thousands of years ago, should provoke the eyes of God's holiness, and kindle the flames of his wrath; and that he should wink at crimes committed in the present age, and in Britain; while we have higher advantages to know our duty, and stronger engagements to perform it, than even that favourite nation of Israel had? I appeal to your consciences, sinners, whether this thought has even the lightest degree of probability in it. And if it has not, then surely here is danger, and horror, in all their most frightful forms. To see the drawn sword of an inexorable enemy waved round your defenceless head, or pointed at your naked breast; or to see this building all in flames, and yourselves surrounded beyond possibility of escape, (were the prospect to terminate there,) were a danger at which a man might justly smile, and stand collected and composed, when compared with that into which sin has brought you, and in which the gospel finds you.

And it is a terrible aggravation, that without Divine assistance this danger is inevitable. We can neither vindicate our conduct, nor atone for our offences; we can neither avoid nor endure the punishment, should God lay justice to the line, and righteousness to the plummet. All our soul is enfeebled, and all our nature corrupted; and he must be a great stranger to himself, as well as to the rest of mankind, who will not acknowledge with the apostle, that when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for us. This is apparently the doctrine of the gospel: and as the forerunner of Christ made way for him, by declaring that men were by their sin in danger of the wrath to come, and that the axe of divine judgment was laid to the root of the trees; so I think it is our duty, as we tender the honour of our Redeemer, and the salvation of your souls, often to be reminding you of these things; and the words of the text so naturally imply them, that I am persuaded you cannot think them a digression. But I add,

2. When it is said, that Christ is able to save to the uttermost, it must express a "power of working out complete deliverance for his people."

So some judicious commentators descant upon these words, and I think with a great deal of reason, "He is able to save in the most perfect manner, so that nothing shall be wanting to complete the salvation."* And this is a thought of so great importance to our joy and peace in believing, that I will further illustrate it by the mention of various particulars, which are evidently comprehended in complete salvation. But I shall only touch on them now, because some of them are to be resumed at large under the second general.

Our Lord Jesus Christ is able "completely to answer the demands of divine justice, and thereby to save us from the curse of the law."—It was indeed impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin; but we may easily believe, that the blood of Christ, who through the Eternal Spirit offered himself a spotless sacrifice to God, should avail to that blessed purpose, and be accepted as an infinitely valuable and adequate satisfaction. Justly may we conclude, that the offended Deity is now rendered propitious, and that by faith in a Redeemer we may be justified from all things, from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses. Here is a door of hope opened, not only to those who have escaped the grosser pollutions which are in the world through lust, and maintained a fair and honourable character for the decency and morality of their behaviour, but even for the chief of sinners. Iniquities that have been as scarlet, may be made white as snow, and those that have been red as crimson, may be as wool.

The almighty power of Christ, as a Saviour, extends to the "sanctification of our natures," as well as to the justification of our persons before God; for he is made of God unto us, not only righteousness, but sanctification, in order to his being made complete redemption.—When our own most vigorous efforts fail us, and prove too feeble to break those cords in sunder, by which we are natually enslaved and disgraced; when we find that to attempt a reformation of our corrupt habits and exorbitant passions, is but as if the Ethiopian should labour to change his skin, or the leopard his spots; by the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, we may be made free from the law of sin and death, and be formed by his grace to such a temper, as may render our souls a delightful habitation for a holy God. As by his healing touch in the days of his flesh he removed an inveterate leprosy, which no human methods of cure could reach; so can he diffuse purity and health throughout all the soul, if he put forth his gracious hand, and say, to the most polluted and degenerate creature, I will, be thou clean. Again,

The Lord Jesus Christ is able to save his people "from all the artifice and power of the prince of darkness."—If that crooked serpent attempt to insinuate himself into the hearts of Christ's people by the most artful methods, he can trace all his winding ways; and as all the treasures of divine wisdom are hid in him, he knows how to turn all the most wily practices of this experienced deceiver into his own confusion; to detect every laboured stratagem, and from the most dangerous snares to teach such useful lessons of holy prudence, as shall tend to the future security, as well as the immediate deliverance, of his servants.—Or should Satan put on the form of a roaring lion, to throw their souls into a trembling horror, it shall appear in this respect, as in others, that the Lion of the tribe of Judah prevails. He who has spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly on the cross, will still assert the conquest he has gained. And it shall appear, to the everlasting disappointment and shame of all the host of hell, that it was not a vain boast, but the words of eternal wisdom, as well as invariable faithfulness, when he said, I will give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. Which leads me to add further,

That Christ is able to save to the uttermost, as "he can enable his people to persevere to the end of their course, even in the midst of the most formidable opposition."—The state of a Christian is indeed a warfare, and he had need to be completely armed for the combat: but he may depend on being victorious in it, under the conduct of the great Captain of his salvation, who can teach his hands to war, and his fingers to fight, so that even a bow of steel should be broken by his naturally feeble arms. Jesus, his great covenant-head, to whom the Spirit is given without measure, can pour it out in so plentiful a manner, that were a career of labour, or of suffering, arduous and hazardous as that of the blessed apostle Paul, to be opened before the weakest saint, he might say, with such composure and intrepidity as Paul did, I can do all things, or am sufficient for all, through Christ that strengtheneth me; and might repeat the triumph which he has taught us, What shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us. Yea,

Our blessed Redeemer is able to save to the uttermost, as "he can support his people in death, and receive their spirits to a world of glory."—In that awful hour, when the dearest of their human friends stand around them with tears of unavailing pity, he can command deliverance for them; he can support them, though flesh and heart fail, by the lively views of approaching glory, while he strengthens the eye of faith, to see, as it were, heaven opened, and himself standing at the right hand of God, to receive the departing spirit. So that the Christian may justly make his exit from off the stage of life, with those graceful words of the apostle, I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep what I have committed to him until that day. And when he hath shot the awful gulf, and is cut off from any further commerce with earth and its inhabitants, he still finds himself in a province of the Redeemer's empire, and feels the important support of that hand, which bears the keys of death and the unseen world. And, to add no more on this head,

The Lord Jesus Christ is able to save his people to the uttermost, as "he can raise their bodies from the dissolution of the grave, and conduct their complete persons to the regions of eternal felicity."—He is the resurrection and the life; and though death be the king of terrors, he knows and owns the conquest of the King of glory, who will at length swallow him up in victory; so that there shall be no more remainder of his power, than if he had never invaded any of the subjects of Christ. Their triumphant prince will verify the heroic words of Moses to the Egyptian tyrant, in a far more exalted sense: There shall not a hoof be left behind. The sleeping dust of his people, wherever it be dispersed, is still within the ken of his discerning eye, and the reach of his almighty hand; and when the appointed hour is come, all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth; and so illustrious a change shall pass on their vile bodies, that they shall be fashioned like unto his own glorious body, according to that mighty power whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. When this noble work of his power shall be accomplished, and in it the schemes of his love completed, with regard to all his elect, then shall he be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe. Experience shall then most amply attest, what such a variety of other evidences is now assuring us of; and the whole redeemed world shall ring with the joyful acknowledgment, That he is able to save to the uttermost, in the most complete manner, in the most perfect degree.

I know all these thoughts are common and plain; yet I have insisted thus largely upon them, because they are the great foundations of our faith and hope: and had I been capable of furnishing out any curious and abstruse speculations on the subject, I am sure, that when laid in the balance with these sacred and important truths, they would have been lighter than a feather, weighed against talents of gold. But I would proceed to observe,

3. That when it is said that Christ is able to save to the uttermost, it may further imply, "that the efficacy of his saving grace continues the same, throughout all succeeding ages."

Some very celebrated commentators have taken the phrase in this sense, and rendered it, He is able always to save;* and it must be confessed, at least, that the following connexion evidently proves this to be implied. For the apostle had before observed, that Christ had an unchangeable priesthood, that admitted of no successor; and, in the close of the verse he argues his ability to save, from his ever living to make intercession; and therefore it cannot be improper here to touch on this thought, in whichever part of the text we suppose it chiefly to be suggested.†

Our Lord Jesus Christ was able to save from the beginning. His energy wrought from the date of the first promise to our fallen parents, as his saving power and grace were indeed the foundation of it. And still, from that day to the present, has the seed of the woman been bruising the serpent's head in many instances, which have been as preludes to the complete expected triumph.

By faith in him, under the more obscure discoveries before his incarnation, the elders obtained a good report, and died in expectation of a better resurrection. Their faith embraced him, according to the degree in which he was revealed; they saw his day, in a distant prospect, and rejoiced; and were received to the divine favour here, and to eternal happiness above, in regard to a sacrifice which was yet to be offered, and a righteousness which was yet to be wrought out.

He appeared to be able to save, when he dwelt on earth in a tabernacle of clay. Still he mingled the dignity and power of a God, with the abasements and infirmities of a mortal man; asserting to himself the divine prerogative of forgiving sins; speaking of a glorious resurrection, and eternal life, as his gift; representing himself as the head-stone of the corner, on whom was fixed all the stress of men's eternal interests; and as the awful judge, before whose tribunal the greatest of the children of men should stand, and from whom all should receive that decisive sentence, which should fix them in final happiness or despair. Nay, even in his deepest humiliation, on the cursed tree, a ray of divine glory broke through that dark cloud of infamy with which he was then surrounded; and amidst all the scorn and rage of insulting enemies, who were reproaching him as a wretch abandoned by God and man, he speaks from the cross, as from the throne; and, as the King of heaven, takes upon him to dispose of seats in paradise, and to promise life and glory, to one who was then sharing with him in the agonies of death, and the ignominy of crucifixion; Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

Now, if he were thus mighty to save, when he dwelt in so humble a form, when he passed through so calamitous a scene; how much more evidently is he so, amidst all the magnificence of his exaltation in the highest heaven; whither he has ascended as a glorious conqueror, having led captivity captive, and received gifts for men! Can we imagine, that an abode of seventeen hundred years at the right hand of the Majesty on high, has enervated his arm, that he cannot save, or rendered his ear heavy, that he cannot hear? It were a thought most evidently absurd! We may therefore confidently assure ourselves that he is, at this moment, as able to exert an almighty power for the salvation of his people, as he was on that illustrious day, when he poured out the Spirit on his disciples at the feast of Pentecost; or that in which he appeared to Paul on the way to Damascus, with the glories of heaven new upon him, even with a lustre exceeding that of the meridian sun, and in a moment subdued his stubborn heart, and transformed him from a persecutor to an apostle.

Still is our Redeemer able to save, and still shall he continue to be so. When we and our children are laid in the dust of death, he shall be the joy and

* Christus non tantum potest, quamdiu mortalis erit, sed et nunc continuo potest salvare. Estius, in loc.

† I cannot think it easy, or necessary, to determine which of these two senses of saving to the uttermost is to be preferred: it is certain, both the thoughts are comprehended in the verse. If, by saving to the uttermost, we understand saving perpetually, the completeness of the deliverance is comprehended in the word save; if we prefer the other sense, of saving completely, that comprehends the perpetuity of it, which is most expressly asserted in the following words. I think Bremmius justly unites both, when he explains it, εἰς τὸ παντελὲς, perfecte, et in perpetuum; and I have the pleasure to find, since I wrote this, that the great and excellent Dr. Owen explains the text in this extent, almost in the very words I had used above, which therefore I shall not transcribe. See Owen on the Heb. vol. iii. p. 235 and 238.

confidence of a new race of believers; and, to the very end of time, one generation shall arise and declare his righteousness to another, and their righteousness shall still retain its original value. This foundation of God shall stand sure, though rocks moulder into dust, and the mountains are removed out of their place; yea, when the sun shall fade away in its orb, and all the golden lamps of these lower heavens are extinguished, the sun of glory shall shine forth with undiminished radiancy: and if the work of rescue and deliverance cease, it will be only because danger and misery shall no longer be known, and the very last of his enemies is completely subdued. Yet still his victorious energy shall continue the same, and it shall be as true of his power as of his fidelity and grace, that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

I have thus endeavoured to show you what we are to understand by this phrase of Christ's being able to save to the uttermost:—it implies the danger and misery of those to whom he is proposed as a Saviour;—and evidently expresses a power of working out complete deliverance,—and the continuance of that power throughout all generations.

I shall conclude this head, and the present discourse, with two very obvious reflections on what I have already delivered. How great is that salvation which the Lord Jesus Christ hath wrought out for us!—and how much are we all concerned very seriously to inquire after it!

1. How great is that salvation which the Lord Jesus Christ hath wrought out!

We have been taking a survey of many important branches of it; and is it not most evidently worthy of the title that the apostle gives it, when he styles it, "So great salvation?" So great indeed it is, that if we compare with it the most illustrious salvations which God wrought out for Israel of old, far from being eclipsed, it will rather be brightened by the comparison; and it will appear how justly he might say, I, even I, am the Lord, and besides me there is no Saviour: none that, compared with me, deserves that important name. It was a great salvation which God wrought out for Israel by Moses, when he broke the power of Egypt by repeated blows; when he led the chosen tribes through the Red sea, and through the desert, guided by the pillar of cloud and fire, and supplied by heavenly bread, and water streaming from the flinty rock. But the salvation of Christ is ten thousand times more important. A pious Israelite under the rod of an Egyptian oppressor, might have risen in holy contemplation and devotion, from the brick-kiln or the dungeon to the presence of God as his Father, to a liberty of soul before him, which would have rendered his servitude happier than Pharaoh's royalty: or should the sword of the tyrant have taken away his life, he would have found the stroke a blessed release, to a state of complete and eternal glory. But our souls, in this state of apostasy, were enslaved to Satan and to sin; we were incapable of spiritual pleasure; we were lost to all future hope; till Jesus appeared, and seasonably came to break the iron yoke of our fatal bondage; to conduct us by his Spirit through all the perplexities and dangers of the wilderness: and, in our way to the heavenly Canaan, to feed us with the true bread from heaven, and to give us that water of life, of which, if a man drink, he shall thirst no more. Have we not infinite reason to say, This deliverer is worthy of more glory than Moses!—It was a great salvation that was wrought by Aaron, when the plague was broke out against Israel; when it was running through their ranks, and laying them, in a moment, in the dust of death: and that anointed priest of the Lord, by divine instigation, took a censer in his hand, and placing himself between the dead and the living, put a stop to the spreading destruction, and made an acceptable atonement for the sins of the people. But how much more prevalent is the atonement of Jesus, our great High Priest, who arose, and stood in the breach, to turn away the wrath of God from us; the incense of whose intercession not only, like Aaron's, procures the reprieve of a mortal life, but the favour of God and eternal happiness!—But neither Aaron nor Moses completed the purposes of the divine favour to Israel his people; and it was in some respect a greater salvation than either of these, that Joshua effected, when he led them through Jordan to the land of promise; when he vanquished the kings of Canaan and their armies; when he stopped the sun in its career, to give them light to pursue their conquest; till at last he divided the whole country to them for an inheritance, even the land flowing with milk and honey. But this was only a type of the true Joshua, who, having himself conquered our enemies alone, and trodden them down like grapes in the wine-press, causes us to share in the fruit of his victory by assigning us a settlement in a better country, that is, a heavenly. Were I to speak of the succeeding salvations under their judges and their kings, I should, by mentioning a succession of deliverances, intimate the comparative imperfection of each. In the land of their inheritance Israel sinned against the Lord: and they were chastened there, and oppressed by one enemy after another; till, at length, the whole nation of them were dispossessed of it, and fell by the sword, or were carried into captivity. But it is the glory of Jesus, our great deliverer, to perfect his work, conducting his people to a world of everlasting security, from which they can never be expelled, and in which they shall never be molested. Let them the rod of Moses, and the censer of Aaron, and the sword of Joshua, and the sceptre of David, bow to the superior glories of the cross of Christ, and be laid down in humble reverence at the footstool of his throne. And let our souls adore Jesus the Almighty Saviour, and be daily more solicitous to secure an interest in that salvation which he has introduced. Which leads me to add,

2. How important is it, that we all seriously inquire after this mighty Saviour!

You have all frequently heard of him. Let conscience say, whether you have diligently inquired into the credentials he brings, into the offer he makes, into your own concern in such proposals as these. I fear, many of you are conscious to yourselves that you have neglected this great salvation. Unhappy creatures, how will you escape, if you persist in such a neglect?

Yet still, my friends, after all that is past, there will (if God continue our lives a few sabbaths longer) be another opportunity of reviewing these things at large. I am more fully to lay before you the proof that Christ is able to save to the uttermost, the efficacy of his intercession for this blessed purpose, and the character of those who may expect this salvation from him. Let me bespeak the serious attention of all, and particularly of the younger part of my auditors. Let passion, and business, and every worldly vanity, be silent; and let every one that hath an ear, hear what the Spirit is still saying to the churches; what it is the very life of sinners to know, the duty of every faithful minister often to repeat, and the wisdom of the most established saints often to recollect.

SERMON XIII.

THE PROOFS OF CHRIST'S ABILITY TO SAVE.

HEB. vii. 25.

Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

Though the nature of man be sadly degenerated, and we are alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in us; yet there are some remainders of human and social affection, which seem so wrought into the constitution of our soul, as to be as inseparable from us as our being. From hence the mind feels itself delighted with the survey of benevolent actions, no less necessarily, than the eye with the finest prospect, or the ear with the most harmonious music. Nor can it be merely a regard to our own interest, which adds a relish to such accounts; for we delight to hear them, though the scene be laid in the most distant age, or country. Nay, fictions of this kind have a secret charm, which it is not easy to resist; and the pleasure is real, where we know the occasion of it to be only imaginary.

But sure it may be said with the utmost propriety, that as eye hath not seen, nor ear by credible report heard, so neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, any other display of benevolence and goodness, even comparable to that which the gospel presents. All the celebrated exploits of real or fictitious heroes are not worth the mention, when compared with those of the great Captain of our salvation. Were we to contemplate it merely in idea, and to set aside all the evidences of it, and all the remembrance of our own concern in it; yet even then how delightful would the contemplation be! Behold the Son of God, a person to whom the mightiest potentate on earth, the most exalted angel in heaven, is but as a worm, divesting himself of celestial glory, putting on the form of a wretched mortal, and submitting to death in the most horrible shape! For what? to free some single nation from civil bondage? to humble some proud tyrant of the earth? to restore an oppressed people to liberty and peace? or to form uncultivated savages to discipline, arts, and social life? These are great things for a man to do; these may render the name of a prince immortal. But the Lord of glory descends for nobler purposes: to conquer and destroy the tyrant of hell, to rescue from his cruel servitude an innumerable multitude of all nations, and people, and kindreds, and tongues; to form their grovelling and degenerate minds to the most useful knowledge, to the noblest sentiments, and the most exalted pleasures; to bring them to the glorious liberty and inestimable privileges of the children of God; and, finally, to fix them for ever in a state of honour and happiness, from whence they might look down with superior contempt on whatever earth can afford, most grateful to our senses, most amusing to our imaginations, most transporting to our passions.

I have already told you that all this, and much more than this, is comprehended in the phrase of Christ's being able to save to the uttermost. But is all this only a pleasing dream, an agreeable amusement of thought? Is it only what our fancy may paint, and our hearts might wish? Is it a conjecture built on dark probabilities, or precarious reports? No; through the divine goodness we can say, that the proofs of this salvation are as convincing, as its design is amiable, and its blessings important. We proceed therefore,

Secondly, To prove the truth we have explained; or to show you how evident it is, that the Lord Jesus Christ is able thus to save to the uttermost, and to complete the salvation of every believer, in every succeeding age of the church and world:

This is an evangelical mystery, which the deepest reach of human reason would not have been able to discover; and which, when discovered, in this corrupt state, it is too unwilling to receive. Should I take the proof in its utmost extent, it would be necessary to divide it into two grand branches; first,—to show that the gospel revelation is true; and then,—that admitting its truth, the almighty power of Christ to save follows by a most easy and necessary consequence.

The former of these is so extensive a subject, that I shall choose to handle it apart;*—and to insist at present on the latter. I hope it will not be thought an unreasonable thing, when addressing an auditory of professed Christians, now to take it for granted that the gospel is divine. Allowing it to be so, it will indeed be an easy thing to prove the ability of Christ to save. And did I aim at nothing but abstract argument, the proof might be unanswerably despatched in a very few words; for as the whole tenor of the gospel supposes it, so a multitude of scriptures directly assert it; and indeed the very words of the text may alone serve most firmly to establish it. But, my brethren, I cannot be contented with your cold and lifeless assent, to so vital and so important a doctrine. I would prove it, not merely to your understandings, but your consciences. To affect these, various topics of argument are suggested in the word of truth. I will now endeavour to trace them. O that they might be attended with such demonstration of the Spirit, that every trembling awakened sinner may be encouraged to venture his soul on this almighty Saviour; and that every Christian may be quickened to a more delightful acquiescence in him, and being strong in faith may give more abundant glory to God through Christ!

I would argue then, that our Lord Jesus Christ will evidently appear thus able to save, if we consider,—that he was commissioned by the Father for this great work;—that he appears in his person and character eminently fitted for it;—that he has done and borne all that we can imagine necessary to effect it;—that he has been approved by the Father, as having completely answered this glorious design;—that, in consequence of all, he has made such overtures and promises, as imply a full power of accomplishing it;—and that, as a convincing specimen of this power, he has already begun and carried on the salvation of a multitude of souls, whose experience confirms this comfortable truth.

If these particulars be duly considered in their connexion with each other, I am persuaded nothing more will be necessary, to prove, that Christ is able to save to the uttermost; nor could we so much as wish for clearer evidence of it, though it be the great basis of our eternal hopes: yet, because it is so, I hope you will pardon my indulging what might otherwise seem a redundancy of proof.

1. The Lord Jesus Christ was "appointed by God to the work of a Saviour," and therefore is able to perform it to the uttermost.

We are sure, that the witness of God is according to truth; and this is his testimony, that he hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son. As soon as ever the first intimations of grace and mercy were given to sinful creatures, their eyes were directed to him, as the great seed of the woman, who was to bruise the serpent's head. In succeeding ages, he is spoken of as God's servant, in whom he delighted; as his elect, in whom his soul was well pleased; and that, particularly, while he considered him as the person, who should be given for a covenant to the people, and for a light to the Gentiles. And, to show how great a stress was to be laid upon him, he is sometimes represented as made, by the immediate interposition of God, the head-stone of the corner, though he had been rejected by those whose office and profession it was to build up the church. Nay, he is elsewhere described as the foundation-stone, which God himself had laid in Sion, elect, and precious; a sure and tried stone, so that he that believeth on him shall not be confounded. When he was coming into the world, the name of Jesus was given him, on purpose to show, that he was to save his people from their sins: at his entrance on his public ministry, he was declared by a voice from heaven to be God's beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased: and through the whole course of it, he was sealed by the Spirit in an extraordinary manner, as the person who was to feed hungry souls with the meat which endureth to everlasting life.

Now surely, if we were capable of going no further than this, we might rest here with great satisfaction. The wisdom of God cannot err. He is the sovereign Judge of the fitness of ends and of means; and where his judgment is declared, we may acquiesce in it without further debate. Since he appears to have fixed Christ as a nail in a sure place, we need not fear to hang upon him even the vast weight of our eternal interest. And we might cheerfully have done it, even though God had concealed from us many of those glories of his person, which he has in some measure discovered in Scripture. Nevertheless, so far as they are there revealed, it is our happiness to know, and our wisdom attentively to consider them; which reminds me of adding,

2. That, so far as we are capable of judging, "the Lord Jesus Christ appears in his person and character, perfectly fit to accomplish the work to which he is thus divinely appointed," and to save his people even to the uttermost.

* Serm. XIX. XX. XXI.

For the illustration of this great argument, it will be proper for us humbly to view him, in his glorious appearance under the title of the great Emanuel, God with us in our nature: and to regard him as God manifested in human flesh. For the mysterious union of the divine and human natures in the person of our blessed Redeemer, is that which renders him the secure confidence of our souls, an anchor both sure and stedfast.

Even in the human nature of our Lord Jesus Christ, there is that which appears admirably suited to the blessed design of our redemption. The apostle tells us, that forasmuch as the children, whom he undertook to conduct to glory, are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself took part of the same. He was indeed bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh; and thus became capable of yielding that obedience to his Father's law, and making that atonement to his justice, which had otherwise been impossible. It was necessary that he should have somewhat to offer: he therefore assumed a mortal body, that he might offer it as a sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savour.

And that it might be so, it was absolutely requisite, that he should be an immaculate lamb. He was therefore such a victim, and such a high priest, as became us, being perfectly holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. Nor was he only free from every degree of stain and pollution, but by his own voluntary consent was made under a law, to which he was by no necessity of nature subject; that he might bring in a complete and everlasting righteousness, by the knowledge of which (having borne their sins) he might justify many.

Again, as he was perfectly fit for this great office with respect to the holiness and purity of his character; so he was likewise completely furnished for it by the most plentiful effusions of the Holy Spirit, which was given to him without measure, and poured out upon him as the oil of gladness, with which he was anointed above any of those, who by divine grace were appointed to be the humble partners of his glories. It not only descended on him, and resided in him; but from him it streamed forth, as water from a fountain. He was appointed to baptize his people with the Holy Ghost and with fire, with a spirit of wisdom, of zeal, and of holiness, as well as with that miraculous energy which wrought in so powerful a manner in the first of his servants, whom he sent forth to publish his gospel in the world.

But is this all that we can say of our Redeemer's fitness to answer the glorious character under which he appeared, and to effect the important work he undertook;—that he was an excellent and holy man, and furnished with an uncommon degree, both of the miraculous gifts and the sanctifying graces of the Spirit? No, Christians, we are very thankful, that we have not so learned Christ. We have been taught to adore him, as over all, God blessed for ever; as the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person; as Jehovah our righteousness; who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, and took upon himself no higher character, than what he had a right to claim, when he spake of himself, in his appearances to the saints under the Old Testament, as the living and true God, as a person properly divine. Here, my brethren, here is the most glorious evidence of his being able to save to the uttermost. We should dread the curse pronounced on the man that maketh flesh his arm, should we repose all the trust and confidence of our souls on created power and goodness, wisdom and fidelity, appearing in a human, or we may add, even in an angelic, form. But how cheerfully may we trust the merit of his atonement, and the efficacy of his grace, when we consider him as that glorious and wonderful person, in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily? Permit me on this occasion to resume some of the heads of my former discourse, and briefly to show how they are illustrated by this important thought.

Well may our souls magnify the Lord, and our spirits rejoice in God our Saviour; for surely in his name we may courageously set up our banners, against the various legions of surrounding enemies. Let conscience marshal our sins in order before us, as a mighty army, in the most dreadful array; let it charge us home with the exceeding sinfulness of each; and with that dreadful eloquence, which is peculiar to itself, aggravate each as a kind of infinite evil: there cannot be a malignity in any of them, or in all, greater than the efficacy of that sacred blood, which was poured forth to expiate them. Had it been merely the blood of a whole hecatomb of bulls or of goats, of innocent men, or even of holy angels, should they for such a purpose have become incarnate; we might still perhaps have been ready to object, Where is the proportion between the offence on one hand, and the satisfaction on the other? But we see it here, when we consider that the church of God is redeemed with his own blood. In that blood, we behold the honours of the divine law most gloriously displayed, and the rights of his government so strenuously asserted, that we can easily believe, that neither will be injured, by pardoning the most aggravated offences with a view to such an atonement.

Let Satan appear in every form of artifice, or of rage, possessed, as he is, of such formidable remainders of angelic knowledge, or angelic strength. We know, that by Christ were all things created, whether visible or invisible, not excepting thrones and dominions, principalities and powers. So that all the knowledge, and all the power which this prince of hell could ever boast, even in his primeval state, when a shining cherub in the regions of glory, was only a feeble reflection of the glories of his great original. His hand formed this crooked serpent; and how easily can his hand crush him, and enable even the weakest of his servants to trample him under their feet!

Storms of passion are sometimes rising, and the floods of corrupt nature are often beating fiercely on the soul; but he that stills the foaming and the roaring of the sea, can command this tempest into a calm. He that created us at first, can create us anew, can deliver us from every evil work, and preserve us to his heavenly kingdom.

Though difficulties, and dangers, and death itself lie in the way to our complete salvation, a divine power can arm us against all. While the Spirit of the Lord is with us, though destitute of all other might, vast mountains shall spread themselves into a plain before us. Destruction itself shall hear his voice, and nature shall a second time rise out of its chaos, to wear a brighter face of order and of beauty. For God brings down to the grave, and raises again. And since Christ is the Son of God by a generation which none can fully declare, by a union which none can fully comprehend; we may easily believe, that those who sleep in the dust shall come forth at his call, and that nothing shall be wanting to the everlasting security and complete happiness of those, whom he will condescend to own as his people.

You will not blame me that I have insisted thus copiously on the argument taken from the divinity of our Redeemer's person, to prove the extent of his power to save; considering the stress he himself lays upon it, in those memorable words,—I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand: my Father, who gave them me, is greater than all, and none is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one; his omnipotence is therefore mine; and in that my sheep are secure.

3. "The Lord Jesus Christ has done all that we can imagine necessary, in order to effect and secure our salvation;" and therefore we may conclude that he is able to save to the uttermost.

You have heard something of the glories of the Redeemer's person; and I trust you are not entirely strangers to the riches of his grace. I hope I may say, with the apostle, You know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich. You know that he emptied himself of that original glory, which he wore in the heavenly world, and took upon him the form of a servant, being found in fashion as a man. You know, that he submitted to the inconveniences and sorrows of a mortal life, and at last, to the agonies of an accursed death, to atone the injured justice of God, to purchase forfeited happiness for his people, to procure for them the sanctifying influences of the Spirit, and to furnish out those endearing considerations, whereby their hearts are constrained to holy obedience, more effectually than by all the terrors of the Lord; constrained, perhaps I may say, more powerfully, as well as more sweetly, than by any arguments drawn merely from a view to their own interest, and the prospects of a future reward: for love is strong as death, and in some remarkable instances has proved much stronger. I might add, that having finished his embassy on earth, and closed the scene of his labours and sufferings, he at length returned into heaven, there to appear in the presence of God for us; to present before him the blood which he shed on the cross, and in virtue of it to make continual intercession for us; using all his interest in the court of heaven, in favour of his unworthy servants on earth. But this would lead me into another branch of my subject, which I must reserve to a future discourse. And I content myself for the present with observing, that though we could not by the light of unassisted reason have known all these things to be necessary, yet now they are discovered to us, we find them to be very fit and reasonable; and cannot imagine that any thing more is requisite, completely to accomplish the work of a Saviour. But, blessed be God, we have a still surer foundation for our confidence here: for if any should urge, (what is indeed true,) that we are not competent judges of the rights of God the supreme governor, we may with great pleasure answer,

4. "That the Father hath declared his full approbation of what Christ has done under the character of a Saviour," and thereby given us the most glorious proof that he is indeed able to save to the uttermost.

His power to save, as Mediator, is evidently founded on the efficacy of that atonement which he presented to the Father for the sins of his people. We wonder not if his disciples were under some alarm, while he hung on the cross, and appeared to an eye of sense incapable of delivering himself; while they heard his insulting enemies cry out, He saved others, himself he cannot save. We wonder not, that while his sacred body slept in the dust of death, the faith of his servants was weak, and their fears strong; so that they said, with a trembling uncertainty, We trusted this had been he that should have saved Israel. But God raised Christ from the dead, and with him he raised our hope and our confidence. Thus he declared him to be the Son of God with power, and showed that the demands of his justice were satisfied, since otherwise his prisoner could not have been released. Nay, in order to declare it in the most convincing manner, God appointed that his Son's resurrection should be attended with circumstances of peculiar honour; an angel descending from heaven to roll away the stone from the door of the sepulchre; and two angels being employed to wait there, to give his dejected followers the first welcome notices of this great event.

Nor must I by any means omit the mention of that very illustrious and important circumstance, his ascension into heaven in the presence of his apostles; a cloud, as a triumphant chariot, receiving him out of their sight; and angels at the same time descending to assure them, that he who was then rising to mansions of glory, should another day appear conspicuous to every eye, when he should return under the character of universal judge.

His being admitted to sit down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and sending down, upon his intercession there, the miraculous endowments of the Spirit on the apostles, at the day of Pentecost, are incontestable and everlasting evidences of the divine acceptance, and therefore of his saving power. And surely we cannot entertain a doubt of it, when we consider, that he is gone into heaven, angels, and authorities, and powers, being made subject to him; and is there constituted, by the designation of the Father, head over all things to the church.

5. "I might further argue the ability of Christ to save, from the gracious promises of salvation which he has made either in his own person, or by those who had a commission from him."

You know those important and encouraging passages so well, that it will not be needful for me largely to insist upon them. You know how plainly they express an extent of grace, reaching even to the most enormous sinners; and therefore, how clearly they imply a correspondent extent of power. He invited all that labour and are heavy laden to come to him; and promised on their application to him, that he would give them rest. He proclaimed in a numerous assembly, on a day of public festivity, that every thirsty soul should be most cordially welcome to come unto him and drink; and assures his hearers elsewhere, that he will by no means cast out any who should come. The apostle Peter declares, that by him all that believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses, and consequently not by the law of innocence, which left no room for repentance. And St. Paul had his authority to assure us, not only that Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom himself was chief; but he adds, that it was for this very cause that he obtained mercy, that in him first, (or rather, in him as the chief) Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to such as should hereafter believe. Now let me entreat you to consider what I have already said of the dignity of his person, the glory of his kingdom, and the sanctity of his character; and then say, whether infidelity itself can suggest so unworthy a thought as this, that Jesus, the Son of God, the Lord of glory, the faithful and true witness, should ever mock and delude wretched mortals, by the offers of a salvation which nevertheless he knows he is not able to bestow? That be far from thee, O gracious Lord! and be that base and absurd suspicion as far from us! But to add no more on this head,

6. "We may very surely and comfortably argue, from the instances in which the saving power of Christ hath already been displayed, that he is able to save to the uttermost."

There is nothing that strikes the mind of a wise man like fact. Experiments do sometimes strengthen our assent to those propositions, which have been demonstrated to us, even in methods of mathematical proof: at least they impress the mind with a peculiar kind of conviction, which nothing else is capable of giving. Now, blessed be God, there is a cloud of witnesses to attest this sacred truth, that Christ has begun and carried on the salvation of a multitude of souls.

Let us look back to the history of former ages, and see how many, who were once sunk into the lowest degeneracy, have been renewed to a divine life by the gospel of Christ. What multitudes, who were once the reproach of our nature, have been washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit communicated from him. Reflect on the former and the latter conquests of divine grace; and you will see, that even the chief of sinners have not been beyond its reach.

And I persuade myself the subject will appear to be further confirmed by the experience of some who hear me this day. Are there not many of you, my friends, who find a most happy alteration in yourselves, when compared with what you once were? Are there not many whose eyes, once spiritually blind, have been opened, and their deaf ears unstopped? May I not say to you, my brethren, as Paul to the Ephesians, You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins? For that it was indeed his work, that it was wrought by his gospel and by his Spirit, you are as sure, as that it has been wrought at all.

Nay, to advance yet further in this argument, let faith unveil the eye of the soul, and help it to look forward to a world invisible to sense. View it in the light thrown upon it by Scripture, of whose divine authority you are so abundantly assured; and what a delightful spectacle will open itself there! What shining forms of holiness, and of joy! what an innumerable triumphant multitude of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues! How loud do their praises sound! With what unutterable rapture do their souls overflow, too big to be expressed even by the language of heaven! Now if it be asked, as it once was, Who are these, that are clothed in white robes? and from whence do they come? the answer may be given as there, They are come out of great tribulation: They were once the inhabitants of earth, heirs to the infirmities and sorrows of this mortal state; and the most excellent of them, even they who sacrificed their lives in the defence of the truth, and sealed it with their blood, even they have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. They owe it to his atonement and righteousness, that they are now holy and glorious creatures; and each of them will be an everlasting monument of his power, as well as of his grace. And surely when we view them in the joys and glories of the intermediate state, we may well assure ourselves, that he who has saved them thus far, is able to save them to the uttermost: and we can no more doubt, whether he can raise their bodies from the tomb, than we could have doubted, whether he could untie the linen bands in which Lazarus was held, when we had seen him loosing the bands of death, and animating his corpse after it had begun to putrify.

Nothing more can be requisite to prove the truth. I persuade myself, you are convinced, that Christ is able to save to the uttermost; and, I hope, you feel your hearts impressed, as well as your judgments satisfied. But I cannot dismiss the subject, till I have added a few reflections upon it.

Now I shall omit some, which might naturally arise from what I have already said, because they will occur afterwards with greater advantage; and shall content myself with suggesting these two, which I recommend to your further consideration.—How great is the danger of those, that reject and affront this Almighty Saviour!—And how groundless are the fears of those, that have ventured their souls upon him!

1. How great is the danger and misery of those, that reject and affront such an Almighty Saviour!

If he is able to save, he is also able to destroy; to break his enemies with a rod of iron, and to dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel! Alas, sinners, though your treatment of Christ be so odious, as to move the astonishment, as well as the indignation, of all that view him and you, in a just, that is, in a Scripture, light; yet my heart is both grieved and terrified for you, when I think what the end of your opposition to him will be. Unhappy creatures! what will you do, when he rises up? and when he judges, what will you answer him? When he proceeds to execute his sentence, how will you escape, or resist, or endure it? Were it merely the indignation of a man like yourselves, you might either oppose it or bear it. But, alas, how insupportable will be the vengeance of an almighty arm! If it could alone bring salvation, it will alone be able to bring calamity and ruin. Yet were auxiliary force necessary, all the legions of heaven would appear armed against you, under the command of Jesus their Lord. If you do indeed believe your Bibles, I wonder that you do not tremble, when you read, or hear, of that dreadful day, in which you are to be so intimately concerned; when it is expressly said, that the most insolent of his enemies shall flee before him in wild and helpless consternation; when the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, as well as others of meaner ranks, shall hide themselves in the dens, and in the rocks of the mountains, and shall say to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand? What a dreadful emphasis is there in these words! How plainly do they intimate, that they would prefer the crush of a mountain to the more insupportable weight of his wrath; and that they will have more hope of moving rocks by their entreaties, than of prevailing on their then inflexible Judge? And will your hearts endure, or your hands be strong, when the heavens shall depart as a scroll, and mountains and islands shall be removed? Were the least of the servants of Christ this day addressing himself to an assembly of the greatest princes and potentates on earth, he might be bold to say, in the name of this King of glory, Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth: serve the Lord with humble fear, and rejoice in your own dignity, or in the offers of his grace, with trembling: kiss the Son of God, in token of your ready submission to his government, lest he be angry, and you perish from the way in a moment, when his wrath is kindled against you. And this faithful and necessary warning would I now address to you, adding, as the Psalmist doth, Blessed are all they that put their trust in him; which leads us to the other reflection,

2. How unreasonable are the fears of those, that have ventured their souls upon Christ!

Too frequently does the humble Christian, in the view of all his difficulties, his dangers, and his enemies, secretly borrow the words of David in his melancholy frame, and say, I shall one day perish by their hand: but as the anointing oil of God was upon him, he preserved him in all, and made him victorious over all: and it was an emblem of the victory of the Christian, under the conduct of Christ, and the anointings of his Spirit. It is very dishonourable to Christ, as well as very uncomfortable to ourselves, to be continually terrified and alarmed, while under the care of such a helper, who declares himself the Lord mighty to save; and the devil gains a great advantage against the soul, by throwing it into such panic terrors: the succours of reason are then betrayed, and the nobler relief of faith in some measure intercepted. And therefore let the particulars I have been now illustrating be often recollected, and frequently plead them with your own hearts. "O my soul, is there any thing so peculiar in thy case, that he who has saved so many millions, cannot save thee? Has Satan acquired any new power, since Jesus conquered him on the cross? or can I imagine, that hell shall now begin to triumph over heaven, and the Almighty Shepherd be at length repulsed by these infernal wolves, so as to stand by a helpless spectator, while they are destroying his sheep? How blasphemous and how detestable a thought! My soul, thou art in the hands of Christ; and by a new act of faith, I do this moment commit thee to him, as able to save to the uttermost those that come unto God by him." Nor is that additional encouragement light and inconsiderable, which may be derived from the concluding words, Seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. But this great argument will be handled at large in the following discourse.

SERMON XIV.

CHRIST'S SAVING POWER ARGUED FROM HIS INTERCESSION.

HEB. vii. 25.

Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

As we have already endeavoured both to open and to confirm this great truth, that Christ is able to save to the uttermost, we are now, Thirdly, to consider the particular argument which the apostle suggests in proof of it, in the words of the text, which is drawn from his ever living to make intercession for his people.

In handling this, it will be evidently proper, first, to state the doctrine of Christ's intercession; and then, to consider how it tends to demonstrate the extent of his saving power. What little time may remain, when these are despatched, will be employed as usual in a few reflections.

I. I shall endeavour to state the Scripture doctrine of Christ's intercession.

Now the substance of this doctrine appears to me to be this. Christ's intercession for his people, is his pleading for them in heaven,—under the character of their great High Priest;—which he always does virtually, by appearing before God, in that body in which he suffered;—and which he always intends to present before him in this view,—in favour of each of his people:—and this intercession, whether it ever be, or be not, vocal,—is always conducted in a manner becoming the dignity of our exalted Redeemer, and is abundantly effectual for the security, acceptance, and final happiness of all his servants.

Permit me a little more distinctly to open each of these particulars; and the rather as some of them must be acknowledged to have their difficulties; and as it is fit we should settle some rational and digested notions of a doctrine, of such daily use and such great importance.

1. "The word * which is here made use of to express Christ's intercession, does properly signify pleading."

It is evident from the use of it in other Greek writers, and especially those of the New Testament, that it imports "an earnest address to one person on account of another:" and according to the particle with which it is joined, it may express the action of a friend or of an enemy; as a person may in our own language be said to plead for or against another. Thus, on the one hand, Elijah is said to have made intercession to God against Israel; and the Jews to have dealt, or, (as the original word is,) to have interceded, with Festus, that Paul might be put to death. On the other hand, Paul exhorts Timothy, that intercessions be made for all men; and elsewhere speaks of the Spirit's helping our infirmities in prayer, and so in effect making intercession for us, i. e. as he renders our prayers, both as to the matter and manner of them, agreeable to the will of God. In this sense also, in the same chapter, as well as in the text, it is said, that Christ being risen maketh intercession for us, i. e. he pleads our cause with the Father. And St. John likewise encourages us with this thought: If any man sin, (as there is not a just man upon earth who does not,) we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; who is the propitiation for our sins, by that expiatory sacrifice on which he pleads; in sweet harmony with those memorable words of Isaiah, He poured out his soul unto death, and in consequence of that, he made intercession for the transgressors: to which words, it is probable, that Philo may refer, when speaking of the Logos, or Word, he says, among many other surprising things, "He is an intercessor for mortal man with the immortal God."† You see then, that Christ's intercession signifies his pleading the cause of his people with the Father, and therefore must import a part of his work as mediator, and in its fullest extent comprehends his office, both as an advocate in the court, and a priest in the temple. But I add,

2. That in this connexion, "it is evidently spoken of as a branch of his priestly office, typified by the ministration of Aaron and his sons, in the Jewish tabernacle.

This, as I formerly showed you,* the context very plainly proves: under the law there were many priests, &c. but this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood; wherefore he is able also to save, &c. and then it immediately follows, For such an High Priest became us. And a very few verses after, the apostle observes, that the sum of what he had here spoken was this; we have such an High Priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. So that, seeing Christ's intercession in our text is so evidently a sacerdotal or priestly act, we may, no doubt, be assisted in our conceptions of it, by considering that of the Jewish priests, to which it is compared. Now you know, it was their office to present their prayers to God in the name of the people, both in their daily and their yearly ministration. In their daily ministration, they went into the holy place, to burn incense before the Lord on the golden altar; and this incense is often referred to in Scripture, as an emblem of the acceptable prayers of pious worshippers. And it is observable, that at the very time when the priest was thus employed, the people stood praying without; and no doubt, it was a part of his duty to concur in the devotions, which in their name he presented before God. But this intercession was most solemnly made once a year, i. e. on the great day of atonement, when the high priest entered into the most holy place, with the blood of the victims, the incense at the same time fuming, with a grateful odour, before the mercy-seat. This was the grand act of intercession; by attending to which, we may be more particularly informed of the nature of that, which Christ as our High Priest is making in our favour: and we particularly learn,

3. That "the appearance of Christ above, in that body in which he suffered on earth, is virtually a continual intercession with the Father."

We are told, that the high priest carried the blood of the burnt-offering, and of the sin-offering, into the most holy place, and sprinkled it before the Lord there; and by this action he is said to make the atonement, the other sacrificial circumstances being only preparatory to this. And thus our Lord Jesus Christ has taken into heaven the human body, in which he bare our sins on the accursed tree; and appearing thus in the divine presence, he does thereby present his own blood before the mercy seat, as the apostle expresseth it, in a most evident allusion to the preceding passage in the Mosaic institution, Not with the blood of goats and calves, which were the sacrifices appointed on the day of expiation, but by his own blood, he hath entered into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us: and by this one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified; so that nothing further should be requisite, for the complete expiation of their guilt. And it is accordingly declared, that after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, he for ever sat down at the right hand of God.

Now this appearance of Christ in heaven, which is expressed by his standing in the midst of the throne, as a lamb that had been slain, may properly be called a virtual intercession. There is a language in that circumstance, more forcible than in any words we can imagine. This is happily illustrated by the pious Mr. Flavel,† by the story of Amyntas and Eschylus, as Elian relates it. Eschylus was condemned to death by the Athenians, and was just going to be led to execution. His brother Amyntas had signalized himself in the service of his country; and on the day of a most illustrious victory, in a great measure obtained by his means, had lost his hand. He came into the court just as his brother was condemned, and without saying any thing, drew the stump of his arm from under his garment, and held it up in their sight; and the historian tells us, "that when the judges saw this mark of his sufferings, they remembered what he had done, and discharged his brother, though he had forfeited his life."‡ Thus does Christ, our dear elder brother, silently, but powerfully, plead for our forfeited lives: and such is the happy consequence. His Father looks on the marks of his sufferings, and remembers what he has done; and in this sense his blood is continually speaking better things than the blood of Abel. We have an advocate with the Father, who is also the propitiation for our sins.

4. "Our Lord always intends, that his appearance before his Father in heaven should be interpreted as a plea for his people."

He does not only perform an action, which may be so understood, but it is his habitual and constant desire and intention, that it may be considered in that view. He entered into heaven, not merely that he might in his glorious human nature be honoured with exalted dignity, and be delighted with that fulness of joy which is in the presence of God there, but that, as their forerunner, he might prepare a place for them. Still he remembers, that he is made head over all things to his church.

which is his body, and which with constant tenderness he nourisheth and cherisheth. This is the language of his compassionate heart: "Behold me, O my heavenly Father, behold me in a form thus different from that, in which I originally was. Behold me, now dwelling in human flesh; and remember wherefore this flesh was assumed; and remember how it was once treated. When thou saidst, Sacrifice and offering I will not;—I said, Lo, I come; I delighted then to do thy will, and I still delight to recollect that I did it. Thou wast a witness to that awful scene; nor canst thou forget this blood that was once offered to thee on the cross, to assert the honours of thy law, and to appease the terrors of thy wrath. Thou didst once own it, as an offering of a sweet-smelling savour; and wilt thou not still own it? I have performed my part of the covenant; and I cheerfully put in my claim to the performance of thy part, in favour of those for whom I descended and died. Father, I will, that those whom thou hast given me be with me where I am; and that nothing be wanting to begin, to carry on, and to complete, the salvation of every one of them." Thus does our Lord even now own his people in the presence of his Father, and of his holy angels; and in the administration of his mediatorial kingdom, he does all things for the elect's sake, for whom he once endured all.

5. This gracious intention and care of Christ respects, not only his church in general, but "every particular believer, in all the variety of his personal circumstances."

When the Jewish high priest stood before the Lord, he bore on his heart the names of the twelve tribes of Israel: but Christ our great High Priest bears on his heart, not only the names of the various nations, and tribes, and families of his people, but the name of every individual person amongst them, even of all the children of God who are scattered abroad. So that "he is as mindful of me," may every humble believer say, "and each of my concerns, as if I were the only happy creature under his care." Thus, as the good Shepherd, he is said to know all his sheep by their names; and is described, as accommodating himself with proper care to the necessities of each, as seeking that which was lost, and bringing again that which was driven away, and binding up that which was broken, and strengthening that which was sick; as gathering the lambs in his bosom, and gently leading those that are with young. His eye is still upon each of them, and his heart is tenderly affected toward each. And while, as a mediator, he presents the prayers of each unto the Father, he intermingles his own intercession, not only that an answer of peace may be returned to them, but that other necessary blessings may be given in, and that they may be preserved from dangers by them unseen: as in the days of his flesh, he foresaw the trials of Peter and his brethren, and prayed for them that their faith might not fail, when they were under no apprehensions for themselves.

6. "The Scripture does not expressly determine, whether there be, or be not, some verbal address of Christ to the Father, in favour of his people."

Some very eminent divines have indeed positively concluded, that there is none.* But I cannot think that so certain as they have supposed it. It is true we know but very little of the heavenly world, of the methods of converse or worship there. We know not in what accents its blessed inhabitants address their songs of praise to God, or cry to each other, saying, Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty. But this we assuredly know, that our Redeemer is gone into heaven in his human body, though now, in an admirable and inconceivable manner, refined and beautified, invigorated and adorned. And we know, that since his entrance into his glory, he has not only appeared in a visible form to some of his servants on earth, but spoken to them with an audible voice. And must we say, that he still dwells in everlasting silence above; or that, if he speaks, it is only in the language of authority to his celestial subjects? Is it absolutely certain, that his sacred voice is never employed in any of the triumphant songs of heaven? or that it is never addressed to his Father in the language of prayer? On earth, he importunately asked those blessings for his people, which he knew that his father had, by the covenant of redemption, expressly stipulated to bestow: and when he was returning to the regions of glory, he said, I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another comforter. Now can we say, there is any thing in a vocal, more than in a mental, prayer, unworthy the character of the Son of God, and the Lord of all?

We cannot indeed imagine, that our Lord is always thus employed. We know he has other business in the world of glory, with which a continued address to the Father would be inconsistent. But we are confident, that nothing of this kind passed, when he first ascended to the right hand of the Majesty on high? or that such an intercession has never since been repeated? I would stand at the remotest distance from a bold intrusion into these unseen things; but I must presume so far as to say, that I see no absurdity in granting, that some Scripture passages we have just referred to, may be taken in a more literal sense than many have allowed. Nor can I imagine, that the supposed silence of the high priest, when he entered into the most holy place, can have much weight in the present question: for not now to urge, how possible it is, that he might then use some words of prayer, though no form be prescribed for this, or any other peculiar service of the day, it is certain that he was then alone in the divine presence; whereas Jesus, the High Priest of our profession, is surrounded with an innumerable company of angels, and with the spirits of just men made perfect. But after all, I will assert nothing positively here; and to prevent the mistake of what I have already said, I think it proper to add,

7. That in whatever manner this intercession may be carried on, we may depend upon it, that it is "always congruous to that dignity and authority, in which our Lord appears in the world above."

When our Redeemer was on earth in the days of his humiliation, he poured out strong cryings and tears, when addressing his Father; he fell on his knees, and sometimes prostrated himself on his face: but now, sorrow and abasement are no more. He is described, as sitting at the right hand of God; and to raise the idea, is represented by the prophet, as a priest on his throne. And the language of his intercession is princely too; "Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am."

And I must further add, that his addresses to the Father, in favour of his people, are also "perfectly consistent with his administration of the affairs of his mediatorial kingdom." All power is given to him both in heaven and on earth; and God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name, having said unto him, Sit thou at my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool. He is, as it were, the grand almoner of heaven, by whom the divine bounties are dispensed. In his hand are the ways, the hopes, the lives of all; and even the keys of death, and of the unseen world. We are not therefore to think of any intercession inconsistent with this, if we would make our scheme agreeable to Scripture, or Scripture consistent with itself. I add once more,

8. The intercession of our blessed Redeemer "is always effectual, for the vindication, the acceptance, and the final happiness of his people."

He is, as the apostle styles him, God's dear Son. And if on earth he could confidently say, Father, I know that thou hearest me always, we may then well assure ourselves, that he cannot fail of success, when pleading in the court of heaven; especially when asking those things, which he has purchased for his people by his own blood, and which his heavenly Father, by promise, stands engaged to bestow.

By this intercession "the characters of his servants are vindicated." Observe how the apostle triumphs in the patronage of such an advocate, even under the humblest sense of his own imperfections; and while joyfully ready to renounce every appearance of confidence of himself. Who, says he, shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather that is risen again, who also maketh intercession for us. Though Satan stand at our right hand to accuse us, though that malignant spirit aggravate every miscarriage, and detract from every service, and add, as in the case of Job, artifice to rage, and falsehood to malice; Jesus stands at the right hand of God, to vindicate our character from every misrepresentation, and to plead his own righteousness and blood, in answer to those charges which cannot be denied. Again,

The intercession of Christ prevails "for the acceptance of our persons and services." We must indeed humbly own, that we are such sinful creatures, that we pollute whatever we touch; and there is so much sin adhering to the best of our duties, that they need forgiveness rather than merit reward. But the angel before the throne offers the prayers of the saints with much incense, which gives them a grateful savour; and they are made acceptable in the Beloved.

In a word, this intercession is effectual "to procure for us all necessary blessings;" which Christ, in consequence of it, is commissioned to bestow upon us. Thus he now keeps us from falling; and he will ere long present us before the Father with exceeding joy. The prayer he offered on earth, as the model of that which he is presenting above, shall be completely answered with respect to all his people; we shall be one in the Father and in him; and shall all be made perfect in one, being with him where he is. And the eternal happiness of every believer shall show the value the Father sets on the blood of the Son, and on that intercession which is founded in it.

We have thus taken a brief survey of what the Scripture informs us, concerning the intercession of Christ. I am,

II. To consider, how this intercession, which he ever lives to make, "is a proof of our Lord's being able to save to the uttermost."

So you see the apostle affirms; and so it will appear to be, if we consider—the foundation,—the extent,—and the perpetuity of it.

1. The intercession of Christ "being founded on his atonement, is a proof of the efficacy of that," and consequently of his ability to save.

You have seen it expressly asserted in Scripture, that it is by his own blood that he is entered into the most holy place. He pleads with and upon that; urging before the Father, virtually at least, the merit of his sacrifice on the cross, as the great argument to bestow gospel blessings on those for whom he hath thus purchased them. So that you evidently see, that were not the atonement of Christ satisfactory his intercession would be vain. And can you imagine that God would ever have permitted a person to enter heaven, and to take up his stated residence there, under the character of an intercessor, whose plea he had disallowed? It were most absurd to suppose it. The satisfaction of Christ, therefore, appears to be complete, and consequently his person divine, and therefore his saving power almighty, from his ever living to make intercession. And this the apostle seems plainly to intimate in those memorable words: Who being the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power; having, in consequence of these divine perfections, by himself, that is, by the sacrifice of himself, purged or expiated our sins, sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high; which he could never have done under this public character, had his nature been less glorious, and so his atonement less complete.

2. The actual exercise of this intercession, "in such an extent, does further imply divine perfections," and by consequence a fulness of saving power.

I have before observed, that there is the greatest reason to believe, the intercession of Christ is not merely his appearance before God in the body in which he suffered: but that it is attended with a constant and ardent intention, that his death may be effectual to the purposes designed, not only for his people in general, but for each of them in particular: and I endeavoured to show you, that it implied a care correspondent to their various circumstances, that grace might be accommodated to every time of need. Now this plainly implies a knowledge extending itself even to omniscience; a knowledge of the hearts, as well as the conditions, of his people; a knowledge of those unutterable breathings, in which often the most valuable part of prayer consists, and of those secret assaults and strugglings which are often the most painful scenes through which the Christian passes. Yet such a knowledge must the great Intercessor have, not only of one particular person, but of each and of all the children of God that are scattered abroad in the most distant nations of the earth, and all at the same moment of time. Surely we must say, such knowledge is too wonderful for us; it is high, we cannot attain unto it: especially when we consider it as joined with the administration of that universal kingdom over which he is exalted. In this view the humble soul must fall prostrate before him in the lowliest homage, and cry out, "My Lord and my God! Thou art indeed able to save to the uttermost: nothing can exceed the penetration of thy wisdom, or the extent of thy power."

3. "The perpetuity of Christ's intercession is a further argument of his ability always to save."

In this view the apostle introduces the thought: He is able to save to the uttermost,—seeing he ever lives to make intercession. It is an encouragement to our believing application unto him, as the Lord mighty to save, when we consider, that in the prosecution of so amazing an employ, he fainteth not, neither is weary. Had it been the appointment of the Father, that he should have retired from the office of an intercessor, after he had attended to it for some few days or years, we must by faith have looked to a past, as the Old-Testament saints did to a future, transaction: but surely our comfort could not have risen so high, as it now does, when we reflect, "Even at this moment is Christ appearing in heaven for me: he is there as the refuge of his people throughout all generations; and I have all imaginable security of his saving power, because his one offering has so fully completed the work, that he needs not come down to earth again, by dying to renew the sacrifice that he presented here. No; the efficacy of it is everlasting, as his intercession upon it is perpetual." This seems plainly the apostle's meaning, by what he adds just after the text;—Such a High Priest became us,—who needeth not, as those high priests under the law, daily to offer;—having done it once for all, when he offered up himself.

III. It only remains, that I conclude with a few obvious but important reflections.

1. How admirable and how amiable does the blessed Jesus appear, when considered as the great intercessor of his people!

How admirable is he in this view! What an honour is done him in the heavenly world! How dear to the Father does he appear to be, when God will not accept the services of the greatest and best of mankind, unless presented by him; and for his sake will graciously regard the meanest and vilest sinner! And how great does this intercessor appear in himself! "Blessed Jesus," may the Christian say, "who is like unto thee, who canst at once sustain so many different relations, and canst fill them all with their proper offices, of duty to thy Father, and of love to thy people! who canst thus bear, without encumbering thyself, without interfering with each other, the priestly censer and the royal sceptre! How wise are thy counsels! How extensive thy views! How capacious thy thoughts! and yet, at the same time, how compassionate thy gracious heart! That amidst all the exaltations of heaven, all the splendours of thy Father's right hand, thou shouldst still thus graciously remember thine humble followers! That thine eye should be always watchful over them, thine ear be always open to their prayers, thy mouth be ever ready to plead for them, and thine arm to save them! As if it were not love enough to descend and die, unless thou didst for ever live and reign for them, and even glory in being made head over all for thy church."

"But especially," may the Christian say, "when I think of thee, blessed Jesus, not only as the intercessor of thy people in general, but as my intercessor, when I think that thou hast espoused my character and my cause, vile and obnoxious as it is, and that thou art recommending my poor broken services, which I daily blush to present before thee; and art using thine interest and thine authority in the world above, to complete my salvation, which thou hast begun; what shall thy poor servant say unto thee! All these astonishing and kind regards to me, who am unworthy to wash the feet of the least of thy followers! Shall not the wonders of such condescending grace engage my gratitude to all eternity! My praises now are so exceeding feeble, and so low, I am almost ashamed to offer them: O when shall those nobler praises begin, which I hope ere long to offer in that world of perfection to which thy gracious intercession is bringing me!"

2. With what holy joy may the Christian reflect on his interest in such an intercessor!

Methinks we should often be entering into this pleasurable thought. The Lord Jesus is pleading for us above, and he ever lives to make intercession there. We had pious friends, who were once bearing us on their hearts before God in prayer; but they are now sleeping in the dust: our dear religious parents, our holy ministers, our guides and companions in the ways of God! We have no warrant to expect any further assistance from their prayers. In this sense, Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel does not, and cannot, acknowledge us: but Christ is an ever-living intercessor, without whose interposition theirs had been vain, and in comparison with whom we have none on earth or in heaven to desire. Let papists commit themselves to the patronage of angels and saints, and by a voluntary and offensive humility, entreat them to intercede with God, or to intercede with Christ in their favour: as Christ has by one offering perfected for ever them that are sanctified; so by one continual intercession, in which he needs and admits no associate, he for ever secures them.

3. With what holy boldness may the Christian draw near to God, in dependence on such an intercessor!

We have daily important errands to the throne of grace, and perhaps hardly any thing would more promote the success of them, than to lift up a cheerful and believing eye, as expecting to receive something from God's hand. A consciousness of our own numberless imperfections and defects may indeed discourage us, a sense of our guilt might even fright us away; but when we see Jesus standing before the throne, in such a posture, in such a character, surely we may venture near, and when most awed and most dismayed, may encourage ourselves in him. This is an inference which the apostle draws, and which he repeats again and again: Seeing we have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need; for surely, neither mercy to pardon, nor grace to strengthen, will now be withheld. Having therefore boldness (as he elsewhere expresses it) to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by that new and living way which he hath consecrated for us,—let us draw near: and O that we may ever do it with a true heart, since there is so blessed a foundation laid for a full assurance of faith!

4. What reason is there to adore the divine wisdom and goodness, in appointing so excellent a way, at once to promote our humility and our confidence!

You have seen, how justly it may establish our faith, to consider, that though we are unworthy for whom any thing should be done, yet Christ is worthy, and I may add, that in appointing him to be our intercessor, God hath declared his own favourable regard to us, and we may comfortably conclude, that the Father himself loveth us. Yet this love is manifested, as in a very gracious, so also in a very humbling, way. This token of divine displeasure against sin is yet upon us, that we are not allowed to draw near to him in our own name, or to expect the least favour for our own sake, but he still keeps us at a humble distance, nor will he permit us to see his face, unless our elder Brother be with us. And as he treated Eliphaz and his companions, saying, My wrath is kindled against you; take now an ox [illegible], and go to my servant Job, and he shall pray for you, and him will I accept, lest I deal with you after your folly: thus God refuses to look on the best of our offerings, if they do not pass through a [illegible] acceptable hand. How awful a reflection, and how wise a provision, to promote that humility, which so well becomes pardoned rebels, before the long-injured Majesty of heaven! This is, as he expresses it by Ezekiel, That we may remember our ways, and be confounded, and never open our mouths any more, because of our shame, even when he is pacified towards us for all that we have done.

Lastly, How powerful ly should this comfortable doctrine operate on our minds, to promote our love to this great intercessor, and our zeal for his honour and glory!

"Blessed Lord," should each of us say, "dost thou remember such a worthless worm amidst all thine honour and joy above, and shall not I remember thee, the King of glory! Where should my heart be but with thee? On what should I set my affections, but on those things which are above, where thou sittest at the right hand of God? My righteousness and my strength, mine advocate and my guardian! shall I be unmindful of thee? While thou art pleading my cause in heaven, shall I not be joyfully willing to plead thy sacred and honourable cause on earth? Rather, much rather, may I forget the powers of reason, and lose the faculty of speech, than neglect to use them for thee: rather may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, than it should be ashamed, or afraid, to vindicate thy gospel, though I stood alone in a crowd of insulting blaspheming enemies, and though they added cruelty and terror to their impieties. So mayst thou confess me before thy Father and the holy angels, in the last solemn day, as I determine that I will confess thee now, though this crooked and perverse generation should grow still more degenerate than it is."

Christians, if we have not such sentiments and resolutions as these, I fear we have no title to any of the comforts of Christ's intercession, and shall have no share in its invaluable blessings.

SERMON XV.

COMING TO GOD BY CHRIST, THE CHARACTER OF THOSE THAT SHALL BE SAVED

HEB. vii. 25.

Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

WHEN the Psalmist had been celebrating the majesty of God, as the almighty Creator and Possessor of all, he breaks out into this most natural and important inquiry, Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? and who shall stand in his holy place? And methinks, Christians, when we have been hearing of the boundless power of Christ to save, and of the prevalency of that intercession which he ever lives to make, we should immediately cry out, "Who are the happy souls, in whose rescue this almighty arm shall be employed, and whose cause this gracious intercessor will undertake always to plead?" The text answers the question in a very edifying and satisfactory manner, though in few words. They are such as come unto God by him.

You know that from this scripture I have already considered,

I. What we are to understand by Christ's being able to save to the uttermost.

II. What evidences we have, that he is really so.

III. I have considered the particular argument for it, which the apostle here draws, from his ever living to make intercession.

It only remains, that I now open,

IV. The character of the persons who are encouraged to expect a share in this salvation; they are such as come unto God by him.

Now before I proceed to the more particular discussion of these words, you must give me leave to observe, that they seem in their primary and strictest sense to signify "an approach to God in the solemnities of religious worship, in the name of Christ as the great intercessor."

As when the Jewish people were honoured with the abode of the Shechinah, the visible token of the divine presence, they did in their highest religious solemnities approach to that, surrounding with their sacrifices and their prayers the tabernacle or temple where it held its residence; hence it seems to have come to pass, that the phrases of coming to God, coming into his presence, and drawing near to him, were often used to express the acts of divine worship. And as the priests were admitted to come nearer to the ark, on which this visible glory usually rested, than others even of that holy nation, they are with peculiar propriety spoken of, as drawing near to God. We may also add, that forasmuch as once a year the high priest went into the holy of holies, in the name of the whole congregation, with the blood of victims offered to expiate their sins, they might properly, at that solemn season, be said to come unto God by him. And the connexion of these words, as I have largely shown, does most evidently imply an allusion to these Jewish rites, and a regard to Christ as the great high priest of our profession.

But it would be very imprudent, and unsafe, to leave the matter thus generally explained. Salvation is here promised, to all that come unto God by Christ; as it elsewhere is, to all that call on the name of the Lord. Yet most certain it is, from the whole tenor of Scripture, that there are multitudes who call on his name, and transmit their petitions to God in a professed dependence on his mediation and intercession, whose persons and services God will reject with abhorrence, who shall see salvation only from afar, and never be permitted to taste of it. And therefore it is manifest, that, to make the Scripture consistent with itself, these phrases, when connected in such a manner, must be taken in a much larger extent, as comprehending all that, by which the acceptable worshipper, and the true believer, is distinguished from the hypocritical professor, who draws near to God only to dishonour him, and to bring on himself aggravated guilt and condemnation.

And by consequence, coming to God, as the phrase is here used, must signify in the general, "applying ourselves with the greatest seriousness to our important business with him;" as such expressions often signify, when they are put for the whole of religion: and coming through Christ must imply, "such humble and faithful regards to him as the great mediator, such a cordial acceptance of him, such a cheerful dependence upon him," as is so often in the New Testament expressed by that faith in him, to which the promises of eternal salvation are made, and to which they are limited.

But since it is a matter of so great moment, and a matter in which it is to be feared so many are deceiving their own souls, give me leave to descend into some particulars of explication. And let me entreat your diligent attention, and beseech you, as you dread the ruin of the hypocrites in Sion, that you enter seriously into your own hearts, and judge yourselves, as persons that expect shortly to be judged of the Lord. O that, through the sanctifying, the quickening, and the witnessing influences of the Holy Spirit, we might see the characters which are now to be drawn, more and more evidently agreeing to ourselves.

The believer you see is here described,—as coming to God,—and as coming to him through Christ.

I. The believer is described, "as one that comes to God."

This evidently implies,—a firm persuasion of his being and attributes,—a deep conviction that it is our highest interest to secure his favour,—a readiness to renounce whatever can come in competition with it,—a cheerful and resolute subjection to his service,—and a care to keep up a continual correspondence with him, and to live as in a state of nearness to him.

1. Coming to God evidently implies, "a firm belief of his being and perfections."

This the apostle asserts in express words, which carry their own evidence along with them: He that cometh unto God, must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him. And indeed the latter is as necessary as the former; for merely to believe a first cause of almighty power and consummate skill, as some pretend to do, without any sense of his providence, government, and goodness, is, with regard to all the purposes of practical religion, as vain and as pernicious as atheism itself.

But you will remember, that a good man does not rest in such a cold assent to the truth of these doctrines, like that he gives to propositions which he studies only for amusement. No, but they descend into the mind with a due energy, and he realizeth them to himself with the utmost seriousness. "O my soul," does he often say, "it is not a precarious conclusion, or a mere probable hypothesis, that there is a God, and such a God as I profess to believe, but it is a most certain and evident truth. I do not more clearly see the meridian sun by his own rays, nor more surely know, that I myself think and exist, than I see God by his works, and know him as the original author of my being, and of these thinking powers which are now inquiring after him. There is, there is an eternal and immutable Jehovah. He reigns on an exalted throne above, and the highest potentate of that shining world is infinitely more inferior to him, than superior to the meanest insect on earth. God is there, and he is here; he surrounds all his creatures with his immensity, and preserves them all by his influence. In him I live, and move, and have my being; on him angels and worms are equally dependent; nor is there a motion in the material, or a thought in the intellectual, world, to which he is not most intimately conscious. Behold him, O my soul, with reverence and love; for he is a most awful Being, in whom unsearchable wisdom, and almighty power, are joined with unerring justice, unspotted holiness, and invariable truth; but remember, he is also the most amiable. There is a beauty in all these perfections; and it is softened and sweetened by the overflowings of goodness and mercy; those rich and gentle streams, which not only water paradise, but visit these regions of guilt and darkness."

Such views as these are familiar to the mind of the believer: and this firm and affectionate persuasion of the being and attributes of God, is the foundation both of natural and revealed religion; and the root from whence all the branches of moral virtue, and evangelical faith and holiness, must spring.

2. Coming to God must also imply, "an earnest desire of a share in the divine favour, as our highest interest and happiness."

And methinks this is a necessary consequence of the former. We are indeed too apt to lift up our soul unto vanity, and to grow fond of these empty shadows: but it is because God is forgotten; as we admire the stars, because the sun is absent. But surely, when the mind is thus possessed with a sense of God, it will feel a kind of indignation, that any other object should have ever been compared with him, though it were only to be postponed, as inconceivably less valuable. Much more will it be displeased and ashamed to think, that it has ever preferred these to God. "Alas," will such a soul say, "whither have I wandered? Into what wilderness am I come? I look round about me on the creatures, and I see no shelter nor refreshment. They are like broken cisterns, or deceitful brooks, whose waters fail me when I need them most. What then, O Lord, do I wait for? my hope is in thee, for thou art the fountain of living waters, all-sufficient for my happiness, and only sufficient for it. If I were a poor abandoned outcast, if I had not a friend or helper on earth, if I knew not where I should look for my next lodging, or my next meal: if at the same time my body were worn out with pining illness, and every member of it the seat of pain; yet if I could but look up, and see thy face through this cloud, if I could but call thee my Father and my God, I were happy still: and might pity the most prosperous monarch on earth, that was a stranger to thee, and thy love. There are many that say, Who will show us any good? O that thy Spirit may teach them truer wisdom! But as for me, I will still say, Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee." In consequence of this,

3. Coming to God implies, "a readiness to forsake every thing which can stand in opposition to him."

My brethren, what I have been describing is, in a good man, not merely a conviction of the understanding, but a sentiment of the heart. He would abhor the hypocrisy, the impiety, and the folly of owning the incomparable excellence of the divine Being, and yet practically choosing something else before him. "Lord," does he sometimes say, "I have often done it; and for ever blessed be thy name, that thou didst not finally choose those my delusions. It grieves me to think, how I injured thee, and dishonoured and wronged my own soul, when other lords had dominion over me: and they would detain me in their ignoble servitude; but in answer to all their unreasonable claims, I make mention of thy name. Thou requirest that I should give thee my very heart, and should be ready to leave all and follow thee. Lord, I would cheerfully consent; and hope that through grace I can say, None of these things move me; neither should I, in such a cause, count my life dear unto me."

4. Coming to God does further import, "a willing subjection to his service."

"Lord," does the Christian say, "I would come to thee, not to sit down under thy shadow indolent and unactive. My faculties were made for employment; and it is my joy to think, that they shall be employed for thee. I love thee with all my heart, and with all my soul; and therefore, by the aids of thy grace, I will serve thee with all my might, and with all my strength. I would gladly yield myself to thee, as alive from the dead, and use my members as instruments of righteousness. Thy promises are my delight, as I trust they are my portion; but, Lord, they are not the only part of thy word that I love; for I delight myself in thy statutes, and love thy commandments above gold, yea, above fine gold. I account thy service mine honour and my happiness; I desire always to keep the eye of my soul directed towards thee, to wait the inimations of thy gracious pleasure; and if I am distinguished from others by any advantages of nature, or of circumstances, I would chiefly rejoice in them, as they are capable of being improved for thee."

5. Coming unto God does also imply, "the keeping up a constant correspondence with him."

I before observed, that this phrase, in the present connexion, seems particularly to refer to our approaching him in the solemnities of religious worship: and when it is spoken of as a part of the Christian's character, it plainly intimates a frequent and constant care in these duties. Thus good men under the old law are described, as a generation of them that seek God. "Lord," does every child of God often think and say, "it is indeed good for me to draw near unto thee. What is my great final hope, but to dwell in a state of everlasting nearness? In the mean time, the nearer I am to thee, the more of heaven is brought down to earth; the more I enjoy of thee, the more do I enjoy myself, and relish my being. I make my visits to thy throne, not merely to pay a homage which thou requirest, but to seek an entertainment which I prefer to any other. Far from looking upon it as a disagreeable condition, with which my expectations from thee are clogged, I count the opportunities of such converse, and my inclinations towards it, in the number of my greatest obligations to thy goodness." Should God say to the Christian, "I will for the future dispense with thine attendance; thou shalt retain thine interest in me, though thou shouldst call upon me no more; and shalt meet me as thy friend at death, though thou forgettest me in life;" the good man would not be able to bear such a dismission. He would rather say, "Lord, if I were to live only on these terms, it were much better for me to die. I should, with Moses, in another case, pray thee to kill me out of hand, rather than leave me here under such a burthen as life would seem, if it might not be sweetened by communion with thee, in the closet, in the family, and in public ordinances."

These, my brethren, are important parts of the Christian's character, yet they are far from being the whole of it. With this temper he comes to God; but how should he be encouraged to such an approach, if the great Redeemer were forgot? We add, therefore,

II. That all to whom salvation is promised in the gospel, "make their approach to God through Christ," or, as the text expresses it, they come unto God by him.

You will no doubt be willing that I should open this important article pretty largely; and I shall do it under the following particulars. Coming to God by Christ implies,—a deep sense of our need of a Mediator, in order to our comfortable intercourse with God:—a persuasion of the power of Christ,— and a confidence in his grace;—a cordial approbation of the method in which he bestows salvation;—and a constant care to maintain proper regards to Christ, in the whole course of our walking with God. This is that evangelical faith, to which the promises of gospel salvation are appropriated, by the text before us, and the whole tenor of Scripture.

1. Coming to God by Christ implies, "a deep sense of our need of a mediator, in order to a comfortable intercourse with God."

Christianity is the religion of sinners; and it will never be really welcome to a soul that is not sensible of the evil and malignity of sin. The natural pride of our hearts would first lead us to forget God, and not to seek after him at all; but if conscience be in any measure awakened to see (what it is strange every rational creature should not always see) our dependence on him, and our need of an interest in his favour, pride finds a second refuge, in a fond conceit of bringing something of our own to recommend us to it. And if at length men are sensible they have nothing of this kind which they can call their own, they are ready to think of casting themselves immediately on the mercies of an offended God, rather than of multiplying their obligations and their dependence, by coming to him through a mediator. If we must own ourselves sinners, we are prone to extenuate our guilt; and if we cannot look upon it as an indifferent, would at least represent it as an excusable, thing, which is worthy of compassion, rather than of indignation. How difficult is it to view it in a true light! to see what insolence and baseness it carries in it, and what danger and ruin it exposes us to! But divine grace makes way for the gospel into our hearts, by displaying the justice and the holiness of God, as equally essential to his nature with his wisdom and goodness: and then, when we consider ourselves as appearing in his presence, convicted of ten thousand aggravated offences, we cry out from a deep and inward sense, "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God! Surely I need some perfectly righteous Mediator, high in his favour, to introduce me to him, and to render my access safe and comfortable, by appearing as a days-man betwixt us, to lay his hand upon us both."

2. Coming to God by Christ further implies, "a full persuasion of his saving power."

We have been endeavouring to prove it at large; and the conviction of it enters deep into the believing soul. He assents to this most concerning truth with full satisfaction, though there be something in the foundation of it which feeble reason cannot fully comprehend. Important as he sees his everlasting concerns to be, he can courageously venture them here; he can cry out, "Lord, I believe," though a mixture of unbelief may cost him many a tear. "Lord," does he often say, "I am sure, that if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. Though Jew and Gentile may reject thee, I humbly own thee, as the head-stone of the corner. O that I were but as sure of an interest in thee, as I might be of finding my security and my happiness in it."

3. It further implies, "a cheerful confidence in the grace of Christ," as well as a persuasion of his saving power.

Without this he would appear the object of terror, rather than of hope; or in the mildest view, but as a spring shut up, and a fountain sealed, to a traveller languishing and dying with thirst. But faith teaches the Christian firmly to rely on that kind and gracious invitation, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. "Yes," says the believer, "it is indeed so. The compassions of his heart are proportionable to the power of his hand; and I will cast my soul upon them. Blessed Jesus, I would throw myself at thy feet, though it were a supposable case, that I might perish there, and but an uncertain peradventure, that thou mightest pity and save me; for if thou shouldst not, I could but die; and I had rather die a humble penitent, than an obstinate rebel: but forgive that unworthy thought,—that thou shouldst leave a humble penitent to die before thee! Neither thy grace, nor thy truth, will permit it. Him that cometh to thee, thou wilt in no wise cast out: and though I am a poor, weak, worthless creature, thou earnest not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance; and thou callest them in so compassionate a manner, as to engage that thou wilt not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax. Let Christ be true, whoever is a liar." Thus do his doubts gradually disperse; thus does he rise to a joy and peace in believing. But it is always to be remembered,

4. That coming to God by Christ includes, "a cordial approbation and acceptance of the methods of his saving grace."

This is of the highest importance, if we would not deceive ourselves to our eternal ruin. Men may dress up an idol in their own minds, and call it by the name of Christ; and they may be as fond of it as pagans are of the works of their own hands: but can this save them, if it be found that the true Christ, as exhibited in the gospel, has been overlooked and rejected by them? A true believer impartially inquires after the way in which salvation is proposed in the word of God; and when he has discovered it, he entirely approves it, as a faithful saying, worthy of God to appoint, and most fit for him to accept. More particularly he views it, and acquiesces in it, as the way of faith, and the way of holiness. Each of these views of it will deserve our further attention.

The good man heartily desires to receive the gospel salvation, "in the way of faith, or humble believing."

It is thus the word of God always exhibits it: the just shall live by faith; nor shall any flesh glory in his presence. And so entirely is every high thought reduced to the obedience of this blessed principle, in the heart of him that comes to God by Christ, that he is willing to do, what to so corrupt a nature as ours seems most expensive, to buy wine and milk without money and without price; willing to part with the very dearest of his idols, to renounce all dependence on himself, as to what is past, or what is yet to come; to trust no more in his own righteousness, or his own strength; and to say with the most joyful consent of soul, In the Lord have I both righteousness and strength. "Blessed Jesus, it is hard to my proud heart to say it; but it is therefore so much the more reasonable and necessary: for this cursed dependence on self has spoiled the best of my duties, and would betray me to guilt and ruin in many future instances, shouldst thou forsake me. How imperfect and sinful are my best days, and my holiest hours! how feeble and ineffectual my most vigorous and solemn resolutions, against so much inward corruption, and so many outward enemies and temptations! Lord, I am distressed, but I hope thou hast undertaken for me. I hope I may look on thee as my great surety and covenant-head, who didst, before the foundation of the world, engage to satisfy for my breaches of thy Father's law, to work out for me a perfect righteousness, and by thy always victorious power and grace, to conduct me to glory, in the midst of all opposition. Eternal life is the gift of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord; from his hand would I most thankfully receive this crown, and at his feet would I humbly lay it!" On the other hand,

It is to be remembered, That as Christ saves his people "in the way of holiness," the true believer most cordially falls in with this part of the scheme.

Indeed he could not otherwise be a believer in the gospel sense of the word; for saving faith is a principle of holy obedience; and a faith without works is expressly declared to be dead, as the body is dead when without the spirit. The Christian well knows, that it was the great design of his Lord's appearance and sufferings in the flesh, that he might bring us to God, that he might save his people from their sins, and purify them to himself, as a peculiar people, zealous of good works. And how reasonable is this part of the scheme! "Could I," says he, "have desired, that it should have been otherwise? that the Holy Jesus should have been the minister of sin? that he, whose great business it was to honour the law of God, should have dissolved our obligations to it, and have given a license to his followers to continue the servants of corruption, even while they call him their Lord? or could I ask it, or even so much as wish it, that he should distinguish me from others, by a dispensation of that kind? Unreasonable and detestable thought! Lord, I desire not, I understand not, a salvation, of which holiness shall not be an essential part. And though I well know, that many precepts of thy gospel are sublime, and difficult; and that they may be justly represented, by cutting off a right hand, and plucking out a right eye; yet through thy grace I can say, I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right, and hate every false way. Blessed Jesus, thou art most welcome to my soul, as made of God unto me, sanctification, as well as righteousness and redemption. Give me thy Spirit to lead me, and I will follow with pleasure; draw me, and I will run after thee in the way which thou thyself hast traced; for thou who knowest all things, knowest that it is the desire of my soul, to be conformed to thee in holiness now, as well as in glory hereafter." I shall only add,

5. Coming to God by Christ does further express "a continual care to maintain proper regards to him, in the whole course of our walking with God."

He is not considered only as a Mediator to introduce us at first into the divine presence, and so to settle a correspondence, to be carried on afterwards without any further use of him; but as that blessed and important person, through whom we have continually access by one Spirit unto the Father. "Lord," does the Christian often say, not merely as a language learned from others, but as expressive of what he feels in his own soul, "thou art indeed my life. How should the branches grow, but by sap derived from the root? How should the members act, but by influences communicated from the head? Teach me by thy grace to say with thine holy apostle, I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. And may I ever be found in the number of those, who, regarding thee as the living stone, are by a union with thee, as lively stones, builded up together for a habitation of God through the Spirit! Thus let me pass through the wilderness of life, leaning on thee as the beloved of my soul; and when I have finished my pilgrimage, may I lay down my weary head in thy gentle, faithful bosom, dying, as I have lived, in the exercise of faith, and commending my spirit into thy hands!"—This is the character of those, who come unto God by Christ; and in these respects may they say, with the beloved disciple, "Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ."

I shall not enter on a laboured argument to prove, that these particulars are comprehended in the words which the text uses, to describe those who are interested in the gospel salvation. It is a formality which may well be spared, to those who consider the natural import of the phrase, and the general tenor of the word of God; and the scriptures which I have introduced under each head, will easily furnish out matter of proof, to those who are capable of judging of a more abstruse kind of argument than I here think it proper to enter upon.

I should rather choose to dilate on the practical improvements, which might naturally arise from this branch of my discourse; and address myself to you in such exhortations as these:—Let us adore the divine goodness, that such a salvation is offered to us, in so reasonable, so easy, and so gracious a way:—Let us examine by the hints which have now been proposed, whether we are in the number of those who are interested in it:—Let those who are convinced that they are not, be persuaded to reflect on their present circumstances: Let those who are alarmed with a sense of their present danger, be persuaded, in the strength of divine grace, to come unto God through Christ:—Let those who are sincerely desirous to do it, be encouraged to pursue so wise and necessary a purpose:—And let those who have been enabled to comply with the exhortation, be excited to peculiar thankfulness, and established in a cheerful hope of that salvation, which they are taught to expect. But that I may not be under a necessity of despatching these important heads in a few hasty words, or of swelling this discourse to an immoderate bulk, I choose to refer them to another opportunity, when I shall conclude what I have to offer from the text; nor would it have employed us so long, had it not contained a variety of very weighty and instructive matter. In the mean time, may the hints I have now been giving you, be so recollected and considered, as to prepare your hearts for what is further to be spoken!

SERMON XVI.

AN EXHORTATION TO SINNERS TO COME UNTO GOD BY CHRIST.

HEB. vii. 25.

Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

At length, my friends, I am entering on the last discourse which I intend from these words. Our meditations upon them had been drawn to a close much sooner, had not many funeral discourses interrupted them; and you know, there were also others of that kind, which did not interrupt them, being preached on week days. But it is surely most fit, that those awful providences, which for awhile diverted our thoughts from this subject, should now awaken our more diligent and lively attention to it. It is not for mortal creatures to trifle with these important truths of Christianity, on which the life of their souls does so evidently depend: no, nor to rest in speculative views of them, while heart application is neglected. The dying, and the dead, look upon these things in another manner; and we shall shortly be numbered amongst them. The Lord awaken us now so to hear the conclusion of the whole matter, as we shall then wish we had heard it! I have already endeavoured,

I. To show you what we are to understand by Christ's being able to save to the uttermost.

II. To prove that he is so.

III. To open the doctrine of his intercession, and to consider what an argument it is of his saving power. And then,

IV. I have considered the character of those who shall be interested in this salvation, as described in the text by their coming to God by him.

Under each of the three former heads I have given you several reflections; and I am now to conclude with others, which more immediately arise from the fourth, especially when taken in connexion with the foregoing. May each of you know your own concern in them; and may the blessed Spirit of God apply them to your souls with divine efficacy and success! Suffer, I beseech you, this word of exhortation to address you in these six particulars.

1. "Let us adore the divine goodness, that such a salvation is offered us, in so reasonable, so easy, and so gracious a way."

Such a salvation in any method might have been joyfully welcome to us; and how much more in this! Let us call in our roving thoughts, and settle them for a while in this one point. Let us stand still, and see the salvation of God. Surely, when we consider our natural condition, in the view in which the gospel represents it; when we hear the law of God thundering out its curses against us; when we see his justice lifting up its sword to smite us, hell gaping to devour us, and its malicious fiends eying us as their sure prey, and impatient to begin our torment; in such a view, it must have appeared a great favour, had God heard the cry of our anguish and despair so far as to permit the rocks to fall upon us, and the mountains to cover us, though they had crushed us into atoms, and he had, at the same time, extinguished the thinking part of our nature, and reduced it to its original nothing. O how gladly would millions that were once the rich, the great, the learned, the victorious of the earth, meet such a fate as this; and perhaps be more thankful for the destruction of their beings than they ever were for any of its enjoyments! But we hear of being saved,—of being saved to the uttermost;—hear of it, not merely as a favour conferred on others, but as an offer proposed to us; as a scheme not merely deliberated upon, or intended, but in a great measure already effected; and our eyes are directed to the regions of complete and eternal glory, as an abode purchased and prepared for such worthless and guilty creatures as we. "Blessed God, did our appointed way to it lie, not only through a wilderness of thorns, but through a sea of fire, how gladly might we accept the proposals! If the scheme had been to raise us to this heavenly paradise after the severest course of penance on earth, or even after we had tasted of the cup of thy wrath in hell, and suffered all but the despair of those doleful regions, for a long succession of years, or of ages; surely we must then have received the news of such a distant deliverance on our knees, and have mingled thy praises with those groans and tears which such intermediate discipline had extorted from us. And dost thou now offer us a complete pardon, in so easy a way, as only to say, Wash and be clean, as only to call us to come unto thee by Christ?"—Surely, Christians, instead of complaining of this as a hardship, we have reason to own it as a great additional favour. Whither indeed should we go but unto God? and where should we dwell safe and happy, but under the shadow of his wings? and how could we have presumed, or indeed how could we have borne, to have come to him otherwise than by Christ?—It is true indeed, that if we would enter into a treaty with this Prince of Peace, we must give up our sins: but what are these, but the tyrants of the mind, whose reign is our servitude, whose death is our deliverance?—And what though we must give up our own righteousness too? as to any dependence upon it for our justification before God, is there a soul among us that would dare to stand or fall according to the perfection of that? And is there an experienced Christian, that does not know there is a secret unutterable pleasure in submitting to the righteousness of God; and a wise and rational transport of soul, in receiving the rich grace given us in Christ, to make us complete in him; far beyond the vain joy of that distempered dream, which represented us to our own imagination as rich and honourable, righteous and happy, in the midst of poverty and shame, guilt and misery? Surely, if we should hold our peace, when such a salvation is proposed to us in such a method as this, it might almost be expected that the very stones would cry out, to upbraid our ingratitude.

2. "Let us seriously examine, whether we have come to God by Christ, and so are interested in this great salvation."

To each of you, my friends, that hear me this day, is the word of this salvation sent; and that you have received the offers of it, will, on the whole, be matter of everlasting joy, or of everlasting sorrow. The word of God assures us, that there are comparatively few that receive saving benefit by it; "many are called, but few are chosen." And does it not alarm you? Methinks, if there were only a few out of considerable numbers, that missed it, each of us should be ready to tremble for himself: if we knew, that but one soul in all this assembly should finally lose it, we might each of us cry out with great solicitude of spirit, if in any degree unassured with regard to ourselves, Lord, is it I? And how much more now? Are there any of you that must say, "I do not certainly know whether this salvation will be mine or not?" How can you bear the uncertainty? Let me charge it on your consciences that you enter into the inquiry. Have you come unto God by Christ? I ask not so much, whether you believe the existence of God, and the truth of Christianity? This is a faith which you may carry down with you to the habitation of devils, who themselves also believe and tremble.—I ask not so much, whether you have ever felt some desires after an interest in God through Christ? In this respect, as well as in others, there is a desire of the slothful that kills him, while it serves only to increase his present disquietude, and his after-punishment.—But I ask, What is on the whole your choice? What are your cares, your hopes, and your joys? do they centre in God? do they arise from communion with him through Christ? Do you experimentally know what it is to come to his throne, to submit your revolted souls to his government with delight? to wait the signal of his will, as the rule of your actions? to enjoy, or at least earnestly desire, the visits of his grace, the effusions of his love on your hearts? Is prayer your pleasure, or is it your burthen? Do you regard the word of God as an invaluable treasury, or is it to you as a sealed book? You have a thousand traces of the sublimest devotion and piety there; can you relish them? can you find any considerable resemblance between yourselves and those holy souls, whose characters are there recorded and approved? You call yourselves Christians; but do you know Christ, and do you love him, and do you cordially approve of the methods of his saving grace? Do you know what it is to come and lay down your guilty souls, as under the effusions of his blood? to strip yourselves of all the pride of nature, that your nakedness may be clothed with his glorious righteousness? to bow to his sceptre as his obedient subjects, and rejoice that you have such a governor? And do you feel the necessity of a daily application to him, as your great covenant-head, on whose influence you live, and by whose Spirit you must perpetually be actuated, to the purposes of a divine life?—These, these are the decisive questions, and let me entreat you to hear what conscience has to reply to them.

And permit me once more to ask you, If you are yet uncertain as to this important article, how it is that this uncertainty sits upon your mind? Are you easy under it? Do you carelessly defer the inquiry from one day to another, or purposely decline it, because you are afraid of some consequences which may disturb you? or do you renew your examinations again and again, searching for those scriptures, and waiting for those parts of our public discourses, which may pierce deepest, and try your souls to the utmost; still, above all, begging that God would search them; and renewing your humble entreaties, that you may know the very worst of your state, and be at length brought unto him through Christ, though it were by the most painful way that any of his servants have ever trod?

As to some of you, perhaps, the case may require further discussion; but I believe there are others, to whom it would be no long labour. I fear, even while I am yet speaking, conscience must witness against some of you, that you are utter strangers to such a temper, and that you never came unto God by Christ. And therefore,

3. "Let those who are conscious to themselves, that they have never come unto God by Christ, be engaged seriously to reflect on the danger of their present condition."

I know the corruption of our hearts strongly inclines us to think as favourably as possible of ourselves, and eagerly to grasp the feeblest reed, which may give some present, though most precarious, support to our hope: and I know, Satan would favour the delusion to the utmost, because he is aware, there is but a short time in which he need labour to do it; so that if he can amuse you a few days, you are his prey for ever. It is our business, as ministers of the gospel, to counterwork these deceivers. O that God would teach us to do it effectually! Sinner, thou art convinced in thy conscience, that thou art a stranger to the temper and character described; that thou art the man, who hast sat, perhaps many years, under the sound of the gospel, and to this very day hast never come unto God by Christ. And dost thou hope for salvation by him, while this is the case? It is a most arrogant and pernicious hope. I solemnly declare unto thee this day, thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter. Dost thou hope? On what foundation is it? Show me one promise in the whole book of God, that speaks pardon and peace to an impenitent unbelieving sinner. Wilt thou say, Christ is able to save to the uttermost? He is indeed so; and yet it is no contradiction to declare, that as things now stand, he cannot save thee: for he cannot deny himself; he cannot overthrow the whole tenor of his gospel, and make himself the minister of sin. You know he has expressly said, If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins; nay, He that believeth not, shall be damned. You know, he has foretold, that he will another day publicly say, As for those mine enemies, who would not that I should reign over them, bring them hither, and slay them before me: and that so much more dreadful condemnation awaits them, than fell on the transgressors of Moses's law, though they died without mercy, that it shall be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for such. And will your hopes still stand, while all this dreadful artillery is planted directly against them? shall the earth be forsaken for thee, and the rock be removed out of its place? Rocks should much sooner be removed, and all the earth left desolate, than the whole constitution of the gospel shall be overthrown, lest thou shouldst perish. You would not take poison, in hopes that God would work a miracle to preserve your life. Yet you might more reasonably expect this than the other; because it would not so directly contradict any of the perfections of God, or any of his declarations. The matter is brought to a very short issue; and it requires no penetration, or labour of thought, to see it. If the gospel be not true, there is no foundation for expecting this salvation at all; but if it be, you are cut off from any hope of it, while you continue thus; and you are, even whilst I speak, on the very borders of hell.

And now, disarmed as you are of all these unavailing hopes, sit down and enter deeply into your present circumstances. "The Son of God became incarnate, and lived and died to procure salvation for such guilty worms as I: and I have heard of this salvation; but I have no share in it. To this very hour, the wrath of God abideth on me. A storm of vengeance is rising around me, and I am excluded from the only ark in which I could be safe. Excluded by what? Why, to make it so much the more grievous, by my own folly." If we were to take upon us absolutely to pronounce concerning any of you, that you were excluded from the offers of gospel grace, you would no doubt resent it highly; as you reasonably might. Much more, were it in the power of a fellow-mortal to deprive you of all share in this great salvation, might you cry out of it as a most hellish cruelty. You would not for the world do this wrong to another, if it were in your power. What! murder an immortal soul? you would tremble at the thought. But you tremble not at the thing. It is what you are doing, while you are rejecting the gospel. And will you never have compassion on your own poor bleeding souls, until the last incurable wound is given? Yet a little, a very little, while, O sinners, and you will lift up your despairing eyes in the midst of your torments, and behold this salvation from afar. And alas, in how different a view will it then appear, even to the most indolent and most presumptuous of you all! and how will it rend your very souls to think, "it was offered to me, and I would not accept it!" And what a doleful echo will there be amongst you, when you, and ten thousand more miserable creatures, are crying out, "There was an almighty Saviour provided for sinners, and yet we are lost for ever; and are sunk so much lower than others, because we heard of him, and despised him!"

4. "Let such sinners as are awakened to a sense of their danger be invited and persuaded, in the strength of divine grace, to come unto God by Christ."

All the awful and terrifying things we say are dictated by the sincerest and tenderest love to your souls; and nothing can be further from our intention, than to come to torment you before the time. Did we know that your day of grace was past, we would spare these unwelcome pains; and would rather permit you to sleep on and take your rest. But these are moments of hope, sinners, though you make them moments of extreme danger: and though there be no hope for you while you continue to reject Christ, yet if you accept him, you have nothing to fear; but this very day, if you this day entertain him, shall salvation come to your house. Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation; and after so long a time, it is yet called to-day. Once more, and as to some of you it may be for the last time, is the proclamation again made amongst you, Christ is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him; and those that come he will in no wise cast out. And do you not hear the proclamation with pleasure? and will you not obey it as worthy of all acceptation?

What if the scene were changed, and the proposals were addressed to those wretched creatures who are now in hell? What if God should send an ambassador to them, and give him authority to address them to some such purpose as this? "Despairing creatures, I am now come amongst you, not as a messenger of vengeance, but of peace. God has at length looked on your miseries with a compassionate eye; and there is a ray of mercy darting through this gloom from the throne of grace and from the Sun of righteousness. The proposals you so long heard with indifference, and which you have so much longer remembered in the bitterness of your souls, are once more renewed. If you cry unto him, even out of these depths, he will hear you; if you will submit your souls to his government and his grace, he will save you: and I am commissioned in his name to assure you, that not only shall these gates of hell be thrown open for your release, but those of heaven shall be opened likewise, for your admittance."

Sinners, let your own consciences say how you imagine at least, that such a proposal would be received by condemned spirits. Do you not think that (as one forcibly expresses it) they would even leap in their chains? Do you not think the marks of horror and despair would immediately vanish from their faces, that their eyes would sparkle with hope and joy, and that they would begin the work of praise even with their flaming tongues? But are not you yourselves in the same condemnation, though the sentence be not yet executed? Why then do you now despise those rivers of mercy, the smallest drop of which you will hereafter desire in vain?

Alas, what we have here described is merely an imaginary scene. Millions of ages shall roll away in a sad succession, and no such proposals be made to the inhabitants of hell; nor to you, sinners, if you come into that place of torment. But they are now made in good earnest; and, therefore, To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. Oh, force us not another day, for the deliverance of our own souls, to bear a dreadful testimony to the condemnation of yours; but hearken to these embassies of peace, and let us entreat and persuade you to be reconciled. This is still the message, the invitation, the charge, even the same that you heard from the beginning; Come unto God by Christ. Behold a gracious God stretching out his arms to receive you; behold a compassionate Redeemer yet waiting to introduce you to his favourable presence; and all the faithful subjects of his kingdom, here and above, are longing to see it erected in your souls. The thought even of our own salvation would be still sweeter to us, if we had a probable hope of sharing it with you. And shall earth and heaven expect and desire it in vain? And will you, as it were, grieve both; that hell may rejoice in your ruin, and that devils may insult over you, and upbraid you, as having with your own hands thrust away that salvation, of which all their malice and rage might in vain have attempted to deprive you? You will then, alas, find no place for repentance, though, like Esau, you seek it carefully with tears.

Alas, my friends, what more shall I say? Could I find out any more weighty arguments, any more plain, serious, and affecting forms of address, I would go on, though the discourse should swell beyond its due bounds; though my own strength were impaired by the earnestness of it; and though a vain, wretched, unbelieving world should deride that earnestness as enthusiasm and madness. Nay, who that knows the importance of immortal souls, would not go on to plead in such a cause, though minutes and hours were to be struck off from his life for every word that he utters in it, could even such an expensive service be secure of success? But that depends upon God, and to him we would look for it. In the mean time, I dismiss you with this one word: Whether you will hear, or whether you will forbear, he in whose name I speak is witness, that the embassy is delivered; and such words as these will remain recorded in the book of his remembrance, and will sooner or later be brought to yours.

5. "Let such as are desirous of coming to God by Christ, take encouragement from the declaration in the text."

We are not altogether ignorant of the devices of Satan; we know, by frequent observation and experience, how soon he can turn the syren's song into the roaring of a lion; what efforts he makes, to drive the awakened soul into the agonies of despair, and to persuade him that he has thrown himself beyond the reach of mercy. But, if he be practising such cruel artifices on any soul in this assembly, I do, in the name of our Lord and Master, charge the lie on the father of falsehoods. You have perhaps a great many things to plead against yourselves; such as, the number, the enormity, and aggravation of your sins: you will say, they have been committed against the clearest light, against the tenderest love, against repeated admonitions, most serious resolutions, most solemn covenant engagements: but all these pleas, and a thousand more, are answered in this one word, He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him. Is it still matter of doubt? Turn aside then, and more attentively view the trophies of his grace and power, erected in his word, erected on purpose for our encouragement, on whom the ends of the world are come.

Behold Paul in his unconverted state, a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious. He appears to have divested himself, not only of that gentleness of manners, which might reasonably have been expected from a man of so liberal an education, but even of the sentiments of common humanity; furiously breathing out threatening and slaughter against the saints, without the least regard to innocence of life, or to tenderness of age or sex. Yet at the appearance of an Almighty Saviour, this furious barbarian was melted and subdued: in the full career of his blind and cruel rage, he falls down at the feet of that Jesus whom he persecuted, and cries out the very next moment, with the lowliest submission, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? By the power of Christ, the fiend was transformed into an angel; he preached the faith, which just before he endeavoured to destroy; and quickly learnt such language as this: Neither bonds nor imprisonments move me, nor do I count my life dear unto me, so that I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.

The Corinthians were debauched and abandoned to a proverb, the scandal of their country, and the reproach of their nature. For when the apostle had been reckoning up a catalogue of the most infamous sinners; such as fornicators, and idolaters, and adulterers, and effeminate, and abusers of themselves with mankind, and thieves, and covetous, and drunkards, and revilers, and extortioners; he adds, surprising words! (and oh what surprising grace do they imply!) "such were some of you;" such, that one would almost have expected, that lightning from heaven should have blasted them, or that the earth should have opened them a passage into hell: but instead of this, says the apostle to these very men, ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified, in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. The blessed Jesus did not upbraid them with their former crimes, but poured forth his Spirit upon them in so abundant a degree, that their faith was every where celebrated, and they came behind in no gift.

If we can yet imagine any crime more notorious than some of those which are charged on the Corinthian converts in their natural state, it must surely be that which the sun could not behold without horror, nor the earth sustain without trembling; the murder of our Lord Jesus Christ, that innocent, that holy, that divine person, with all the circumstances of the most inhuman cruelty. They had known his exemplary conversation, they had heard his heavenly discourses, they had seen his divine miracles; yet in spite of all these, the outrageous Jews seize him as a pest of human society, drag him before a heathen tribunal, extort a sentence of condemnation against him, and at length, after a thousand indignities and barbarities, nail him to the cross by the hands of the Romans. Yet would he show, that even these rebels were not beyond the reach of his power and grace; for no sooner was the dispensation of the Spirit opened, but three thousand of them were converted in one day; they gladly received the word, and were baptized in token of it; and notwithstanding all the efforts, which the subtilty or fury of their enemies could use to draw them away from it, they continued stedfast in the doctrine and fellowship of the apostles, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers: and they are now in heaven, rejoicing in the presence of that Jesus whom they murdered, and ascribing their eternal salvation to that blood which they themselves shed.

And now, methinks, I am at a loss to imagine, what unbelief can find to object against such instances and examples as these, especially when backed with so many encouraging promises. Can you say worse of yourselves, than that you are the chief of sinners? Paul will tell you, that he was so; and that for this cause, he obtained mercy, that in him, as chief, Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering for a pattern to those that should hereafter believe. And all the other examples are no doubt recorded for the very same purpose, that you through comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. Therefore when your hearts are overwhelmed within you, look unto the rock which is higher than you. Look unto Jesus, and you will be lightened; and your faces will not be ashamed. When Satan is plying you with his fiery darts, wield them off by the shield of faith, and, as it were, hurl them back into the face of the tempter. Let all his endeavours to deter you from it, engage you to adhere so much the more stedfastly to your resolution, of throwing yourselves at the feet of Christ: and let no one fear, that he should be the first sinner that ever perished there; for it cannot be, unless almighty power be weakened, and infinite compassions be exhausted.

6. Let those who have been enabled "to come unto God by Christ, be thankful, and courageous, in the views of the promised salvation."

My brethren, let me urge you to abound in the blessed work of praise, for which none on earth have so much reason as you. It is matter of thankfulness, only to hear of this salvation; how much more then, to have it brought home to our house, to our heart, so as to be able through grace to say, "This salvation is mine?" O remember, it was the same grace which first sent, that has rendered it effectual. Reflect, I entreat you, Sirs, on your own hearts: had you not once your prejudice against the gospel, as well as others? How unwilling were you to understand the method of salvation it taught! and when you did understand it, how much more unwilling were you to submit to it! yet now, those very parts of the scheme, which were once your peculiar aversion, are become your peculiar joy.

Adore the work of divine grace, and take encouragement from it. Remember the connexion which there is, between coming to God by Christ, and being saved by him to the uttermost. Your deliverance from the curse of the law, from the tyranny of Satan, and from the power of sin, is but the beginning of this salvation: but it will at length be accomplished; and you should triumph in the expectation of it. "Various enemies surround me," may the Christian say, "and they sometimes seem ready to swallow me up: the world besets me with innumerable snares; Satan is daily seeking by his crafty wiles to get advantage over me; the flesh is ever ready to betray me; and death is threatening to destroy me with its sting: but yet in all these things I am more than a conqueror, through him that hath loved me. Vain world, I shall quickly leave thee! wily, infernal serpent, the God of peace shall shortly bruise thee under my feet! corrupt deceitful flesh, I shall be happily delivered from thee! and death, thou king of terrors, I am assured, that thou shalt be swallowed up in victory! though thou mayst kill me, yet thou canst not hurt me: for I know that my Redeemer liveth; and because he liveth, I shall live also."——These are sentiments and views worthy our character as Christians, worthy of those who are saved of the Lord. Let us take for our helmet this hope of salvation, and it will guard our head in every danger of life and death; till at length we exchange that helmet for the celestial crown, which the Lord shall give us in that day, when in the completest sense he shall save all his people to the uttermost, and they shall all appear with him in the brightest glories of this great and perfect salvation.

SERMON XVII.

THE TENDERNESS OF CHRIST TO THE LAMBS OF HIS FLOCK

ISA. XL. 11.

He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.

It is well known that there are three most illustrious offices, under which our Redeemer is often spoken of in Scripture; those of the Prophet, the Priest, and the King of his church. And there are several other characters, either coincident with those, or subservient to them, which are frequently mentioned, and are worthy of our regard; amongst which, that of a Shepherd is peculiarly remarkable, as often occurring in the word of God, and affording abundant matter, both for the instruction and the consolation of his people.

I shall not now enumerate all the passages in which our Lord is described under this character, both in the Old Testament and the New. It may be sufficient here to remind you, that he was plainly foretold by Ezekiel, as that one Shepherd, whom God would set over his people to feed them, even his servant David, i. e. the Messiah, David's Son: He, says the prophet, shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. And Christ accordingly speaks of himself, as the good shepherd; and is spoken of by one and another of the apostles, as the great shepherd of the sheep, and the chief shepherd. So that, on the whole, if the words of the text had a more immediate reference to the Father, they might with great propriety be applied to Christ, by whom the Father exercises his pastoral care of his people

The chapter is opened with very reviving words: Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God: and, to assure them that these consolations addressed to them were indeed glad tidings of great joy, and worthy to be introduced in a very pompous manner, mention is made of a very remarkable herald sent before, whose voice was to cry in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a high-way for our God; i. e. let every obstruction be immediately removed: a scripture so expressly applied to John the Baptist, as the forerunner of Christ, that it may be sufficient to fix the sense of the context, with those who have any regard to the authority of the New Testament, in explaining the Old.

To confirm the faith of Israel in this important message, a solemn proclamation is made, ver. 6. The voice (that is, the voice of God, speaking to me in this vision) said unto me, Cry; that is, raise thy voice as loud as possible: and I said, What shall I cry? The following words are evidently the answer, which God returns to this question of the prophet; q. d. "Proclaim this awful and seasonable truth, All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field, which is yet more frail and short-lived than the grass itself: the grass withereth, and the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand for ever; q. d. Were it only the promise of a man, you might indeed doubt of its accomplishment; were it only the word of the mightiest prince on earth, it might give you but a trembling and precarious hope: man is a dying creature, and all the most cheerful hopes, which are built on him, may quickly perish; but the word of our God, even that word (as it is explained by the apostle Peter) which by the gospel is preached unto you, shall stand for ever, as the firm basis of your hope and confidence, and shall be certainly accomplished in the final redemption and salvation of his people."

The heavenly voice still continues to speak to the prophet, who was honoured with this happy message, and charges him to deliver it with the greatest cheerfulness and zeal. "O thou that bringest good tidings to Zion," (for so I think the words should be rendered, as they are by some, and particularly in the margin of your Bibles,) "get thee up into the high mountain, some place of eminence from whence thou mayest be universally heard: O thou, that bringest good tidings to Jerusalem, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up; and be not afraid, lest the event should not answer the promise; but say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God: for the Lord God will come with a strong hand; i. e. the kingdom of the Messiah shall be erected with a glorious display of the divine power: and his arm shall rule for him, as in former instances of most formidable opposition, his own right hand, and his holy arm, have gotten him the victory: his kingdom shall be administered with the exactest equity and wisdom; for his reward is with him, to render to every man according to his doings; and his work is before him; i. e. he has the completest view of it, and keeps his eye always fixed upon it."

Yet, (as it is added in the words of the text,) the authority of a Prince, and the dignity of a God, shall be attempered by the gentleness of a most compassionate Shepherd: He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.

You have already heard of that strong hand, with which Jesus our Lord is come, and of that victorious energy, with which his arm shall rule for him. His name has been proclaimed amongst you, as The Lord of Hosts, the Lord strong and mighty, able to save to the uttermost. Let us now consider him in this amiable character, in which our text describes him; for this renders those views of his almighty power delightful, which our guilt would otherwise render dreadful to us.

Christians, I would hope it is your desire, whenever you attend on the institutions of the gospel, to see Jesus. I may now say to you, (in the words of Pilate, on a very different occasion,) Behold the Man. He appears not indeed in his royal robes, or his priestly vestments; but he wears the habit of condescension and love; and is not the less amiable, though he may not seem equally majestic, while he bears the pastoral rod, instead of the royal sceptre, and feeds his flock like a shepherd, gathering up the feeble lambs in his arms, and bearing them in his bosom, and gently leading those that are with young.

You will naturally observe,—that the text declares Christ's general care of all his people,—and bespeaks his peculiar gracious regard to those, whose circumstances require a peculiar tenderness.

1. We may observe "his general care of all his people."

He shall feed his flock like a shepherd:—they may each of them therefore say, with David, The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want: he maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters; he restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. The church is his fold; and ordinances are his pastures: and his sheep shall be nourished by them, till they grow up to that blessed world, where, in a much nobler sense than here, all the children of God that were scattered abroad shall be gathered together in one, and shall appear as one sheepfold under the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls.* We have abundant reason to admire his condescension and love, in the view of these things, and to congratulate the happiness of his people, as under such pastoral care. But I will not enlarge on this general view, or on these reflections upon it; that I may leave room to insist on what I chiefly proposed in the choice of these words; that is,

* Compare John x. 16 with 1 Pet. ii. 25.

2. "Christ's peculiar concern for those, whose circumstances require a peculiar tenderness."

This is expressed in those words; He shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and gently lead those that are with young, i. e. he will consider their weakness and infirmity, and conduct them as they are able to bear it: which is also implied in that nearly parallel text, in which we are told, He shall seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and bind up that which was broken, and strengthen that which was sick.

This is the general import of the words; but for the fuller explication and improvement of them, give me leave,

I. To enumerate the cases and circumstances of some Christians, who may properly be considered as the lambs of the flock, or as those who are with young.

II. To consider what may be intimated concerning the Redeemer's tenderness to them, as it is expressed by his gathering them in his arms, and carrying them in his bosom, and gently leading them.

III. I will endeavour to show what abundant reason there is to depend upon it, that the great Shepherd will deal in a very tender manner with such. And then,

IV. I will endeavour to direct it to the proper improvement of the whole.

May he who hath said, Comfort ye my people, enable me to do it in the most effectual manner! may he give me the tongue of the learned, to speak a word in season to them that are weary, and to appoint to the weeping and trembling soul, beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness!

I. I am to mention the case of some Christians, who may properly be considered as represented by the lambs of the flock, or by sheep that are with young.

Now in the general, you know, these expressions may signify all who are young and tender. You know, a young lamb is a very feeble creature, and when deserted by its dam, if not assisted by the shepherd, is in danger of perishing, and of breathing out its innocent life, almost as soon as it has received it: and, as Jacob observes, the sheep that are with young, or that have lately yeaned, are not capable of such fatigues as the other cattle; but if overdriven so much as one day, their tenderness is such, that they would die. And therefore when our Lord was spoken of under the character of a shepherd, it was very just, as well as very elegant, to use such figures as these, to represent all those of his people who stood in need of peculiar compassion and care. Now you may easily apprehend those are to be considered as included here,—who are of a tender age,—or but of little standing in religion,—or whose spirits are naturally feeble,—or whose circumstances are distressful and calamitous, on account of any peculiar affliction, either of body or of mind.

1. It is evident, that "they who are of a tender age," may with peculiar propriety be called the lambs of the flock.

They resemble lambs, in respect of their youth; and in some degree, likewise, on account of that innocence and simplicity, for which our Lord singled them out, to recommend them to the imitation of all his followers, and even of his apostles, assuring them that they must become like little children, if they would hope to enter into the kingdom of heaven. You, children, will therefore endeavour to mind what I say this day; for I am to speak to you; to speak to you about the kindness and care of Christ towards you. I assure you, I speak of it with pleasure: and surely you should hear it with pleasure; and your little hearts should leap for joy, to think that a minister should be sent to address himself to you, as the lambs of Christ's flock. O that every one of you may indeed be so! You will hear what a kind shepherd you have, and how graciously he will lay you in his bosom.

2. "They who are of late standing in religion," may also be called the lambs of Christ's flock.

Though perhaps they are more advanced in age than many others, they are but young in grace, and in Christian experience; they are in the lowest form in Christ's school, and perhaps have much of the infirmity and weakness of children. They have also some peculiar difficulties to struggle with from within, and often from without, which may render them more sensible of those infirmities. Such are therefore called babes in Christ; while Christians of greater growth and experience, are called strong men.

3. The language of the text may also with peculiar propriety be applied to "those, whose spirits are naturally very feeble and timorous."

The constitutions of different persons are most apparently various; and the infirmities which attend some, render them the objects of peculiar compassion. To them perhaps "the grasshopper is a burthen;" and what by others would hardly be felt at all, quite overloads and depresses them. While some of their fellow-christians are as bold as the lion, these, like the fearful lamb, start and tremble almost at the shaking of a leaf. This excessive tenderness of mind, which shows itself often on very small occasions, is much more visible where their eternal interests seem to be concerned. The importance of those interests appears so great, that they are even terrified with the view. A sadness of soul, which often seizes them, disposes them to apprehend and suspect the worst of themselves. And hence it may so happen, that an incapacity to attend long to the exercises of devotion, arising from a natural weakness of nerves and spirits, shall appear to them as a black mark of a soul spiritually dead, and be thought a sufficient ground for applying to themselves all those awful things, which the hypocrites in Zion have so much reason to be afraid of. Or when they view the difficulties of the Christian life, they are ready to sink under the prospect, and to conclude, that they shall lose that little good they have attained, and shall surely and speedily fall by the hands of such formidable enemies. It is very probable, that the hearts of many who hear me, know, in this respect, their own bitterness and burthen: but let them remember, it is known also by the compassionate Shepherd of Israel; and shall be graciously remembered and considered by him.

4. The gracious promise in the text may be considered, as referring to "those, whose circumstances are peculiarly distressful, on account of afflictions, whether of body or of mind."

Who is there among you this day, that feareth the Lord, and obeyeth the voice of his servant; and yet walketh in darkness, and hath no light? He is now called to trust in the name of the Lord, and to stay himself upon his God. What Christians are there, whose days are spent in grief, and perhaps their years in sighing; so that, when their disappointments or maladies, their temptations or desertions, press hard upon them, they are scarce able to rise under the burthen, and to believe that they shall be any longer supported; but on the contrary are ready to cry out, Hath the Lord forgotten to be gracious? hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?—To them does this compassionate Saviour appear, to lift up the hands that hang down, and to strengthen the feeble knees: to sweeten their sorrows and silence their fears, to confirm their hopes and awaken their joys. Let the young and the unexperienced, the timorous and the afflicted, whose desires are towards him, and their hearts waiting upon him, let them all hear it with pleasure: if they can be safe in the arms of Christ, if they can be easy in his bosom, if they can be cheerful under his gentlest conduct, they may dismiss their anxieties; for to them, and to such as they are, does he particularly speak in these gracious words of the text, assuring them, that he will gather them as the lambs in his arms, that he will carry them in his bosom, and that he will gently lead them, as ewes which are great with young. Which brings me,

II. To consider what may be intimated concerning the Redeemer's tenderness to them, as expressed by these pastoral phrases.

All the expressions do evidently speak a most affectionate care; and they do more particularly intimate,—that he will be ready to receive, protect,—and comfort them,—and that he will moderate their trials in proportion to their strength. The three former of these are implied, in gathering them in his arms, and laying them in his bosom; and the last, in his gently leading those that are with young.

1. The text evidently declares, "the readiness of the blessed Jesus to receive the weakest soul that applies to him."

He will gather them in his arms; i. e. at least his arms shall be open to them. For though the Lord be high, he hath respect unto the lowly, and he will not despise the humblest creature, that thinks himself most beneath his regards. Children, though they can do so little for his service, though they hardly know how to breathe out a prayer before him, or what blessings they should ask at his hands; yet they shall be welcome to him. He understands their poor broken language, and he hears it with pleasure. When the soul is but just setting out in religion, and seems, in a spiritual sense, as helpless as a new-born infant; when there is little knowledge, and little experience, and perhaps a very strong struggle between nature and grace, he will not despise the day of small things. When the Christian is ready to say the hardest things against himself, when a sense of former follies and of present defects, lays him even in the dust at the foot of a Redeemer, this gracious Shepherd will raise the drooping creature; and when he is ready to say, Lord, I am, as I deserve to be, cast out of thy sight, he will gather him among the lambs in his arms, he will open them wide to receive and embrace him.—Trembling souls, hear it to your comfort: In all your weakness, under all your guilt, in the midst of your fears, in the midst of your sorrows, you may come unto Jesus with a holy boldness, and assure yourselves that he will not cast you out, that he will in no wise, i. e. by no means, on no consideration whatsoever, do it. But,

2. The phrase further implies, "that he will provide for their safety."

And therefore it is added, that he will not only gather them in his arms, but carry them in his bosom; which expresses both the tenderness and the continuance of his care for this purpose. You know, when the poor trembling lamb is lodged, not only in the arms, but in the bosom, of the shepherd, while it remains there it is so secure, that the wild beast or the robber must conquer the shepherd before he can hurt the lamb. So when the feeble and fearful Christian hears the lions of hell, as it were, roaring around him, and sees them just ready to devour him, he may fly to this sanctuary, and defy them all; for everlasting arms shall be underneath him, and shall compass him round for his defence and safety. I give unto my sheep eternal life, (says Christ, in the most resolute and determinate manner,) and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. "Reviving words!" may the believing soul say, "for they assure me, that if I am in that hand, to which I have been so frequently and so solemnly committing my eternal all, nothing can destroy me, that is not able to oppose, and even to conquer, Christ,—that Almighty Saviour,—whom, when he was on earth in feeble mortal clay, all the hosts of hell, with their united malice and rage, assaulted in vain, and were subdued and triumphed over by that very death which they so eagerly laboured to accomplish; for on the cross he spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly."

It may properly be added here, that as the lamb cannot be destroyed, so neither can it be seduced, when in the shepherd's arms. The foolish creature, while at a distance from him, may wander it knows not whither, and lose itself in some barren wilderness, where it cannot subsist, and from whence it cannot return. And thus far the humble believer will own the parallel too just,—will own that he has again and again gone astray like a lost sheep; "Yet, Lord," may he add, "I adore thy faithful care in reducing me to thy fold again, and am encouraged this day to hope, thou wilt not suffer me to perish by my wanderings. Thine eye and thy hand are my security against the prevalency of inward corruptions, as well as outward temptations; and I trust, that neither the one nor the other shall be able finally to separate me from thy love, or to deprive me of the blessings which are connected with it."

3. The promise in the text further implies, "that Christ will consult the comfort of his people," as well as their safety.

He will carry the lambs in his bosom, when they are so weak as not to be able to walk, like the rest of the flock. Or rather, here may be a beautiful allusion to a circumstance, which must often occur in the place where Isaiah wrote; when a new-fallen lamb was exposed to the chillness of the morning or evening air, in a manner which might have been dangerous to its health or its life, that the shepherd, when he saw it lying in this weak and helpless condition, should take it up into his bosom, and fold about it part of his long garment, which most people wore in those eastern countries; and there the little helpless creature would lie, not only safe, but warm and easy, till it was revived and strengthened. So pleasantly and delightfully is the poor trembling soul lodged in the bosom of Christ. It is made to rejoice in his love, as well as his power, and to own him as the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. You know, the Christian is described as rejoicing in Christ Jesus, and as glorying in him. The weary mariner does not rejoice so much, when the danger and fatigues of his voyage are over, and he sees himself safe at home, and meets the kindest of his long absent friends there, as the burthened soul rejoices, when by faith he is led to a Redeemer, and is received with the assurances of his love and grace. Nor would he exchange that soft compassionate bosom for the choicest and sweetest breasts of worldly consolation, of which the sinner may suck, but can never be satisfied from them.

4. The promise in the text must further intimate, "that Christ will accommodate the trials of the weak Christian to his strength," and will lay no more upon him than he shall be able to bear.

Therefore it is said, He will gently lead those that are with young; as the shepherd is careful, in such a circumstance, not to overdrive the cattle, lest both young and old be destroyed. God, says the apostle, is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tried above what ye are able; but will with the trial make a way for your escape, that ye may be able to bear it. In this instance is the tenderness of Christ remarkable, and his wisdom too.—As a father would not crush his child by a heavy burthen, but lets him bear what is proportionable to his years and strength; till at last, by insensible degrees, he grows capable of carrying with ease and pleasure, what would before have overwhelmed him; thus does Christ deal with the feeble Christian. He calls him out to easier duties, to less formidable combats, to lighter afflictions, first; he stays his rough wind in the day of the east wind; and trains him up to pass, with fortitude and cheerfulness, through those more trying scenes, which he would before have trembled to behold in a distant prospect.

All these comfortable and important particulars seem naturally contained in the words of the text. You easily apprehend, that many of them, as applied to the great Shepherd of souls, might have been confirmed by reasonings and scriptures which I have here omitted: but I was anxious not too far to anticipate what is to be offered under the third general, where I am to show, "how much reason there is to expect, that the blessed Jesus will exercise this gentle and affectionate care towards the feeble of the flock." The subject is too copious to be discussed, or entered upon, in these few remaining moments. Let me therefore at present conclude with reminding you, that all is already proved by the authority of the text; and I hope, the truth of it has been sealed, by the experience of many that hear me this day. May it be sealed by the experience of us all! and all will then say, as surely some of us can, that when we have heard the most that can be said of the grace of a Redeemer, and when the boldest or the softest figures are used to illustrate it, the half has not been told us. How much more shall we say it, when we come to the fold above! To which may his mercy at length conduct us, in such ways as his wisdom shall choose! And supported by his arms, and cherished in his bosom, we shall pursue them with pleasure. Amen.

SERMON XVIII.

PROOFS OF CHRIST'S TENDERNESS, AND THE IMPROVEMENT WE SHOULD MAKE OF IT.

Isa. xl. 11.

He shall feed his flock like a Shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.

It should certainly be our care, when we are handling such figurative scriptures as these, that we do not offer violence to them, and force them, by a multitude of fanciful accommodations, to speak what it was by no means pertinent to the design of the sacred writer to have said. Yet on the other hand, it appears to me but a grateful return to the divine condescension in using such language, to dwell attentively on the images, with which God is sometimes pleased to clothe his addresses to us; that we may use them to such purposes, as seem to have been intended by them. Especially is such a care as this reasonable, when the figure is not expressed in a single word, but diversified and adorned with such a variety of expression and imagery, as we find in the text. In such a case, it is fit, that the beauties of every part should be traced: and there is this evident advantage in it, that it may not only make way for the easier entrance of important truths into the mind; but may give room to present the most familiar and accustomed thoughts, in such a diversity of dress, at different times, as may make them more pleasing to the mind, than they might probably be, if repeated in the plainest language, so often as the importance of them requires they should be insisted upon.

Perhaps it is for this reason, among others, that such a variety of metaphorical and allegorical language is used, both in the Old and New Testament, in describing the offices and characters of the great Redeemer. And for this reason also it is, that when such passages have occurred, as the subject of our public meditations, I have thought it more proper to dwell pretty largely on the various clauses of the text, than immediately to fix on some common place in divinity, which might easily have been introduced, and to treat it in a systematical form. I bless God, that the attention with which such discourses have generally been heard, and the good effects with which they have often been attended, have encouraged me to pursue this method myself, and to recommend it to others; though some may reckon it a part of a solid and rational taste, to think very meanly of it.

With these views I have entered on the subject in the following method: Having proved that the words refer to the Lord Jesus Christ, the great Shepherd of the sheep, I have,

I. Enumerated the cases of various sorts of persons, whom we may suppose to be represented by the lambs of the flock, or by those that are with young, they being such as require peculiar tenderness.

And here I have mentioned,—those who are of a tender age,—or of a short standing in religion;—those whose spirits are naturally feeble;—and those whose circumstances are peculiarly calamitous, on account of any heavy affliction, either of body or mind, whether arising from providential dispensations, or from the hidings of God's face, or from the assault of spiritual enemies. So that Christians in such circumstances as these, will, I hope, consider themselves peculiarly interested in the comfortable things which are now further to be laid before them. And may the blessed Spirit apply the consolation to each of their souls!

II. I have also considered the Redeemer's tenderness to such, as expressed by gathering them with his arm, laying them in his bosom, and gently leading them.

And here I observed, that these gracious and affectionate words might be intended to express,—his readiness to receive,—to protect,—and to comfort them;—and his care to moderate their exercises and burthens in proportion to their strength. These are very important particulars, and most evidently suited to the necessities and desires of the feeble Christian. I hope, therefore, you will attend with pleasure, while I now proceed,

III. To show what abundant reason there is to believe that the great Shepherd will deal in this tender manner; that he will thus gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and gently lead those that are with young.

As the lamb sometimes fears the Shepherd, and is ready to flee from him when he comes towards it with the kindest designs; so it is also evident from experience, that the comfort of the Christian is often much impaired, for want of that confidence in the care and tenderness of a Redeemer, which is so reasonable, as well as so delightful, that one would wonder it should, after all, be so very deficient, even in the minds of those who are no strangers to his word, and who have themselves tasted of his grace. Permit me, therefore, at present to argue it,—from the general character under which he appears,—from the representations both of the prophets and apostles,—from his own declarations, as recorded by the evangelists,—and from the experience of those who have committed themselves to him.

1. We may argue this grace and tenderness of Christ, "from the general character under which he appears, as the Redeemer and Saviour of his people."

Is not this a character full of gentleness and goodness? Is it not instead of ten thousand arguments to prove, that if he pitied us in that low estate in which he at first found us, his mercy towards us will endure for ever? View our blessed Redeemer in the abasement of his abode among men; view him in the agonies in which he finished the last scene of his sorrows and sufferings; and then say, what but love brought him from heaven, and kept him on earth? What but love stretched him on the cross, and laid him in the grave? And can any expression of tenderness be too great to be expected after such amazing effects of it have already been experienced? Surely, as he himself argues, greater love hath no man than this, that a man should lay down his life for his friends: but, as the apostle justly observes, his love is commended towards us, it is set off by this important circumstance, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us: and how cheerfully may we depend upon it, that if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled by his death, we shall now, by his life, obtain complete salvation; and his living care will accomplish what his dying love has begun! All the blessed consequences I have already mentioned, and a long train of others, follow on this happy principle. He has graciously assumed the character and title of a Shepherd; and surely that name implies all the particulars which we have now been representing to you. His word, you know, sets a mark of infamy upon those shepherds that have not strengthened the diseased, nor healed the sick, nor bound up that which was broken, nor brought again that which was driven away, nor sought that which was lost; but who have ruled with force or cruelty. Surely the good Shepherd will not be like these: surely, if he will feed his flock like such a Shepherd, he cannot fail of gathering the lambs with his arm, and carrying them in his bosom, and of being very tender of the lives of those for whom his own life was given.

2. We may argue the tenderness and grace of the Redeemer, "from those testimonies which are borne to it in the prophetic writings."

This is mentioned as a remarkable part of his character, when considered not only in his pastoral office, but also in his royal dignity. To him do those words of Zechariah refer, Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; for behold thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding, not as other princes, perhaps on a managed horse, or in a splendid triumphal chariot; but according to the simplicity of more ancient days, when princes appeared amongst their subjects as fathers amongst their children; so shall he come, riding on an ass, even upon a colt, the foal of an ass. Thus too Isaiah introduces God as speaking of him, in those remarkable words, (which are so applied to him by the evangelist Matthew, as the former are,) Behold my servant whom I uphold, mine elect in whom my soul is delighted:—he shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the streets: a bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he shall bring forth judgment unto truth, or victory; i. e. till he perfect his gracious design of making righteousness and truth victorious over all opposition. Therefore is he spoken of, as a most proper person to accomplish the most compassionate purposes of the divine goodness; and is represented as rejoicing in the thought of his bearing such a commission, in those gracious words, (which were the foundation of his first public discourse, and which he so solemnly applied to himself in the synagogue of Nazareth,) The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. So exactly does our Lord answer the lovely character of a righteous and peaceful sovereign, drawn by David in those last words of his, (which many suppose ultimately to refer to the Messiah,) He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even as a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth, by clear shining after rain. And again, He shall judge the poor of the people, and save the children of the needy: and his people shall be so refreshed by his tender care, that he shall come down like rain upon the new-mown grass, and like showers that water the earth: he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper: he shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy: he shall redeem their souls from deceit and violence, and precious shall their blood be in his sight. Many parallel expressions might be added to these; but the following heads are too copious to allow of a further enlargement upon this.

3. I might largely argue the tenderness and grace of Christ, "from his conduct on earth in the days of his flesh."

The time would fail me, should I attempt to enumerate half the particular circumstances of it, that tend to illustrate this part of his character: I must only select a few, which are the most remarkable. And judge you, whether all that is foretold of him in the text, and in the other prophetical passages I have been referring you to, was not amply and sweetly accomplished in them.

It is said, He will gather the lambs in his arms, i. e. (as I have been telling you above,) the young and the weak shall be welcome to him: and did not our Lord sufficiently show that they were so, when the little children were brought unto him? The disciples indeed forbad them, as thinking it was beneath the dignity of so great a prophet, as their Master was, to trouble himself about them. But observe it, children, (for I believe it was in part recorded for your sakes,) Jesus was greatly displeased with his disciples, that they should think he had no tenderness for such little creatures as you, and he said, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God: and he took them upin his arms, and laid his hands upon them, and blessed them. Do you not here see the text most beautifully illustrated and fulfilled? do you not here see the great Shepherd gathering the lambs in his arms, and laying them in his bosom?—And does he not invite others also to that soft and pleasant repose, in those compassionate words, which surely none of you are such strangers in Israel as not to know? Come unto me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest: and, Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out. Did he not also express a very gracious regard to such, when he so peculiarly recommends the care of them to Peter, just when he was leaving the world, taking that peculiarly affecting opportunity of assuring him, not only that it was his will that they should be regarded, but also that an affectionate care of them was the most acceptable instance which Peter, and by a parity of reason his other ministers, could give of their love to him? Lovest thou me? if thou dost, feed my lambs, and feed my sheep. Can we then imagine, that he himself will fail in his care of any of them? especially when we consider the instances of his tenderness to some who were not of his fold, as well as to many who were to come, in whom though he saw only some feeble traces and images of goodness, yet it is said, that Jesus beholding him, loved him;—and to multitudes, over whom he wept, because they obstinately refused to be gathered in, and knew not the things belonging to their peace. Again,

The text tells us, He shall gently lead those that are with young; i. e. he shall accommodate his conduct to the weakness and infirmities of his people: and did not our Lord express this tenderness, when he taught his followers, as they were able to bear it; and was careful not to discourage them at first, by any unnecessary severities, lest it should be like putting new wine into old bottles, which might be easily broke by the fermentation of it?—and did not also this compassionate Shepherd appear ready to bind up the broken, and to heal the sick, when he so graciously excused the weakness of his disciples, though they fell asleep at a time, when one would have thought the agonies of their Lord should have turned them all into wakeful attention and affectionate sympathy? Yet, instead of severe reproaches, we find this kind apology in the mouth of their neglected, injured Master, The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. To add no more on this head, it is well worth our observation, that when Peter had so shamefully denied him, and all the rest of the apostles had forsaken him, even when he might most reasonably have expected their kindest assistance, he does not after his resurrection express any keen and passionate resentments, but on the contrary, all is mildness and sweetness. At his first appearance to Mary Magdalen, he says to her, Go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God. And a few moments after, when appearing to the other women on their return from the sepulchre, Go tell my brethren, says he that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me. He does not say, "Go and tell those cowardly perfidious creatures, that God has not abandoned me, though they so meanly did it." He does not say, "Go tell that perjured traitor, who even in my very sight and hearing disowned me and abjured me:" but, "Go tell my brethren." And lest Peter should think himself excluded from the message, as peculiarly unworthy of so kind a name, the angel, no doubt by our Lord's particular direction, names that poor penitent expressly, and says, Go tell his disciples, and Peter, that he is risen; as if it had been said, "Let that humble mourner know, that his dear Master is risen, and in the midst of his triumphs graciously remembers him, and sends him these glad tidings thus early, as a token that all is forgiven." Gracious Shepherd! who would not love thee? who would not immediately cease his wanderings, to seek a retreat in thy compassionate bosom?

4. The compassion of our Redeemer is still further illustrated, "by those representations of it, which are made by the apostles, in what they have written since his ascension into glory."

You well know, they were under the direction of the Spirit of Jesus, and had the mind of Christ in so perfect a manner, that what they say is in effect spoken by Christ himself. Now there are many passages in their writings, which loudly speak, and tenderly illustrate, the compassion of his heart.

The apostles sometimes expressly assert it; and sometimes they write as taking it for granted, as a thing known, allowed, and indeed felt by every Christian.—It is frequently asserted by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, in very expressive language. We are assured, that we have not a high priest, who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but who was himself in all points tempted like as we are. And more than that, we are assured, that he submitted to the abasements of an incarnate state, on purpose that his sufferings might teach him a due sympathy: It behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and a faithful high priest, in things pertaining unto God: for in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted: as the Jewish high priests, being themselves compassed with infirmities, could have compassion on the ignorant, and such as were out of the way.—In other places, the compassion of Christ is referred to, as universally known, and so great as to serve for a proverbial expression of the greatest kindness. Thus when conjugal affection is recommended from the consideration of both being one flesh, the apostle adds, No man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church: plainly intimating, that a man cannot have a more tender care of the members of his own body, than Christ has of his church and people. And elsewhere the apostle conjures Christians, by the bowels of Christ, by the meekness and gentleness of Christ; and pleads, if there be any consolation in Christ. We can hardly conceive any assertions so expressive, as such oblique insinuations and appeals as these.

Yet I cannot omit that engaging illustration of this compassionate care of the great Shepherd, which is to be found in those epistles which he sent to the churches in Asia, by the hand of John, after he was received to the glories of his exalted state. By these it appears, how distinctly he attended to the concerns of each of those churches, and therefore, no doubt, of each particular soul which constituted them; how diligently he observed, who were flourishing, and who were declining, that he might address them with encouragements, or admonitions, suited to their respective circumstances. It plainly appears, that notwithstanding all their peculiar advantages and obligations, there were many feeble and distempered souls among them, and some that were called out to very laborious services, and hazardous trials. Let me entreat you to observe, how the blessed Jesus lifts up the hands which were hanging down, and strengthens the feeble knees. He saw, that the church of Ephesus had left its first love;—that the church of Sardis had a name to live but was dead; yet that there was a little handful amongst them who had not defiled their garments;—that the church of Philadelphia had but a little strength;—and that of Laodicea was neither cold nor hot: yet a gracious Redeemer does not immediately disown them; but on the one hand, kindly admonishes them of the danger there was, lest growing apostasy and degeneracy should provoke him to remove their candlestick out of its place,—to cast them out as loathsome,—or to wound them with the sword of his mouth, i. e. his word;—and on the other hand, he encourages them to greater fidelity and zeal, by a promise of eating of the fruit of the tree of life,—of being clothed in white raiment,—of being confessed before the Father and his holy angels,—and of sitting down with him on his victorious throne.—And as for his faithful Smyrneans, he not only highly applauds their former conduct, but animates them against the terrors of imprisonment and other tribulation, by assuring them, he would give them a crown of life.—And he fails not to tell the Philadelphians, that since, weak as they were, they had kept his word, he also would keep them from the approaching hour of temptation, until at length he made them pillars in the house of God above, and gave them a new name in his holy city. You will please to take a more particular view of these epistles at your leisure; and you will see, in how amiable a manner the good Shepherd appears in them, laying the lambs in his bosom, and gently leading those that are with young.

5. I might further argue this grace and tenderness of our Lord Jesus, "from the experience of those, who have been thus gathered, and cherished, and conducted by him."

This being fact, ought certainly to have its weight; and how little soever it may be regarded by those who are strangers to it, yet to the happy soul, who has found and felt this care, and with the most delightful relish tasted that the Lord is gracious, it will be instead of ten thousand arguments. How many, when ready to sink under their sorrows and their fears, have looked unto him, and been lightened, have found their fears dispersed, and their hopes established, their strength renewed, and their joys enkindled! The effect is real, evident, and frequent; and if we inquire into the immediate cause, we shall often find it to be the promises of his word, uttered by Christ himself, or recorded by such as had their instructions and authority from him. But if it be demanded, whence it is that the promises do at some times impress the mind so much more powerfully than at others, though as distinctly remembered, and as firmly believed? I will venture to say, how enthusiastical soever some may imagine it, that the most natural reason seems to me to be this: the blessed Spirit of God, whose office it is to show to believers the things of Christ, does sometimes display the promises before their eyes with uncommon sweetness and energy, at the same time sealing to the soul its own interest in them; and from hence arises so sublime and so holy a joy and strength, that the Christian observing its nature and tendency, cannot doubt its original. And I evidently see, and new instances of it are daily arising, that such secret communications from above are the most effectual support of many good men, under the greatest inward discouragements, and the most painful conflicts with their spiritual enemies. Now these supports being derived from the blessed Spirit, are to be considered as proceeding from Christ; since it is most evident from the whole tenor of Scripture, that Christ is the great head, from whom believers derive the influences of this Spirit, which are therefore called the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ. So that every new instance of such refreshments and consolations as these, is an additional experimental proof of the tenderness and grace of a Redeemer.

Nor is there any just objection against it, arising from the many instances, in which he has permitted excellent persons to go on, for a considerable time, in the bitterness of their souls, without any sensible manifestations of his care and favour. We are to judge nothing before the time; and surely the fidelity and kindness of the blessed Jesus is sufficiently approved, if, though in the most secret and imperceptible manner, he supports his people in the midst of their greatest difficulties, so as to prevent their being separated from him, till he safely conducts them to the heavenly world, and there shows them the reasons of all their sorrows, and comforts them infinitely more than in proportion to them all. And that he does so, appears evident to me, not only from the promises and declarations of his word, which have been referred to under the former head, but also from the observation of facts, as far as it is possible for a train of particular observations, to confirm such a general assertion.

I must here take the liberty to say, (because I think it my duty on this occasion publicly to testify it,) that though for my age I have had a considerable opportunity of making my remarks on various cases of persons under spiritual distress, yet, excepting a very few instances of evident distraction, which none can reasonably imagine to have affected their eternal state, I cannot recollect any single instance, in which the humble soul has seemed to be finally deserted by the great Shepherd. Many who have been under strong convictions and agonies of mind, have indeed forgot their resolutions, taken up often in an apparent dependence on themselves, and have returned with the dog to his vomit, and with the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire. Many, who have talked loudly of their extraordinary communications from above, and despised others who have been less confident, have quickly appeared self-deceiving hypocrites, and have been left by foul miscarriages to bring a scandal on themselves, and on religion too. But I cannot remember, that I ever met with a single person, who appeared, as one of the lambs of Christ's flock, humble under a sense of sin, and cordially disposed to put himself under the care of Christ as the great Shepherd, who after seeking and waiting on him, has been either driven away by terror, or finally seduced into soul-ruining errors or crimes, even by the most artful deceivers. Many of them have perhaps for a considerable time gone on weeping and trembling; but they have kept their hold even to the last, and died with much more comfort than they lived. Others have, for a long course of afterlife, found their consolations as great as ever their sorrows had been: and, after all their fears, many are to this day going on in a steady calm, as knowing whom they have believed; while others, who I doubt not are equally safe, are saying, If we perish, we will perish at his feet: but so far as I can recollect, I have never myself seen any of such a character, who have fallen into a final apostasy, or died in such circumstances as to leave room to fear that their souls were lost; and I have heard of few cases, which bear such an appearance.——Let all these remarks and arguments be attentively considered; and then say, whether the grace and tenderness of a Redeemer be not as clearly proved, and as firmly established, as even the lambs of his flock could reasonably desire. And now,

IV. Let me conclude the discourse, with hinting at the purposes to which it may be improved.

And surely the survey we have been taking of the tenderness of Christ as a Shepherd, may naturally lead us to some such reflections as these.

1. "How amiable does our blessed Redeemer appear, when we contemplate him under such a character!"

Such sentiments of humanity are wrought into our very natures, that we cannot but love any person, especially one of distinction, who condescends to the weak and the helpless, and tenderly accommodates himself to their necessities and distresses. You honour, and you love, a man of genius, and learning, and eminence in life, who will lay aside other more splendid employments, that he may instruct children, or by kind and affectionate converse, even with the poorest creature that applies to him, may ease the burthens of the sorrowful spirit. If a minister of such a character has been remarkable for his readiness to such services, and for his diligent and successful application to them, though it be plainly the peculiar duty of his office to abound in them, he is justly respected while he lives, and his name and memory are dear and precious to survivors: yet this is only the condescension of one worm to another. How much more reason have we to reverence and love the compassionate Jesus, the Prince of Glory, who has so long borne, and so tenderly and faithfully executed, this kind office, and bears and executes it to this day! how many diseased souls has he healed, how many weak hands has he strengthened, how many weeping eyes has he dried, how many trembling hearts has he supported and revived! Let our love and our praises ascend to this great common benefactor, for the share which others have had in his goodness.—But must the reflection stop here? Are not we ourselves in the number of those obliged creatures? and shall not we feel and own the obligation?—We should surely be a burthen to ourselves, if we had no sense of the kindness of those, who supported us in our feeble infancy; who then bore us in their arms, and cherished us in their bosoms; who watched over our slippery steps, and added the more important care of forming our opening minds to knowledge and virtue. And when we have felt the burthen of more advanced days pressing hard upon us, and heaviness in our hearts has made them stoop, if some cordial sympathizing friend has gladdened them with good and comfortable words, how kindly have we taken it, and how thankfully have we acknowledged it! But, O blessed Jesus, what were the guides of our infancy, or what the companions and comforters of our more advanced years, in comparison of what thou hast been to us? "Whatever I now am," may the soul say, "if I am thine, I was once a helpless lamb in thy flock; and how much am I indebted to that pastoral care of thine, of which I have now been hearing! Hadst thou not pursued me in my wanderings, I had been utterly lost: hadst thou not guarded me in thine arms, I had long since been devoured: hadst thou not cherished me in thy bosom, my very heart had been broken. And to this very day, what were I without thy care and favour?" Thus let us look back to former days, and the years of more ancient times; and as God reminds his people, how he took them by their arms, and taught them to go, as he mentions with an agreeable reflection, "the kindness of their youth, and the love of their espousals," let us this day gratefully commemorate his kindness to us in our youth, and when our souls were first espoused to him.

2. "How ready should we be, to imitate this amiable character of our Redeemer; and after his example, to show a tender regard to the feeble of the flock!"

We who are ministers should especially do it, if we would approve our fidelity to the great Shepherd, and finally stand accepted in his sight. Observe, I entreat you, my younger brethren, (for my relation to some of you not only allows, but requires me, to speak with peculiar freedom to you,) observe in how awful a manner the great God declares his displeasure against those shepherds, who had neglected the care which I now recommend. Behold, I am against those shepherds, saith the Lord; (i. e. as appears from the preceding verses, those shepherds who had not strengthened the diseased, nor healed the sick, nor bound up the broken, nor brought again that which was driven away;) and I will require my flock at their hand, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock. Did God so severely censure the Jewish shepherds for their neglect; and will he not disown and condemn us, if under all the greater engagements of such a dispensation as the gospel, and such an example as we have now been surveying, our flocks be neglected, or rather, his flock committed to our care? If you fear God, or love the Lord Jesus Christ, feed his sheep,—feed his lambs. Instruct children; though it be a difficult work, and may seem to ignorant and thoughtless people a mean work: yet do it, and you will probably find the comfort of it, even if they die young, as they perhaps may; and much more, if you see these tender plants growing up as cedars in Lebanon, and becoming pillars in the house of our God.—Tenderly comfort mourning souls. Let them have free access to you at proper times; hear their story patiently, though it be a very melancholy one; and though you have heard it over and over again, from others in the same circumstances, if not from themselves. Watch their tempers, observe the turn of their minds, and of their discourses; and endeavour to lay hold of some word of their own, that you may, if possible, graft comfort upon it. Mourn with them, while they mourn; and when your heart is impressed with their sorrowful case, go with them to the throne of grace, and spread it largely and particularly before the Lord, which you cannot so conveniently do in any other circumstance.—I know, there are a thousand gaieties of life, and amusements of literature, which make young persons especially averse to such work as this. But remember, you are ministers of Christ; and surely the disciple is not above his Master, nor the servant above his Lord. You would think very ill of the shepherd, that was so charmed with the music of his pipe, as to forget his lambs, when they should be fed and tended. And I will venture to say, that as the case I now recommend is very necessary in order to the success of your ministry, so it may be a means of improving both your gifts and graces, and of forming you to a spiritual and experimental strain of preaching; which is a much more valuable part of a minister's furniture, than classical or mathematical learning, or the critical study of the Scripture itself; though all these are desirable in their places, because all may be useful towards making the man of God perfect.

I would also from hence take occasion, to address an exhortation to you who are heads of families. To your more immediate and constant care the lambs of the flock are committed. Feed them diligently and affectionately. Without your concurrence, we cannot promise ourselves much from our more public attempts. Attend therefore to the religious concerns of your children and servants; and do it with a gentleness suited to their age and circumstances. Frighten them not with a rigorous and austere severity; but, as St. Paul expresses it with regard to himself, be gentle among them, even as a nurse cherisheth her children. In short, let us all bear one another's burthens, and so fulfil the law of Christ; and let us candidly receive one another, as we hope that Christ with all our infirmities hath received us.

3. "What abundant encouragement is here for the feeblest soul, to commit itself to Christ!"

Let me now, on that encouragement, particularly address the exhortation to those, whose circumstances render it peculiarly their concern.

Let me address it to you, my younger friends, even to the children that hear me this day. We speak of the gentleness and goodness of Christ, on purpose to invite you to him. Go to him by faith and prayer, and say, "Blessed Jesus, I come to thee a poor weak tender creature; but it was in regard to such weakness, that thou hast been pleased to speak so graciously. I believe what I have heard, and I mean to venture my soul upon it. I flee to thee, as the helpless lamb to its shepherd, when hungry—that he may feed it, when pursued by wild beasts—that he may defend it. Lord, open thine arms, and thy bosom to me, though I am so inconsiderable a creature. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou ordainest praise. Fill my heart with thy love, and my mouth with thy praise; and lead me on, till I come to praise thee among the angels in heaven, and to serve thee as they do."

Let me address the exhortation, also, to the tempted and sorrowful soul. O thou afflicted, thou who art tossed with the tempest, and not comforted! look unto Jesus. Let thy conflicts and dangers drive thee to him; though Satan would thereby attempt to drive thee from him. Accustom not thyself to think of Christ as dreadful and severe. Terrify not thyself with the thought of the iron rod of vengeance, whilst thou feelest thyself disposed to submit to the golden sceptre of his grace, to the pastoral rod by which he guides his sheep. And when thou findest thy doubts arising, flee to the representations and assurances of his word, so largely insisted on above; and pray, that the influences of his Spirit may strengthen thy faith in them.

Nor let me neglect so proper an occasion, of addressing myself to aged Christians. You, my friends, though not the lambs of the flock, are, on some account, the feeble of it. Though I hope, and believe, that many of you are strong in grace; yet the outer man is decaying, and sensible comfort often decays with it. Yet be not discouraged; but remember your Shepherd. You have not only heard of his grace, but you have long experienced it. Be cheerful in it, and remember, that as all your experiences will not secure you otherwise than as in the bosom of Christ, so all your infirmities and trials cannot endanger you while you are there. He has led you on gently and safely through the wilderness; a few steps more will finish your journey, and bring you to the ever-blissful pastures of Canaan.

Once more, let me address the exhortation to those who have gone astray from this blessed Shepherd, and invite them to return to him. May I not appeal to your own consciences to witness, that it was never better with you than when you kept nearest to him; and that while at a distance from him, you are exposed to want, and danger, and bitter regret? Has not your heart melted within you, while I have been speaking? and have you not been ready to say, "O that I were once more lodged in those gracious arms, in that compassionate bosom!" And what hinders it? Does he not assure you, that he will yet be willing to receive you? nay, that he will rejoice over you, on some accounts even more than over those who never wandered? Return then, in the strength of divine grace, to the duties you have neglected, to the ordinances you have forsaken; and may your souls find refreshment in them, that with firmer purpose of heart you may for the future cleave unto the Lord. And now,

Lastly, "What a delightful idea does it give us of the mutual endearments, which shall pass between Christ and his people, when they are brought to the world of glory!"

There they shall be no longer exposed to necessities and alarms; but all the purposes of his love shall be completed in their everlasting security and joy. And surely the gracious Redeemer must be inconceivably delighted, when he there sees of the travail of his soul. When he has with a gentle and gracious hand conducted his sheep through the dark valley of the shadow of death, with what joy will he open to them those better pastures! with what congratulations will he receive them to a state of inseparable nearness to him, and administer unto them an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of their

Lord and Saviour! Therefore it is beautifully represented in the book of the Revelation, as the business and joy of Christ, even on the throne of his glory, to lead on his saints to the various scenes of divine pleasure and enjoyment, which are provided for them there: The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto fountains of living waters.

And, O gracious Redeemer, what will the joy of thy flock then be, when thus fed and conducted by thee! If it be so delightful at this humble distance, to believe ourselves the objects of thy care and favour, and to taste of these little streams which thou art causing to flow in upon us here in the wilderness, what will that river of life be! If it be now the joy of our hearts, awhile to forget our cares and our fears, when we are perhaps at thy table, and to lean our weary heads for a few moments on thy dear breast; what will it be, for ever to dwell in thine embrace, and to say once for all, Return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee! Bountifully indeed! when they who were brought out with weeping, and led on with supplication, shall, as the redeemed of the Lord, come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

In the mean time, we rejoice in hope of this blessed scene, and would raise such feeble praises, as earth will admit, to this great Shepherd, whose arm is so strong to guard us; whose bosom is so soft to cherish us; and whose heart is so compassionate, notwithstanding all our unworthiness, as to exert that arm for our protection, and to open that bosom for our repose. Amen.

THE EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY BRIEFLY STATED, AND THE NEW TESTAMENT PROVED TO BE GENUINE.

2 Pet. i. 16.

—— We have not followed cunningly devised fables.

It is undoubtedly a glory to our age and country, that the nature of moral virtue has been so clearly stated, and the practice of it so strongly enforced, by the views of its native beauty, and beneficial consequences, both to private persons and societies. Perhaps, in this respect, hardly any nation or time has equalled, certainly few, if any, have exceeded, our own. Yet I fear I might add, there have been few ages or countries, where vice has more generally triumphed, in its most audacious, and in other respects most odious, forms.

This may well appear a surprising case; and it will surely be worth our while to inquire into the causes of so strange a circumstance. I cannot now enter into a particular detail of them. But I am persuaded, none is more considerable than that unhappy disregard, either to the gospel in general, or to its most peculiar and essential truths, which is so visible among us, and which appears to be continually growing. It is plain, that like some of old, who thought and professed themselves the wisest of mankind, or in other words, the freest thinkers of their age, multitudes among us have not liked to retain God and his truths in their knowledge: and it is therefore the less to be wondered at, if God has given them up to a reprobate mind; to the most infamous lusts and enormities; and to a depth of degeneracy, which, while it is in part the natural consequence, is in part also the just but dreadful punishment of their apostasy from the faith. And I am persuaded, that those who do indeed wish well to the cause of public virtue, as every true Christian most certainly does, cannot serve it more effectually, than by endeavouring to establish men in the belief of the gospel in general, and to affect their hearts with its most distinguishing truths.

The latter of these is our frequent employment, and is what I have particularly been attempting in the preceding discourses on the power and grace of the Redeemer: the former I shall now, by the divine assistance, apply myself to in those that follow. And I have chosen the words now before us, as a proper introduction to such a design.

They do indeed peculiarly refer to the coming of our Lord, which the apostle represents as attested by that glory, of which he was an eye-witness on the mount of transfiguration, and by that voice from heaven which he heard there: but the truth of these facts is evidently connected with that of the gospel in general. I am persuaded therefore, you will think they are properly prefixed to a discourse on the general evidences of Christianity. And I hope, by the divine assistance, to propose them at this time in such a manner, as shall convince you, that the apostles had reason to say, and that we also have reason to repeat it, We have not followed cunningly devised fables.

I have often touched on this subject occasionally: but I think it my duty at present to insist something more largely upon it. You easily apprehend, that it is a matter of the highest importance, being indeed no other than the great foundation of all our eternal hopes. While so many are daily attempting to destroy this foundation, it is possible, that those of you especially, who are but entering on the world, may be called out to give a reason of the hope that is in you: I would therefore, with the apostle, be concerned, that you may be ready to do it. It may fortify you against the artifices by which the unwary are often deceived and insnared, and may possibly enable you to put to silence their foolishness. At least it will be for the satisfaction of your minds, to have considered the matter seriously, and to be conscious to yourselves, that you are not Christians merely by education, or example, as (had you been born elsewhere) you might have been pagans or Mahometans; but that you are so upon rational evidence, and because (as the sacred historian expresses it) you know the certainty of those things in which you have been instructed.

To open and vindicate the proof of Christianity in all its extent, would be the employment of many discourses; nor would it, on the whole, be proper to attempt it here. All that I now intend here is, to give you a summary view of the most considerable arguments, in that which seems to me their most proper and natural connexion; that so you may be able to judge of them better than you can possibly do by a few scattered remarks, or by the most copious enlargement on any single branch of them alone. I shall endeavour to dispose these hints so, as that they may be some guide to those, whose leisure and abilities may lead them to a more ample and curious inquiry; that they may not be entangled in so complex an argument, but may proceed in an orderly manner. And if any of you, my friends, desire a more particular information on any of those heads, which I now but briefly suggest, you may depend upon it, that faithful ministers of every denomination will think it an important part of their duty, to give you all the private assistance they can. It is my hearty prayer, that God would enable me to plead his cause with success; that he would open your understandings to receive these things, and strengthen your memories to retain them; that you may not, like children, be tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and the cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; but may be strong in faith, giving glory to God; that, your faith being more and more established, it may appear, that the tree is watered at the roots, and all your other graces may grow and flourish in an equal proportion.

But before I proceed, I must desire you to observe, that there is no proof in the world so satisfactory to the true Christian, as to have felt the transforming power of the gospel on his own soul. As that illiterate man, whose eyes were miraculously opened by Christ, when he was questioned by the Jewish sanhedrim, who endeavoured with all their sophistry to prove Christ an impostor, answered with great steadiness and constancy, and with a great deal of reason too, This one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see: so the most unlearned of the disciples of Jesus, having found his soul enlightened and sanctified, and felt his heart so effectually wrought upon, as to bring him home to his duty, his God, and his happiness, by the constraining power of the gospel, will despise a thousand subtle objections which may be urged against it; and though the cross of Christ be to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness, yet with this experience of its saving energy, he will honour it in the midst of all their contempt and ridicule, as the power of God, and the wisdom of God. In this sense, though the miraculous communication of the Spirit be ceased, he that believes hath still the witness in himself; and while the Spirit beareth witness with his spirit, that he is a child of God, he cannot doubt, but that the word, by which he was, as it were, begotten unto him, is indeed a divine and incorruptible seed. And perhaps there are certain seasons of pressing temptation, in which the most learned, as well as the most illiterate, Christian, will find this the surest anchor of his hope.

Nevertheless, it must be acknowledged, that this glorious kind of evidence is like the white stone, mentioned in the Revelation, in which there was a new name written, which no man knew but he who received it. God has therefore made other provision for the honour and support of his gospel, by furnishing it with a variety of proof, which may with undiminished, and indeed with growing, conviction, be communicated from one to another. And we should be greatly wanting in gratitude to him, in zeal for a Redeemer's kingdom, and in charitable concern for the conversion of those who reject the gospel, as well as for the edification of those who embrace it, should we wholly overlook these arguments, or neglect to acquaint ourselves with them. This is the evidence which I am now to propose; and I desire you would hear it with a becoming attention. I speak to you as to rational creatures: judge ye of the reasonableness of what I shall say.

In prosecution of this great design, I shall endeavour more particularly to show you,—that if we take the matter on a general survey, it will appear highly probable, that such a scheme of doctrines and precepts, as we find Christianity to be, should indeed have been a divine revelation;—and then, that if we examine into the external evidence of it, we shall find it certain in fact, that it was so, and that it had its original from above.

First, Let me show, "that taking the matter merely in theory, it will appear highly probable, that such a system as the gospel should be indeed a divine revelation."

To evince this, I would more particularly prove, —that the state of mankind was such, as greatly to need a revelation;—that there seems from the light of nature, encouragement to hope that God should grant one;—that it is reasonable to believe, if any were made, it should be so introduced and transmitted, as we are told Christianity was; and that its general nature and substance should be such, as we find that of the gospel is. If these particulars are made out, here will be a strong presumptive evidence, that the gospel is from God; and we shall have opened a fair way toward that more direct proof, which I principally intend.

1. "The case of mankind is naturally such, as greatly to need a divine revelation."

I speak not here of man in his original state; though even then, as many have largely shown, some instruction from above seemed necessary to inform him of many particulars, which it was highly expedient that he should immediately know: but I speak of him in the degenerate condition in which he now so evidently lies, by whatever means he was brought into it. It is an easy thing to make florid encomiums on the perfection of natural light, and to deceive unwary readers with an ambiguous term;* (which shall sometimes signify all that appears even to the divine understanding, and sometimes no more than the meanest of the human race may, or than they actually do, attain;) but let fact speak, and the controversy will soon be determined. I appeal to all, that are acquainted with the records of antiquity, or that have any knowledge of the most credible accounts of the present state of those countries where Christianity is unknown, whether it is not too obvious a truth, that the whole heathen world has lain, and still lies, in wickedness. Have not incomparably the greater part of them been perpetually bewildered in their religious notions and practices, vastly differing from each other, and almost equally differing on all sides from the probable appearances of truth and reason? Is any thing so wild as not to have been believed, any thing so infamous as not to have been practised, by them, while they have not only pretended to justify it by reason, but have consecrated it as a part of their religion? To this very day, what are the discoveries of new nations in the American or African world, but, generally speaking, the opening of new scenes of enormity? Rapine, lust, cruelty, human sacrifices, and the most stupid idolatries, are, and for ought I can find, always have been, the morality and religion of almost all the pagan nations under heaven: and to say, that there have still been some smothered sparks of reason within, which, if cherished, might have led them to truth and happiness, is only saying, that they have been so much the more criminal, and therefore so much the more miserable.

But you live at home, and hear these things only by uncertain report. Look then around you within the sphere of your own observation, and see the temper and character of the generality of those, who have been educated in a Christian, and even in a protestant, country. Observe their ignorance and forgetfulness of the divine Being, their impieties, their debaucheries, their fraud, their oppression, their pride, their avarice, their ambition, their unnatural insensibility of the wants, and sorrows, and interests of each other; and when you see how bad they generally are in the midst of so many advantages, judge by that of the probable state of those that want them. Judge upon these views, whether a revelation be an unnecessary thing.

2. "There is, from the light of nature, considerable encouragement to hope, that God would favour his creatures with so needful a blessing as a revelation appears."

That a revelation is in itself a possible thing, is evident beyond all shadow of a doubt. Shall not he that made man's mouth, who has given us this wonderful faculty of discovering our sentiments, and communicating our ideas to each other, shall not he be able to converse with his rational creatures, and by sensible manifestations, or by inward impressions, to convey the knowledge of things which lie beyond the ken of their natural faculties, and yet may be highly conducive to their advantage? To own a God, and to deny him such a power, would be a notorious contradiction.—But it may appear much more dubious, whether he will please to confer such a favour on sinful creatures.

Now I acknowledge, that we could not certainly conclude he would ever do it, considering, on the one hand, how justly they stood exposed to his final displeasure, and on the other, what provision he had made by the frame of the human mind, and of nature around us, for giving us such notices of himself, as would leave us inexcusable, if we either failed to know him or to glorify him as God; as the apostle argues at large. Nevertheless, methinks we should have had something of this kind to hope, from considering God as the indulgent Father of his creatures; from observing the tender care which he takes of us, and the liberal supply which he grants for the support of the animal life; especially, from the provision which he has made for man, considered as a guilty and calamitous creature, by the medicinal and healing virtues which he has given to many of the productions of nature, which in a state of perfect rectitude and happiness man would never have needed. This is a circumstance, which seemed strongly to intimate, that he would some time or another graciously provide some remedy to heal men's minds; and that he would interpose to instruct them in his own nature, in the manner in which he is to be served, and in the final treatment which they may expect from him. And I think, such an apprehension seems very congruous to the sentiments of the generality of mankind: as appears from the many pretences to divine revelation which have often been made, and the readiness of multitudes to receive them on very slender proofs: this shows how naturally men expect some such kind interposition of the Deity; a thought which might further be confirmed by some remarkable passages of heathen writers, which I have not now time particularly to mention.

* This Dr. Tyndal has done in so gross and palpable a manner, that it is surprising that fallacy alone should not have exposed his "Christianity as Old as the Creation," to the immediate contempt of every intelligent reader.

3. We may easily conclude, "that if a Revelation were given, it would be introduced and transmitted in such a manner as Christianity is said to have been."

It is exceeding probable, for instance, that it should be taught, either by some illustrious person sent down from a superior world, or at least by a man of eminent wisdom and piety, who should himself have been, not only a teacher, but an example, of universal goodness. In order to this it seems probable, that he should be led through a series of calamity and distress; since otherwise he would not have been a pattern of the virtues which adorn adversity, and are peculiar to it. And it might also have been expected, that in the extremity of his distress, the blessed God, whose messenger he was, should in some extraordinary manner have interposed, either to preserve or to recover him from death.

It is moreover exceeding probable, that such a person, and perhaps also they who were at first employed as his messengers to the world, should be endowed with a power of working miracles; both to awaken men's attention, and to prove a divine mission, and the consequent truth of their doctrines; some of which might perhaps not be capable of any other kind of proof; or if they were, it is certain that no method of arguing is so short, so plain, and so forcible, and on the whole, so well suited to the conviction, and probably the reformation, of mankind, as a course of evident, repeated, and uncontrolled miracles. And such a method of proof is especially adapted to the populace, who are incomparably the greater part of mankind, and for whose benefit, we may assure ourselves, a revelation would chiefly be designed.—I might add, it was no way improbable, though not in itself certain, that such a dispensation should open gradually on the world; and that the most illustrious messenger of God to men should be ushered in by some predictions, which should raise a great expectation of his appearance, and have an evident accomplishment in him.

As for the propagation of a religion so introduced, it seems no way improbable, that having been thus established in its first age, it should be transmitted to future generations by credible testimony, as other important facts are. It is certain that affairs of the utmost moment, which are transacted amongst men, depend on testimony: on this voyages are undertaken, settlements made, and controversies decided: controversies, on which not only the estates but the lives of men depend. And though it must be owned, that such an historical evidence is not equally convincing with miracles which are wrought before our own eyes; yet it is certain it may rise to such a degree as to exclude all reasonable doubt. And I know not why we should expect that the evidence of a revelation should be such, as universally to compel the immediate assent of all to whom it is offered. To me it seems much more likely that it should be so adjusted, as to be a kind of touchstone to the tempers and characters of men; capable indeed of giving ample satisfaction to the diligent and candid inquirer, yet attended with some circumstances, from whence the captious and perverse might take occasion to cavil and object. Such might we suppose the evidence of a revelation would be; and such, it is maintained, that of Christianity is. The teachers of it say, and undertake to prove, that it was thus introduced, thus established, and thus transmitted; and we trust that this is a strong presumption in its favour: especially as we can add,

4. "That the main doctrines contained in the gospel, are of such a nature as we might in general suppose those of a divine revelation would be, rational, practical, and sublime."

One would imagine, that in a revelation of a religion from God, the great principles of natural religion should be clearly asserted, and strongly maintained: such, I mean, as the existence, the unity, the perfection, and the providence of God; the essential and immutable difference between moral good and evil; the obligation we are under to the various branches of virtue, whether human, social, or divine; the value and immortality of the soul; and the rewards and punishments of a future state. One would easily conclude, that all these particulars must be contained in it; and that, upon the whole, it should appear calculated to form men's minds to a proper temper, rather than to amuse them with curious speculations.

It might indeed be further supposed, and probably concluded, that such a revelation would contain some things which could not have been learned from the highest improvements of natural light: and considering the infinite and unfathomable nature of the blessed God, it would be more than probable that many things might be hinted at and referred to which our feeble faculties should not be able fully to comprehend. Yet we should expect to find these introduced in a practical view, as directing us to duties before unknown, or suggesting powerful motives to make us resolute and constant in the discharge of the rest.* As for ceremonial and positive institutions, we should imagine, at least in the most perfect state of the revelation, that they should be but few, and those few plainly subservient to the great purposes of practical religion.

I shall only add, that forasmuch as pride appears to be the most reigning corruption of the human mind, and the source of numberless irregularities, it is exceeding probable, that a divine revelation should be calculated to humble the fallen creature, and bring it to a sense of its guilt and weakness; and the more evidently that tenderness appears, other things being equal, the greater reason there is to believe that the original of such a scheme is from above.

Your own thoughts have undoubtedly presented me in the application of these characters to the Christian revelation. The justice of that application I must not now illustrate at large. But I must beg leave to advance one remark, which will conclude what I have to say on this general: which is, that as the Christian system is undoubtedly worthy of God, so, considering the manner in which it is said to have been introduced, (separate from the evidence of these facts, which is afterwards to be considered,) it is extremely difficult to imagine from whom else it could have proceeded.

I will readily allow, that neither the reasonableness of its doctrines, nor the purity of its morals, will alone prove its divine original; since it is possible the reason of one man may discover that, which the reason of another approves, as being, in itself considered, either true in theory, or useful in practice. But this is not all; for in the present case it is evident, that the first teachers of Christianity professed, that they were taught it by divine revelation, and that they were empowered by God with miraculous endowments for the confirmation of it. Now if it were not indeed so as they professed, how can we account for so strange a phenomenon, as such a doctrine introduced with such pretences? If it were not from God, whence was it? from good or from evil angels or men? Wicked creatures, as our Lord strongly intimates, would never contrive and propagate so excellent a scheme; nor can we imagine that holy angels, or righteous men, would thus be found false witnesses of God, or have attempted to support the cause of religion and truth, by such impious and notorious falsehoods, as their pretensions must have been, if they were falsehoods at all.

And thus much for the first branch of the argument: If you consider the Christian scheme only in theory, it appears highly probable; since a revelation was so much needed, might so reasonably be expected, and if it were ever given, would, so far as we can judge, be thus introduced, and be in the main attended with such internal characters. And though we have not as yet expressly proved, that the gospel was introduced in such a manner, as the defenders of it assert; yet it would be strangely unaccountable, that so admirable a system of truth and duty should be advanced by the prince of darkness, and the children of wickedness; as it must have been, if the persons first employed in the propagation of it were not endowed with power from on high.

To embrace the gospel is so safe, and on the whole so comfortable, a thing, that I think a wise man would deliberately and resolutely venture his all upon it, though nothing more could be offered for its confirmation. But, blessed be God, we have a great deal more to offer in this important cause; and can add, with still greater confidence, that it is not only in theory thus probable, but,

Secondly, "That it is in fact certain, that Christianity is indeed a divine revelation."

Here I confess the chief stress is to be laid; and therefore I shall insist more largely on this branch of the argument, and endeavour, by the divine assistance, to prove the certainty of this great fact. You will naturally apprehend, that I speak only of what is commonly called a moral certainty;* but I need speak of no more; for in many cases, such kind of evidence gives the mind as ample and as rational a satisfaction, as it may find even in some supposed mathematical demonstration; since there it is possible, at least in a long deduction of particulars, for the most sagacious of mankind to fall into a mistake.

Now in order to settle this grand point as clearly as I can, I think it may be proper to prove,

I. That the books of the New Testament, as they are now in your hands, may be depended upon as written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity. And,

II. That from hence it will certainly follow, that what they assert is true, and that the religion they teach brings along with it such evidences of a divine authority, as may most justly recommend it to our acceptance.

Each of these heads might furnish out matter for many volumes; but it is my business to hint at the most obvious and important thoughts, by which they may briefly be illustrated and confirmed.

I. I am to prove to you, "that the books of the New Testament, now in your hands, were written by the first preachers and publishers of Christianity."

You see I confine the present proof to the New Testament. Not that I think the authority of the Old to be suspected, or the use of it by any means to be despised. God forbid! It is an invaluable treasure, which demands our daily delightful and thankful perusal, and is capable of being defended in a manner which I am persuaded its subtlest enemies will never be able to answer. But the nature of my present argument, and the limits of my time, oblige me at present to wave the proof of it, any further than as it is implied in, and dependent upon, what I have more immediately in view.

* Which though it amount not to strict demonstration, is every kind of evidence as suits past matters of fact, and is sufficient to make a candid and rational inquirer easy in his assent.

In the process of the discourse, though I shall studiously avoid any vain ostentation of learning, yet it will be absolutely necessary to assert some things, which cannot certainly be known, without some little acquaintance with the ancient writers. You cannot, most of you, be supposed to have formed such an acquaintance; but I take it for granted you will readily believe, that I will not "lie for God, nor talk deceitfully for him." I shall say nothing of this kind, but what I know to be contained in those writings; and you may assure yourselves, that no man of common sense, whatever his moral or religious character were, would venture in such an age as this, publicly to cite passages, as from authors in every one's hands, which he cannot prove to be contained in them.

Having premised these things, I go on to the argument; and shall advance in it by the following degrees. I shall prove,—that Christianity is an ancient religion;—that there was such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, crucified at Jerusalem about seventeen hundred years ago;—that the first preachers of his religion wrote books, which went by the name of those that now make up the volume of our New Testament;—that they are preserved in the original to the present times;—and that the translation of them, which you have, is in the main such as may be depended upon as faithful. And then I shall have clearly made out what I proposed in this first part.

1. It is certain, "that Christianity is not a new religion, but that it was maintained by great multitudes, quickly after the time in which Jesus is said to have appeared."

That there was, considerably more than sixteen hundred years ago, a body of men, who went by the name of Christians, is almost as evident, as that a race of men was then existing in the world; nor do I know, that any have ever been wild and confident enough to dispute it. If any should for argument sake question it, they might quickly be convinced by a considerable number of Christian writers, who lived in the same or in the next age,* and mention it as a thing notoriously certain, that Christianity was then of some standing in the world; some of them giving directions and exhortations to their brethren, and others forming apologies to their enemies, for which there could not otherwise have been the least foundation. We might have acquiesced in their testimony, had it been alone, but it is confirmed by that of Jews and heathens, who, by their early invectives against the Christians, do most evidently prove, that there was such a body of men in the world.—The most considerable Roman historians, who lived in this age, and wrote of it, are Tacitus and Suetonius, who both published their writings above sixteen hundred years ago; and they are always, and very justly, appealed to, as pregnant witnesses upon this occasion.—For Tacitus assures us, "that in Nero's days," who begun his reign about twenty years after the death of Christ, "there was a vast multitude of Christians, not only in Judea, but at Rome too; against whom Nero raised a persecution, attended with such circumstances of ignominy and cruelty, as moved the compassion even of their enemies;" of which number this historian evidently was.† Nay, he plainly intimates, this was not the first attempt which had been made to crush them; though this attempt was so early as we have heard.—His contemporary Suetonius, in his more concise manner, attests the same.‡—And Pliny, the intimate friend and correspondent of both, being employed in Trajan's time to persecute the Christians, writes an account of them to that emperor, which, though commonly known, must be mentioned, as it is so highly important. After having spoken very favourably of their moral character, he adds, "that many of both sexes, and of every age and rank, were infected with this superstition;" as he thinks fit to express it; "that it was got into the villages, as well as the cities; and that till he begun to put the laws in execution against them, the temples of the heathen deities were almost deserted, and hardly any could be found who would buy victims for them."§—It might be added, that Marcus Antoninus,‖ who wrote a few years after Pliny, mentions the Christians, "as examples of a resolute and obstinate contempt of death:" and it is generally supposed they are the Galileans, whom Epictetus

All these were certainly before the year 200, and some in the first century; and Barnabas and Hermas are to mention any of those called the Fathers, whose books are all lost except some fragments, preserved chiefly by that excellent writer

I shall dismiss this head with observing, that it tends greatly to the confirmation of Christianity, that each of these celebrated and ancient writers, at the same time that they attest the existence of such a body of men professing it, inform us of those extreme persecutions which they underwent, in the very infancy of their religion! a fact further apparent from the apologies addressed to their persecutors, which, whatever imperfections may attend the manner in which some of them are written, appear to me some of the most valuable remains of antiquity, (the sacred records only excepted,) especially all those of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Minutius Felix. This fundamental point is then abundantly made out; that there were vast numbers of men, very quickly after the time when Jesus is said to have appeared on earth, who professed his religion, and chose to endure the greatest extremities, rather than they would abandon it. From hence it will be easy to show,

2. "That there was certainly such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem, when Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor there."

It can never be imagined, that multitudes of people should take their name from Christ, and sacrifice their lives for their adherence to him, even in the same age in which he is said to have lived, if they had not been well assured, there was such a person. Now several of the authors I have mentioned plainly assert, that the Christians were denominated from Christ; nay, Tacitus expressly adds, "that he was put to death under Pontius Pilate, who was procurator of Judæa, in the reign of Tiberius."‡ And it is well known, that the primitive Christian apologists often appeal to the acts of Pilate,§ or the memoirs of his government, (which he, according to the custom of the procurators, transmitted to Rome,) as containing an account of these transactions: and as the appeal was made to those who had the command of public records, we may assure ourselves such testimonies were then extant. But it is a fact, which our enemies never denied; they owned it, they even gloried in it. The Jews, therefore, in some of their earliest writings since those times, call Jesus by the ignominious name of "the Man who was hanged, or crucified;" and his followers, "the servants of the crucified person."‖ And Lucian rallies them for deserting the pompous train of the heathen deities, to worship one whom he impiously calls "a crucified impostor."¶ [Spartian also assures us, that the Emperor Alexander Severus entertained such high thoughts of Christ, "that he would have admitted him into the number of his deities, and have built a temple to him, had not his pagan subjects opposed it." And Porphyry, though an inveterate enemy to Christianity, not only allowed there was such a person, but honoured him "as a most wise and pious man, approved by the gods, and taken up to heaven for his distinguished virtues."††] I might add a great deal more on this head;‡‡ but it already appears as certain as ancient history can make it, and incomparably more certain than most of the facts which it has transmitted to us, that there was at the time commonly supposed such a person as Christ, who professed himself a divine Teacher, and who gathered many disciples, by whom his religion was very soon afterwards published in the world.

3. It is also certain, "that the first publishers of this religion wrote books, which contained an account of the life and doctrine of Jesus their Master, and which went by the name of those that now make up our New Testament."

It was in the nature of things exceeding probable, that what they had seen and heard, they would declare and publish to the world in writing; considering, how common books were in the age and countries in which they taught; and of how great importance an acquaintance with the history and doctrine of Christ was, to the purposes which they so strenuously pursued. But we have much more than such a presumptive evidence.

The greatest adversaries of Christianity must grant, that we have books of great antiquity, written, some fourteen, others fifteen, and some sixteen hundred years ago;§§ in which mention is made of the life of Christ, as written by many, and especially by four of his disciples, who, by way of eminence, are called the Evangelists. Great pains have indeed been taken to prove, that some spurious pieces were published under the names of the apostles, containing the history of these things: but surely this must imply, that it was a thing known and allowed, that the apostles did write some narrations of this kind; as counterfeit coin implies some true money, which it is designed to represent. And I am sure, he must be very little acquainted with the ancient ecclesiastical writers, who does not know, that the primitive Christians made a very great difference between those writings, which we call the Canonical Books of the New Testament, and others: which plainly shows, that they did not judge of writings, merely by the names of their pretended authors, but inquired with an accuracy becoming the importance of those pretences. The result of this inquiry was, that the four Gospels, the Acts, thirteen Epistles of Paul, one of Peter, and one of John, were received upon such evidence, that Eusebius, a most accurate and early critic in these things, could not learn that they had ever been disputed;* and afterwards the remaining books of the New Testament, Hebrews, James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, Jude, and the Revelation, were admitted as genuine, and added to the rest; though some circumstances attending them rendered their authority for a while dubious. On the whole it is plain, the primitive Christians were so satisfied in the authority of these sacred books, that they speak of them, not only as credible and authentic, but as equal to the oracles of the Old Testament, as divinely inspired, as the words of the Spirit, as the law and organ of God, and as the rule of faith which cannot be contradicted without great guilt: with many other expressions of the like kind, which often occur in their discourses. To which I may add, that in some of their councils the New Testament was placed on a throne, to signify their concern, that all their controversies and actions might be determined and regulated by it.

On the whole then, you see, that the primitive church did receive certain pieces, which bore the same titles with the books of our New Testament. Now I think it is evident they were as capable of judging whether a book was written by Matthew, John, or Paul, as an ancient Roman could be of determining whether Horace, Tully, or Livy wrote those which go under their names. And I am sure the interest of the former was so much more concerned in the writings of the apostles, than that of the latter in the compositions of the poets, orators, or even their historians, that there is reason to believe, they would take much greater care to inform themselves fully in the merits of the cause and to avoid being imposed upon by artifice and fiction. Let me now show,

4. "That the books of the New Testament have been preserved in the main uncorrupted, to the present time, in the original language in which they were written."

This is a matter of vast importance, and blessed be God, it is attended with proportionable evidence; an evidence, in which the hand of Providence has indeed been remarkably seen; for I am confident, that there is no other ancient book in the world, which may so certainly, and so easily, be proved to be authentic.

And here, I will not argue merely from the piety of the primitive Christians, and the heroic resolution with which they chose to endure the greatest extremities, rather than they would deliver up their Bibles; (though that be a consideration of some evident weight;) but shall entreat you to consider the utter impossibility of corrupting them. From the first ages, they were received, and read in the churches, as a part of their public worship, just as Moses and the Prophets were in the Jewish synagogues; they were presently spread far and wide, as the boundaries of the church were increased; they were early translated into other languages, of which translations some remain to this day. Now when this was the case, how could they possibly be adulterated? Is it a thing to be supposed, or imagined, that thousands and millions of people should have come together from distant countries; and that with all their diversities of language, and customs, and I may add, of sentiments too, they should have agreed on corrupting a book, which they all acknowledged to be the rule of their faith, and their manners, and the great charter by which they held their eternal hopes. It were madness to believe it; especially when we consider what numbers of heretics appeared in the very infancy of the church, who all pretended to build their notions on Scripture, and most of them appealed to it as the final judge of controversies: now it is certain, that these different parties of professing Christians were a perpetual guard upon each other, and rendered it impossible for one party to practise grossly on the sacred books, without the discovery and the clamour of the rest.

Nor must I omit to remind you, that in every age, from the apostles' time to our own, there have been numberless quotations made from the books of the New Testament; and a multitude of commentaries in various languages, and some of very ancient date, have been written upon them; so that if the books themselves were lost, I believe they might in a great measure, if not entirely, be recovered from the writings of others. And one might venture to say, that if all the quotations, which have ever been made from all the ancient writings now remaining in Europe, were to be amassed together, the bulk of them would be by no means comparable to that of the quotations taken from the New Testament alone. So that a man might with a much better face dispute, whether the writings ascribed to Homer, Demosthenes, Virgil, or Cæsar, be in the main such as they left them; than he could question it concerning those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Peter, James, and Paul, whether they are in the main so.

I say, in the main, because we readily allow, that the hand of a printer, or of a transcriber, might chance in some places to insert one letter or word for another; and the various readings of this, as well as of all other ancient books, prove, that this has sometimes been the case. Nevertheless, those various readings are generally of so little importance, that he who can urge them as an objection against the assertion we are now maintaining, must have little judgment, or little integrity; and, indeed, after those excellent things which have been said on the subject by many defenders of Christianity, if he have read their writings, he must have little modesty too.

Since then it appears, that the books of the New Testament, as they now stand in the original, are, without any material alteration, such as they were, when they came from the hands of the persons whose names they bear; nothing remains to complete this part of the argument, but to show,

b. "That the translation of them, now in your hands, may be depended upon, as in all things most material agreeable to the original."

This is a fact, of which the generality of you are not capable of judging immediately, yet it is a matter of great importance. It is therefore a very great pleasure to me to think, what ample evidence you may find another way, to make your minds as easy on this head, as you could reasonably wish them. I mean, by the concurrent testimony of others, in circumstances in which you cannot imagine they would unite to deceive you.

There are, to be sure, very few of us, whose office it is publicly to preach the gospel, who have not examined this matter with care, and who are not capable of judging in so easy a case. I believe you have seen few in the place where I now stand, that could not have told you, as I solemnly do, that on a diligent comparison of our translation with the original, we find that of the New Testament (and I might also add, that of the Old) in the main faithful and judicious. You know, indeed, that we do not scruple on some occasions to animadvert upon it; but you also know, that these remarks affect not the fundamentals of religion, and seldom reach any further than the beauty of a figure, or at most the connexion of an argument. Nay, I can confidently say, that, to the best of my knowledge and remembrance, as there is no copy of the Greek, so neither is there any translation of the New Testament which I have seen, whether ancient or modern, how defective or faulty soever, from which all the principal facts and doctrines of Christianity might not be learnt, so far as the knowledge of them is necessary to salvation, or even to some considerable degrees of edification in piety. Nor do I except from this remark, even that most erroneous and corrupt version, published by the English Jesuits at Rheims, which is undoubtedly one of the worst that ever appeared in our language.

But I desire not, that with respect to our own translation of the New Testament, a matter of so great moment as the fidelity of it should rest on my testimony alone, or entirely on that of any of my brethren, for whose integrity and learning you may have the greatest and justest esteem. I rejoice to say, that this is a head on which we cannot possibly deceive you, if we were ever so desirous to do it. And indeed in this respect that is our advantage, which in others is our great calamity,—I mean the diversity of our religious opinions. It is certain that, wheresoever there is a body of dissenters from the public establishment, who do yet agree with their brethren of that establishment in the use of the same translation, though they are capable of examining it, and judging of it; there is as great evidence as could reasonably be desired, that such a translation is, in the main, right; for if it were in any considerable article corrupted, most of the other debates would quickly lose themselves in this: and though such dissenters had all that candour, tenderness, and respect for their fellow-christians, which I hope we shall always endeavour to maintain; yet they would, no doubt, think themselves obliged in conscience to bear a warm and loud testimony against so crying an abomination, as they would another day appear free from the guilt of a confederacy to poison the public fountains, and destroy the souls of men. But we make no complaint on this subject: we all unite in bearing our testimony to the oracles of God, as delivered in our own language. O that we were equally united in regulating our doctrine and our discipline, our worship and our practice, by them!

You see then, on the whole, how much reason there is to believe, "That the books of the New Testament, as they are now in your hands, were written by those whose names they bear, even the first preachers and publishers of Christianity." This is the grand point; and from hence it will follow by a train of easy and natural consequences, that the gospel is most certainly true: but that is a topic of argument abundantly sufficient to furnish out matter for another discourse. May God command his blessing on what has been already laid before us, that through the operation of his Spirit, it may be useful for establishing our regard to the Scripture, and for confirming our faith in that Almighty Redeemer, who is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last; whom to know is life everlasting, and in whom to believe is the great security of our eternal salvation! Amen.

SERMON XX.

THE EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY DEDUCED FROM THE NEW TESTAMENT ALLOWED TO BE GENUINE.

2 Pet. i. 16.

—We have not followed cunningly devised fables.

When we are addressing ourselves to an audience of professing Christians, I think we may reasonably take it for granted in the main course of our ministry, that they believe the truth of the gospel, and may argue with them on that supposition. To be ever laying the foundation would be the part of an unwise builder, and be greatly detrimental to your edification and comfort, and, I may add, to our own. Nevertheless, Christians, we do not desire that you should take it merely upon our word, that your religion is divine, and your Scriptures inspired. We desire, that your faith, as well as your worship, should be a reasonable service; and wish that in this respect, all the Lord's people were as prophets; that as every Christian is in his sphere set for the defence of the gospel, each might in some measure be able to assert its truth, and, if possible, to convince gainsayers. Therefore, as we are often hinting at the chief arguments on which this sacred cause is established, (established, I trust, so firmly, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against it,) so I thought it might be agreeable and useful, on this occasion, to state them a little more largely, in their proper connexion, and mutual dependence. And I choose the rather to do it, as these Sermons are especially intended for young people, who, in an age in which infidelity so much abounds, can hardly expect to pass through the world, if they are called to converse much in it, without some attacks on their faith; which may be very dangerous, if they are not provided with some armour of proof against them. It is, indeed, (as I before observed,) above all things to be desired, that the heart may be established with grace; for we are then most secure from the danger of forgetting God's precepts, when they have been the blessed means of quickening us to a divine life. Yet as other arguments have their use, and in some degree their necessity too, I shall go on briefly to propose them.

I beg therefore, that you would renew your attention, while I resume the thread of my discourse, in an entire dependence on the blessed Spirit, by whom the gospel was at first revealed and confirmed, to add success to this humble attempt for its service, and for your edification.

I am now showing you, that Christianity, which before appeared in theory probable and rational, has in fact a convincing evidence: not only that it may be, but that it certainly is, true;—as it is certain, that the New Testament, as now in your hands, is genuine;—and as it may with great evidence be argued from thence, that the gospel is a revelation from God. The first of these points I have endeavoured to prove at large; and without repeating what I said in confirmation of it, I now proceed to show,

II. "That from allowing the New Testament to be genuine, it will certainly follow, that Christianity is a divine revelation."

And here a man is, at first, ready to be lost in the multiplicity of arguments which surround him. It is very easy to find proofs; but difficult to range and dispose them in such an order, as best to illustrate and confirm each other. Now I choose to offer them in the following series, which seems to me the most natural, and perhaps may be most intelligible to you.

The authors of the books contained in the New Testament were capable of judging concerning the truth of the facts they attested;—their character, so far as we can judge of it by their writings, renders them worthy of regard;—and they were under no temptation to attempt to impose on the world by such a story as they have given us, if it had been false: so that, considering all things, there is no reason to believe they would attempt it:—but if they had, they must probably have perished in the attempt, and could never have gained credit in the world, had their testimony been false.—Nevertheless, it is certain in fact, that they did gain credit, and succeed in a most amazing manner against all opposition.—It is certain, therefore, that the facts they assert were true; and if they were true, then it was reasonable for their contemporaries, and is reasonable for us, to receive the gospel as a divine revelation;—especially, if we consider what has happened in the world for the confirmation of it, since it was first propagated by them. This is the conclusion to which I was to lead you; and I beg you would seriously consider each of the steps by which we arrive at it.

1. It is exceedingly evident, "that the writers of the New Testament certainly knew, whether the facts they asserted were true or false."

And this they must have known for this plain reason; because they tell us, they did not trust merely to the report, even of persons whom they thought most credible; but were present themselves when several of the most important facts happened, and so received them on the testimony of their own senses. On this St. John in his Epistle lays a very great and reasonable stress: That which we have seen with our eyes, and that not only by a sudden glance, but which we have attentively looked upon, and which even our hands have handled of the word of life, i. e. of Christ and his gospel,—declare we unto you.

Let the common sense of mankind judge here. Did not Matthew and John certainly know, whether they had personally and familiarly conversed with Jesus of Nazareth, or not? whether he had chosen them for his constant attendants and apostles? whether they had seen him heal the sick, dispossess devils, and raise the dead? and whether they themselves had received from him such miraculous endowments, as they say he bestowed upon them? Did not they know, whether he fell into the hands of his enemies, and was publicly put to death, or not? Did not John know, whether he saw him expiring on the cross or not? and whether he received from him the dying charge which he records? Did he not know, whether he saw him wounded in the side with a spear, or not? and whether he did, or did not, see that effusion of blood and water, which was an infallible argument of his being really dead! concerning which, it being so material a circumstance, he adds, "he that saw it bare record, and he knoweth that he saith true;" i. e. that it was a case in which he could not possibly be deceived. And with regard to Christ's resurrection, did he not certainly know, whether he saw our Lord again and again? and whether he handled his body, that he might be sure it was not a mere phantom! What one circumstance of his life could he certainly know, if he were mistaken in this?

Did not Luke know, whether he was in the ship with Paul, when that extraordinary wreck happened, by which they were thrown ashore on the island of Malta? Did he not know whether, while they were lodged together in the governor's house, Paul miraculously healed one of the family, and many other diseased persons in the island, as he positively asserts he did.

Did not Paul certainly know, whether Christ appeared to him on the way to Damascus, or not! whether he was blind, and afterwards on the prayer of a fellow-disciple received his sight! or was that a circumstance in which there could be room for mistake? Did he not know, whether he received such extraordinary revelations, and extraordinary powers, as to be able, by the imposition of his hands, or by the words of his mouth, to work miracles, and even to convey supernatural endowments to others!

To add no more, did not Peter know, whether he saw the glory of Christ's transfiguration, and heard that voice to which he so expressly refers, when he says in the text, We have not followed cunningly devised fables,—but were eye-witnesses of his majesty,—when there came such a voice to him;—and this voice we heard.

Now Matthew, John, Luke, Paul, and Peter, are by far the most considerable writers of the New Testament; and I am sure, when you reflect on these particulars, you must own, that there are few historians, ancient or modern, that could so certainly judge of the truth of the facts they have related. You may perhaps think I have enlarged too much in stating so clear a case: but you will please to remember, it is the foundation of the whole argument; and that this branch of it alone cuts off infidels from that refuge, which I believe they would generally choose, that of pleading the apostles were enthusiasts; and leaves them silent, unless they will say they were impostors: for you evidently see, that could we suppose these facts to be false, they could by no means pretend an involuntary mistake, but must, in the most criminal and aggravated sense, as Paul himself expresses it, be found false witnesses of God. But how unreasonable it would be to charge them with so notorious a crime, will in part appear, if we consider,

2. "That the character of these writers, so far as we can judge by their works, seems to render them worthy of regard, and leaves no room to imagine they intended to deceive us."

I shall not stay to show at large, that they appear to have been persons of natural sense, and at the time of their writing, of a composed mind; for I verily believe no man that ever read the New Testament with attention, could believe they were idiots or madmen. Let the discourses of Christ in the Evangelists, of Peter and Paul in the Acts, as well as many passages in the Epistles, be perused; and I will venture to say, he who is not charmed with them, must be a stranger to all the justest rules of polite criticism: but he who suspects, that the writers wanted common sense, must himself be most evidently destitute of it; and he who can suspect, they might possibly be distracted, must himself, in this instance at least, be just as mad as he imagines them to have been.

It was necessary however just to touch upon this; because unless we are satisfied, that a person be himself in what he writes, we cannot pretend to determine his character from his writings. Having premised this, I must entreat you, as you peruse the New Testament, to observe what evident marks it bears, of simplicity and integrity, of piety and benevolence; which when you have observed, you will find them pleading the cause of its authors, with a resistless, though a gentle, eloquence, and powerfully persuading the mind, that men who were capable of writing so excellently well, are not, without the strongest evidence, to be suspected of acting so detestably ill, as we must suppose they did, if in this solemn manner they were carrying on an imposture, in such circumstances as attended the case before us. For,

(1.) The manner in which they tell their amazing story, is most happily adapted to gain our belief. For as they tell it with a great detail of circumstances, which would by no means be prudent in legendary writers, because it leaves so much the more room for confutation; so they also do it in the most easy and natural manner. There is no air of declamation and harangue; nothing that looks like artifice and design; no apologies, no encomiums, no characters, no reflections, no digressions: but the facts are recounted with great simplicity, just as they seem to have happened; and those facts are left to speak for themselves, and their great Author. It is plain, that the rest of these writers, as well as the apostle Paul, did not affect excellency of speech, or flights of eloquence, (as the phrase signifies,) but determined to know nothing, though amongst the most learned and polite, save Jesus Christ, even him that was crucified: a conduct that is the more to be admired, when we consider how extraordinary a theme theirs was, and with what abundant variety of most pathetic declamation it would easily have furnished any common writer; so that one would really wonder how they could forbear it. But they rightly judged, that a vain affectation of ornament, when recording such a story as of their own knowledge, might perhaps have brought their sincerity into question, and so have rendered the cross of Christ of none effect.

(2.) Their integrity does likewise evidently appear in the freedom with which they mention those circumstances, which might have exposed their Master and themselves to the greatest contempt, amongst prejudiced and inconsiderate men; such as they knew they must generally expect to meet with.—As to their Master, they scruple not to own, that his country was infamous, his birth and education mean, and his life indigent; that he was most disdainfully rejected by the rulers, and accused of sabbath-breaking, blasphemy, and sedition; that he was reviled by the populace as a debauchee, a lunatic, and a demoniac; and at last, by the united rage of both rulers and people, was publicly executed as the vilest of malefactors, with all imaginable circumstances of ignominy, scorn, and abhorrence: nor do they scruple to own that terror and distress of spirit into which he was thrown by his sufferings, though this was a circumstance at which some of the heathens took the greatest offence, as utterly unworthy so excellent and divine a person. —As to themselves, the apostles readily confess, not only the meanness of their original employments, and the scandals of their former life; but their prejudices, their follies, and their faults, after Christ had honoured them with so holy a calling: they acknowledge their slowness of apprehension under so excellent a teacher, their unbelief, their cowardice, their ambition, their rash zeal, and their foolish contentions. So that, on the whole, they seem every where to forget, that they are writing of themselves, and appear not at all solicitous about their own reputation, but only that they might represent the matter just as it was, whether they went through honour or dishonour, through evil report or good report. Nor is this all; for,

(3.) It is certain, that there are in their writings the most genuine traces, not only of a plain and honest, but a most pious and devout, a most benevolent and generous, disposition. These appear especially in the epistolary parts of the New Testament, where indeed we should most reasonably expect to find them: and of these I may confidently affirm, that the greater progress any one has made in love to God, in zeal for his glory, in a compassionate and generous concern for the present and future happiness of mankind; the more humble, and candid, and temperate, and pure, he is, the more ardently he loves truth, and the more steadily he is determined to suffer the greatest extremity in its defence; in a word, the more his heart is weaned from the present world, and the more it is fired with the prospects of a glorious immortality, the more pleasure will he take in reading those writings, the more will he relish the spirit which discovers itself in them; and find, that as face answers to face in water, so do the traces of piety and goodness which appear there, answer to those which a good man feels in his own soul. Nay, I will add, that the warm and genuine workings of that excellent and holy temper which every where discovers itself in the New Testament, have for many ages been the most effectual means of spreading a spirit of virtue and piety in the world; and what of it is to be found in these degenerate days, seems principally owing to these incomparable and truly divine writings.

Where then there are such genuine marks of an excellent character, not only in laboured discourses, but in epistolary writings, and those sometimes addressed to particular and intimate friends, to whom the mind naturally opens itself with the greatest freedom, surely no candid and equitable judge would lightly believe them all to be counterfeit; or would imagine, without strong proof, that persons who breathe such exalted sentiments of virtue and piety, should be guilty of any notorious wickedness; and in proportion to the degree of enormity and aggravation attending such a supposed crime, it may justly be expected, that the evidence of their having really committed it, should be unanswerably strong and convincing.

Now it is most certain, on the principles laid down above, that if the testimony of the apostles was false, they must have acted as detestable and villanous a part as one can easily conceive. To be found (as the apostle with his usual energy expresses it) false witnesses of God in any single instance, and solemnly declare him miraculously to have done, what we know in our consciences was never done at all, would be an audacious degree of impiety, to which none but the most abandoned of mankind could arrive. Yet, if the testimony of the apostles was false, as we have proved they could not be themselves mistaken in it, this must have been their conduct; and that, not in one single instance only, but in a thousand. Their life must, in effect, be one continued and perpetual scene of perjury; and all the most solemn actions of it, (in which they were speaking to God, or speaking of him as the God and Father of Christ, from whom they received their mission and powers,) must be a most profane and daring insult on all the acknowledged perfections of his nature.

And the inhumanity of such a conduct would, on the whole, have been equal to its impiety. For it was deceiving men in their most important interests, and persuading them to venture their whole future happiness on the power and fidelity of one, whom, on this supposition, they knew to have been an impostor, and justly to have suffered a capital punishment for his crimes.

It would have been great guilt, to have given the hearts and devotions of men so wrong a turn, even though they had found magistrates ready to espouse and establish, yea, and to enforce, the religion they taught. But to labour to propagate it in the midst of the most vigorous and severe opposition from them, must equally enhance the guilt and folly of the undertaking: for by this means they made themselves accessary to the ruin of thousands; and all the calamities, which fell on such proselytes, or even on their remotest descendants, for the sake of Christianity, would be chargeable on these first preachers of it. The blood of honest, yea, and (supposing them, as you must, to have been involuntarily deceived,) of pious, worthy, and heroic persons, who might otherwise have been the greatest blessings to the public, would, in effect, be crying for vengeance against them; and the distresses of the widows and orphans, which those martyrs might leave behind them, would join to swell the account.

So that, on the whole, the guilt of those malefactors, who are from time to time the victims of public justice, even for robbery, murder, or treason, is small, when compared with that which we have now been supposing: and corrupt as human nature is, it appears to me utterly improbable, twelve men should be found, I will not say, in one little nation, but even on the whole face of the earth, who could be capable of entering into so black a confederacy, on any terms whatsoever.

And now, in this view of the case, make a serious pause, and compare with it what we have just been saying of the character of the apostles of Jesus, so far as an indifferent person could conjecture it from their writings; and then say, whether you can in your hearts believe them to have been these abandoned wretches, at once the reproach and astonishment of mankind? You cannot surely believe such things of any; and much less of them, unless it shall appear, they were in some peculiar circumstances of strong temptation; and what those circumstances could be, it is difficult even for imagination to conceive.

But history is so far from suggesting any unthought-of fact to help our imagination on this head, that it bears strongly the contrary way; and hardly any part of my work is easier, than to show,

3. "That they were under no temptation to forge a story of this kind, or to publish it to the world, knowing it to be false."

They could reasonably expect no gain, no reputation, by it: but on the contrary, supposing it an imposture, they must, with the most ordinary share of prudence, have foreseen infamy and ruin, as the certain consequences of attempting it. For the grand foundation of their scheme was, that Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified at Jerusalem by the Jewish rulers, was the Son of God, and the Lord of all things. I appeal to your consciences, whether this looks at all like the contrivance of artful and designing men. It was evidently charging upon the princes of their country the most criminal and aggravated murder, indeed, all things considered, the most enormous act of wickedness which the sun had ever seen. They might therefore depend upon it, that these rulers would immediately employ all their art and power to confute their testimony, and to destroy their persons. Accordingly one of them was presently stoned; and another quickly after beheaded; and most of the rest were scattered abroad into strange cities, where they would be sure to be received with great prejudices, raised against them amongst the Jews by reports from Jerusalem,* and vastly strengthened by their expectations of a temporal Messiah, expectations, which as the apostles knew by their own experience, it was exceeding difficult to root out of men's minds; expectations, which would render the doctrine of Christ crucified, an insuperable stumbling-block to the Jews.

* I do not here mention Philo Judæus, as speaking of "an embassy from the Jews in his early days, to their brethren in all quarters of the world, exhorting them to resist the progress of Christianity." For though Bishop Atterbury asserts, that there is such a passage, Serm. vol. i. p. 112. I have never been able to find or to hear of it, and therefore am ready to believe, it was a very pardonable error in his Lordship's memory, and that the passage he intended to refer to, was a very celebrated one in Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew; in which he expressly asserts such a fact, as a thing about the integrity and good sense would never have committed, had he not certainly known it to be true. For he addresses the learned Jew, with whom he was disputing, in these memorable words, "You were so far from repenting of the crime you had committed, in crucifying Christ, that you sent chosen men of the most distinguished character all over the world, representing the Christians as an atheistical sect, and charging us with those things which the ignorant heathens object against us." Justin Mart. Dialog. cum Tryph. pag. 171. Thus ——Eusebius, and Origen, have both mentioned the same fact, which is in itself very probable, and there may possibly be some reference to it Acts xxviii.

Nor could they expect a better reception amongst the Gentiles, with whom their business was to persuade them to renounce the gods of their ancestors, and to depend on a person who had died the death of a malefactor and a slave; to persuade them to forego the pompous idolatries in which they had been educated, and all the sensual indulgences with which their religion (if it might be called a religion) was attended, to worship one invisible God, through one Mediator, in the most plain and simple manner; and to receive a set of precepts, most directly calculated to control and restrain, not only the enormities of men's actions, but the irregularities of their hearts. A most difficult undertaking! And to engage them to this, they had no other arguments to bring but such as were taken from the views of an invisible state of happiness or misery, of which they asserted their crucified Jesus to be the supreme disposer; who should another day dispense his blessings, or his vengeance, as the gospel had been embraced or rejected. Now, could it be imagined that men would easily be persuaded, merely on the credit of their affirmation, or in compliance with their importunity, to believe things, which to their prejudiced minds would appear so improbable, and to submit to impositions, to their corrupt inclinations so insupportable? And if they could not persuade them to it, what could the apostles then expect? What, but to be insulted as fools or madmen, by one sort of people; and, by another, to be persecuted with the most savage and outrageous cruelty, as blasphemers of the gods, as seducers of the people, and as disturbers of the public peace? All which we know accordingly happened: nay, they assure us, that their Lord had often warned them of it; and that they themselves expected it, and thought it necessary to admonish their followers to expect it too: and it appears, that far from drawing back upon that account, as they would surely have done if they had been governed by secular motives, they became so much the more zealous and courageous, and encouraged each other to resist even to blood. Now, as this is a great evidence of the integrity and piety of their character, and thus illustrates the former head; so it serves to the purpose now immediately in view, i. e. it proves how improbable it is, that any person of common sense should engage in an imposture, from which (as many have justly observed) they could, on their own principles, have nothing to expect, but ruin in this world, and damnation in the next. When, therefore, we consider and compare their character and their circumstances, it appears utterly improbable on various accounts, that they would have attempted in this article to impose upon the world. But suppose, that in consequence of some unaccountable, as well as undiscoverable, frenzy, they had ventured on the attempt, it is easy to show,

4. "That, humanly speaking, they must quickly have perished in it, and their foolish cause must have died with them, without ever gaining any credit in the world."

One may venture to say this in general, on the principles which I before laid down. But it appears still more evident, when we consider the nature of the fact they asserted, in conjunction with the methods they took to engage men to believe it: methods which, had the apostles been impostors, must have had the most direct tendency to ruin both their scheme and themselves.

(1.) Let us a little more particularly reflect on the nature of that grand fact, the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Christ; which as I observed, was the great foundation of the Christian scheme, as first exhibited by the apostles.—The resurrection of a dead man, and his ascension into, and abode in, the upper world, was so strange a thing, that a thousand objections would immediately be raised against it; and some extraordinary proof would justly be required as a balance to them. Now I wish the rejecters of the gospel would set themselves to invent some hypothesis, which should have any appearance of probability, to show how such an amazing story should ever gain credit in the world, if it had not some very convincing proof. Where, and when, could it first begin to be received? Was it in the same, or a succeeding, age? Was it at Jerusalem, the spot of ground on which it is said to have happened, or in Greece, or Italy, or Asia, or Africa? You may change the scene, and the time, as you please; but you cannot change the difficulty.

Take it in a parallel instance. Suppose twelve men in London were now to affirm, that a person executed there as a malefactor in a public manner, a month or six weeks ago, or if you please a year, or five, or ten years since, (for it is much the same,) was a prophet sent from God with extraordinary powers, that he was raised from the dead, that they conversed with him after his revival, and at last saw him taken up into heaven: would their united testimony make them be believed there?—Or suppose them, if you please, to disperse, and that one or two of them should come hither, and go on to more distant places, suppose Leicester, Nottingham, or York, and tell their story there: and that others were to carry it over to Paris, or Amsterdam, or to Vienna, or Madrid: could they expect any more credit with us, or with them; or hope for any thing better, than to be looked upon as lunatics, and treated as such?—And if they should go into other places, and attempt to mend their scheme, by saying their master was put to death one hundred, or two hundred, years ago, when there could be no historical evidence of it discovered, and no proof given but their own confident assertion; would they remove, or would they not rather increase, the difficulty?—Or would they, in any of these cases, gain credit by the most dexterous tricks of legerdemain, of which you cannot suppose them masters? Especially if they should undertake, in consequence of such supposed facts, to engage men to renounce the religion in which they had been educated; to deny themselves in their dearest passions, and most important worldly interests; and even, probably, to hazard their liberties and their lives, in dependence on a future reward, to be received in a place and state, which no man living on earth had ever seen or known? You would readily allow this to be an unsupposable case: and why should you suppose it to have happened sixteen or seventeen hundred years ago? You may assure yourselves, that the reason and the passions of mankind were then as strong as they are now.—But let us a little more particularly consider,

22. where the Jews at Rome say, "As concerning this sect, we [illegible] we know that it is every where spoken against."

(2.) The manner in which the apostles undertook to prove the truth of their testimony to this fact; and it will evidently appear, that instead of confirming their scheme, it must have been sufficient utterly to have overthrown it, had it been in itself the most probable imposture that the wit of man could ever have contrived.—You know, they did not merely assert, that they had seen miracles wrought by this Jesus, but that he had endowed themselves with a variety of miraculous powers. And these they undertook to display, not in such idle and useless tricks as sleight of hand might perform, but in such solid and important works, as appeared worthy a divine interposition, and entirely superior to human power: restoring, as they pretend, sight to the blind, soundness to lepers, activity to the lame, and in some instances, life to the dead. Nor were these things undertaken in a corner, in a circle of friends or dependants; nor were they said to be wrought on such, as might be suspected of being confederates in the fraud: but were done often in the public streets, in the sight of enemies, on the persons of such, as were utter strangers to the apostles, but sometimes well known to neighbours and spectators, as having long laboured under these calamities, to human skill utterly incurable. Would impostors have made such pretensions as these? or if they had, must they not immediately have been exposed and ruined?

Nor is there any room at all to object, that perhaps the apostles might not undertake to do those things on the spot, but only assert they had done them elsewhere: for even then, it would have been impossible they should have gained credit; and they would have seemed the less credible, on account of such a pretence. Whatever appearances there might have been of gravity, integrity, and piety, in the conversation of Peter, (for instance,) very few, especially few that had known but little of him, would have taken it upon his word, that he saw Jesus raise Lazarus from the dead at Bethany: but fewer yet would have believed it upon his affirmation, had it been ever so solemn, that he had himself raised Dorcas at Joppa; unless he had done some extraordinary work before them, correspondent at least, if not equal, to that. You will easily think of invincible objections, which otherwise might have been made; and undoubtedly, the more such assertions had been multiplied, every new person, and scene, and fact, had been an additional advantage given to the enemy, to have detected and confuted the whole scheme, which Peter and his associates had thus endeavoured to establish.

But to come still closer to the point: If the New Testament be genuine, (as I have already proved it,) then it is certain, that the apostles pretend to have wrought miracles in the very presence of those to whom their writings were addressed; nay more, they profess likewise to have conferred those miraculous gifts, in some considerable degrees, on others, even on the very persons to whom they write; and they appeal to their consciences as to the truth of it. And could there possibly be room for delusion here? It is exceedingly remarkable to this purpose, that Paul makes this appeal to the Corinthians, and Galatians, when there were amongst them some persons disaffected to him, who were taking all opportunities to sink his character, and destroy his influence: and could they have wished for a better opportunity than such an appeal? an appeal, which, had not the fact it supposed been certain, far from recovering those that were wavering in their esteem, must have been sufficient utterly to disgust his most cordial and steady friends.—And the same remark may be applied to the advices and reproofs, which the apostle there gives, relating to the use and abuse of their spiritual gifts; which had been most notoriously absurd, and even ridiculous, had not the Christians to whom he wrote been really possessed of them. And these gifts were so plainly supernatural, that (as it has often been observed) if it be allowed, that miracles can prove a divine revelation, and that the first epistle to the Corinthians be genuine, (of which, by the way, there is at least as pregnant evidence, as that any part of the New Testament is so,)* then it follows by a sure and easy consequence, that Christianity is true. Nevertheless, other arguments are not to be forgot in this survey.—And therefore, as I have proved under this head, that had the testimony of the apostles been false, it is not to be imagined that they could have gained credit at all; and especially, when they had put the proof of their cause on such a footing as we are sure they did; I am now to show you,

* I cannot but look upon it as a kind and remarkable [illegible]

5. "That it is certain in fact, that the apostles did gain early credit, and succeeded in a most wonderful manner;" from whence it will follow, that their testimony was true.

That the apostles did indeed gain credit in the world, is evident, from what I before offered to prove the early prevalence of Christianity in it; and may further be confirmed, from many passages in the New Testament. And here, I insist not so much on express historical testimonies, though some of them are very remarkable; especially that of the brethren at Jerusalem, who speak of many myriads of believing Jews assembled at the feast of Pentecost: but I argue from the epistles written to several churches, which plainly prove, that there were congregations of Christians in Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, Colosse, Thessalonica, Philippi, Laodicea, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Crete, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, and many other places; insomuch that one of the apostles could say, that Christ had so wrought by him, to make the Gentiles obedient, not only in word or profession, but in deed too, that from Jerusalem, even round about unto Illyricum, he had fully preached the gospel of Christ, or as the word imports,* had accomplished the purposes of it. And there is a great deal of reason, both from the nature of the thing, and from the testimony of ancient history, to believe, that others of the apostles had considerable success elsewhere: so that Paul might with reason apply to them and their doctrine, what is originally spoken of the luminaries of heaven, and the instruction they communicate, "Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world."

So great was the number of those, who were proselyted to Christianity by the preaching of the apostles: and we have all imaginable reason to believe, that there were none of all these proselytes, but what were fully persuaded of the truth of the testimony they bore; for otherwise, no imaginable reason can be given for their entering themselves into such a profession. The apostles had no secular terrors to affright them, no secular rewards to bribe them, † no dazzling eloquence to enchant them: on the contrary, all these were in a powerful manner pleading against the apostles; yet their testimony was received, and their new converts were so thoroughly satisfied with the evidence which they gave them of their mission, that they encountered great persecutions, and cheerfully ventured estate, liberty, and life itself, on the truth of the facts they asserted; as plainly appears from many passages in the epistles, which none can think the apostles would ever have written if these first Christians had not been in a persecuted condition.

Nor will it signify any thing to object, that most of these converts were persons of a low rank, and ordinary education, who therefore might be more easily imposed upon than others: for (not to mention Sergius Paulus, Dionysius the Areopagite, or the domestics of Cæsar's household, with others of superior stations in life) it is sufficient to remind you that, as I have largely shown, the apostles did not put their cause on the issue of laboured arguments, in which the populace might quickly have been entangled and lost, but on such plain facts, as they might judge of, as easily, and surely, as any others; indeed on what they themselves saw, and in part, too, on what they felt.

Now I apprehend, this might be sufficient to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion. You have seen, that as there is no reason to believe, that the apostles, who certainly knew the truth, would have attempted a fraud of this kind;—so if they had attempted it, they could not possibly have succeeded;—nevertheless, they did succeed in a very remarkable manner;—from whence it plainly follows, that what they testified was true.

And now then, after this, the reasonableness of receiving the gospel, on admitting the truth of what they testified concerning Christ, is an easy consequence. Yet some things are to be offered under this head, which are of great weight, and would not so conveniently have fallen under any of the former; and some considerable additional evidence to the truth of Christianity arises, from what has happened in the world since its first propagation. And therefore I choose rather to make a discourse on these, with the improvement of the whole, than to throw together the hints of them, in so hasty a manner as I must do, should I attempt to despatch the subject in this discourse, the just limits of which I have already transgressed, lest the great chain of the argument should be broken.

this purpose, that there is still extant an Epistle of Clemens Romanus to the Church at Corinth, probably written before the year of Christ 70, in which he plainly refers to 1 Cor. i. 12. in what he cites from "an epistle of Paul written to them by the Spirit at his first preaching the gospel among them." Clem. Epist. 1 ad Cor. § 47.

* Rom. xv. 19.

† As for the distribution of goods in Judea, it is plain it was peculiar to that time and country, and the extraordinary possessions, which from the very infancy of Christianity prevailed there, was more than an equivalent for any advantage, which the poorer of the people could gain by it. I did not therefore think it necessary to mention it.

SERMON XXI.

ADDITIONAL EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY, AND REFLECTIONS ON THE WHOLE.

2 Pet. i. 16.

——We have not followed cunningly devised fables.

As I had before proved the books of the New Testament to be genuine, I proceeded in my last discourse to argue from thence the certain truth of the Christian revelation; and we have made some considerable progress in the argument.

The matter in short stands thus:—The authors of the New Testament certainly knew whether the facts they asserted were true or false; so that they could not themselves be deceived:—neither can we think they would attempt to deceive others, since they appear by their manner of writing, to have been persons of great integrity and goodness;—and it is likewise evident, they could have no temptation to attempt a fraud of this nature:—however, if they had attempted it, we cannot imagine they could have gained credit in the world, if the facts they asserted had not been true:—nevertheless they did gain credit in a very remarkable manner; from whence it plainly follows, that those facts were true.—Now I am to show further, to complete the proof of our grand proposition,

6. "That admitting the facts which they testified concerning Christ to be true, then it was reasonable for their contemporaries, and is reasonable for us, to receive the gospel which they have transmitted to us, as a divine revelation."

The great thing they asserted was, that Jesus was the Christ, and that he was proved to be so,—by prophecies accomplished in him,—and by miracles wrought by him, and by others in his name. Let us attend to each of these, and I am persuaded we shall find them no contemptible arguments: but must be forced to acknowledge, that the premises being established, the conclusion most easily and necessarily follows: and this conclusion, that Jesus is the Christ, taken in all its extent, is an abstract of the gospel revelation, and therefore is sometimes put for the whole of it.

The apostles, especially when disputing with the Jews, did frequently argue from "the prophecies of the Old Testament;" in which, they say, many things were expressly foretold, which were most literally and exactly fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. Now, greatly to the evidence, confirmation, and advantage of Christianity, so it is, that these prophecies are to this day extant in their original language: and this, in the hands of a people most implacably averse to the gospel: so that an attentive reader may still, in a great measure, satisfy himself as to the validity of the argument drawn from them.

On searching these ancient and important records, we find, not only in the general, that God intended to raise up for his people an illustrious deliverer, who, amongst other glorious titles, is sometimes called the Messiah, or the Anointed One; but we are more particularly told, that this great event should happen before the government ceased in the tribe of Judah; while the second temple was standing; and a little before its destruction, about four hundred and ninety years after a command given to rebuild Jerusalem; which was probably issued out in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or at least within a few years before or after it. It is predicted, that he should be the seed of Abraham, born of a virgin, of the house of David, in the town of Bethlehem; that he should be anointed with an extraordinary effusion of the divine Spirit, in virtue of which, he should not only be a perfect and illustrious example of universal holiness and goodness, but should also perform many extraordinary and beneficial miracles; nevertheless, that, for want of external pomp and splendour, he should be rejected and insulted by the Jews, and at length be cut off and slain by them. It is added, that he should arise from the dead before his body should be corrupted in the grave; and should be received up to heaven, and there seated at the right hand of God; from whence he should in a wonderful manner pour out his Spirit on his followers; in consequence of which, though the body of the Jewish people perished in their obstinate opposition to him, yet the Gentiles should be brought to the knowledge of the true God, and a kingdom established amongst them, which from small beginnings should spread itself to the ends of the earth, and continue to the remotest ages.

Besides these most material circumstances, there were several others relating to him, which were either expressly foretold, or at least hinted at; all which, with those already mentioned, had so evident an accomplishment in Jesus, (allowing the truth of the facts which the apostles testified concerning him,) that we have no reason to wonder that they should receive the word with all readiness, who searched the Scriptures daily, whether these things were so predicted there, as the apostles affirmed. For I am persuaded, that no wise and religious person could imagine, that God would permit an impostor to arise, in whom so great a variety of predictions, delivered by so many different persons, and in so many distant ages, should have an exact accomplishment.

When the apostles were preaching to heathens, it is indeed true, that they generally waved the argument from prophecy, because they were not capable judges of it: but then they insist on another, which might as soon captivate their belief, and as justly vindicate it, I mean "the miracles performed by Christ, and those commissioned and influenced by him." Many of these were of such a nature as not to admit of any artifice or deceit, especially that most signal one of his resurrection from the dead, which I may call a miracle performed by, as well as upon, Christ; because he so expressly declares, that he had himself a power to resume his life at pleasure. The apostles well knew this was a fact of such a nature, that they who believed this would never doubt of the rest: they therefore often single this out, and lay the whole stress of their cause upon it. This they proved to be true, by their own testimony miraculously confirmed; and in proving this they established Christianity on an impregnable rock. For I may safely refer it to any of you to judge, whether it is an imaginable thing that God should raise the dead body of an impostor; especially when he had solemnly appealed to such a resurrection, as the grand proof of his mission, and had expressly fixed the very day on which it was to happen.

I persuade myself you are convinced by all this, that they who on the apostles' testimony believed, that the prophecies of the Old Testament were accomplished in Jesus, and that God bore witness to him by miracles, and raised him from the dead, had abundant reason to believe, that the doctrine which Christ taught was divine, and his gospel a revelation from heaven. And if they had reason to admit this conclusion, then it is plain that we, who have such satisfactory evidence, on the one hand, that the testimony of the apostles was credible, and on the other, that this was the substance of it, have reason also to admit this grand inference from it, and to embrace the gospel as a faithful saying, and as well worthy of all acceptation. This is the thing I was attempting to prove; and here I should end the argument, were it not for the confirmation it may receive from some additional considerations, which could not properly be introduced under any of the preceding heads. I add therefore,

7. In the last place, "that the truth of the gospel has received further, and very considerable, confirmation, from what has happened in the world since it was first published."

And here I must desire you more particularly to consider,—on the one hand, what God has been doing to establish it,—and on the other, the methods which its enemies have been taking to destroy it.

(1.) Consider, "what God has been doing to confirm the gospel since its first publication;" and you will find it a further evidence of its divine original.

I might here argue at large, from its surprising propagation in the world;—from the miraculous powers, with which not only the apostles, but succeeding preachers of the gospel, and other converts, were endowed;—from the accomplishment of prophecies recorded in the New Testament;—and from the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, notwithstanding the various difficulties and persecutions through which they have passed.

I might particularly urge, in confirmation of the truth of Christianity, "the wonderful success with which it was attended, and the surprising propagation of the gospel in the world."

I have before endeavoured, under a former head, to show you, that the gospel met with so favourable a reception in the world as evidently proved, that its first publishers were capable of producing such evidence of its truth, as an imposture could not admit. But now I carry the remark further, and assert, that considering the circumstances of the case, it is amazing that even truth itself, under so many disadvantages, should have so illustrious a triumph; and that its wonderful success does evidently argue such an extraordinary interposition of God in its favour, as may justly be called a miraculous attestation to it.

There was not only one of a family, or two of a city, taken, and brought to Zion; but so did the Lord hasten it in its appointed time, that "a little one became a thousand, and a small one a strong nation." And as the apostles themselves were honoured with very remarkable success, so this divine seed was propagated so fast in the next age, that Pliny testifies "he found the heathen temples in Achaia almost deserted:"* and Tertullian afterwards boasts, "That all places but those temples were filled with Christians; so that, were they only to withdraw, cities and provinces would be depopulated."† Nor did the gospel only triumph thus within the boundaries of the Roman empire; for long before Tertullian was born, Justin Martyr, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, which seems to have been written not much above one hundred years after Christ's death, declares, "That there was no nation of men, whether Greeks or barbarians, not excepting those savages that wandered in clans from one region to another, and had no fixed habitation, who had not learned to offer prayers and thanksgivings to the Father and Maker of all, in the name of Jesus who was crucified."‡

Now how can we account for such a scene as this, but by saying, that the hand of the Lord was with the first preachers of the gospel, and therefore such multitudes believed and turned unto the Lord! How had it been possible that so small a fountain should presently have swelled into a mighty river, and even have covered the face of the earth, had it not sprung from the sanctuary of God, and been rendered thus triumphant by his almighty arm?

* Plin. Epist. x. 97. † Tertul. Apolog. cap. xxxvii.
‡ Justin. Mart. pag. 308. Edit. Thirlb.

Had this new religion, so directly contrary to all the prejudices of education, been contrived to soothe men's vices, to assert their errors, to defend their superstitions, or to promote their secular interests, we might easily have accounted for its prevalence in the world. Had its preachers been very profound philosophers, or polite and fashionable orators, many might have been charmed, at least for a while, to follow them: or had the princes and potentates of the earth declared themselves its patrons, and armed their legions for its defence and propagation, multitudes might have been terrified into the profession, though not a soul could by such means have been rationally persuaded to the belief of it. But without some such advantages as these, we can hardly conceive how any new religion should so strangely prevail; even though it had crept into the world in its darkest ages and most barbarous countries; and though it had been gradually proposed in the most artful manner, with the finest veil industriously drawn over every part which might at first have given disgust to the beholder.

But you well know that the very reverse of all this was the case here. You know, from the apparent constitution of Christianity, that the lusts and errors, the superstitions and interests, of carnal men, would immediately rise up against it as a most irreconcilable enemy. You know, that the learning and wit of the Greeks and the Romans were early employed to overbear and ridicule it. You know that, as all the herd of heathen deities were to be discarded, the priests, who subsisted on that craft, must in interest find themselves obliged to oppose it. You know, that the princes of the earth drew the sword against it, and armed torments and death for the destruction of its followers. And yet you see that it triumphed over all, though published in ages and places of the greatest learning and refinement; and proposed, not in an ornamental and artificial manner, but with the utmost plainness; the doctrines of the cross being always avowed as its grand fundamentals, though so notorious a stumbling-block both to Jews and Gentiles; and the absolute necessity, not only of embracing Christianity, but also of renouncing all idol-worship, being insisted on immediately, and in the strongest terms, though it must make the gospel appear the most singular and unsociable religion that had ever been taught in the world.

Had one of the wits or politicians of these ages seen the apostles, and a few other plain men, who had been educated amongst the lowest of the people, as most of the first teachers of Christianity were, going out armed with nothing but faith, truth, and goodness, to encounter the power of princes, the bigotry of priests, the learning of philosophers, the rage of the populace, and the prejudices of all; how would he have derided the attempt, and have said with Sanballat, What will these feeble Jews do? But had he seen the event, surely he must have owned, with the Egyptian Magi, in a far less illustrious miracle, that it was the finger of God; and might justly have fallen on his face, even amongst those whom he had insulted, with a humble acknowledgment that God was in them of a truth.

I might here further urge "those miracles, which were wrought in confirmation of the Christian doctrine, for a considerable time after the death of the apostles."

The most signal and best attested of these, was the dispossession of devils; whom God seems to have permitted to rage with an unusual violence about those times, that his Son's triumph over them might be so much the more remarkable, and that the old serpent might be taken in his own craftiness. I doubt not but many of you have heard, that more than two hundred years after the death of Christ, some of the most celebrated defenders of the gospel, which the church has in any age produced,—I mean Tertullian,* and Minutius Felix,†—do not only challenge any of their heathen enemies and persecutors, to bring them a demoniac, engaging, at the hazard of their lives, to oblige the evil spirit, in his name, and by the authority of Christ, to quit his possession; but do also appeal to it, as a fact publicly known, that those who were agitated by such spirits, stood terrified, and amazed, in the presence of a Christian, and that their pretended gods were compelled then to confess themselves devils.

I wave the testimony of some later writers of the Christian church, lest the credulity of their temper, joined with the circumstances attending some of the facts they record, should furnish out objections against their testimony; though I think we cannot, without great injustice to the character of the learned and pious Augustin, suspect the truth of some amazing facts of this kind, which he has attested as of his own personal and certain knowledge ‡

Nor must I, on this occasion, forget to mention "the accomplishment of several prophecies recorded in the New Testament, as a further confirmation given by God to the gospel.

The most eminent and signal instance under this head, is that of our Lord's prediction concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, as it is recorded by St. Matthew, in his twenty-fourth chapter. The tragical history of it is most circumstantially described by Josephus, a Jewish priest, who was an eye-witness of it; and the description he has given of this sad calamity, so exactly corresponds to the prophecy, that one would have thought, had we not known the contrary, that it had been written by a Christian on purpose to illustrate it: [And one can never enough admire that series of amazing providences, by which the author was preserved from most imminent danger, that he might leave us that invaluable treasure which his writings contain.*

We have no need of any further evidence, than we find in him, of the exactest accomplishment of what was prophesied concerning the destruction of Jerusalem: but our Lord had also foretold the long continued desolation of their temple; and I cannot forbear reminding you of the awful sanction which was given to that part of the prediction: for it is well known, that a heathen historian has assured us, that when Julian the apostate, in deliberate contempt of that prediction, solemnly and resolutely undertook to rebuild it, his impious design was miraculously frustrated again and again, and the workmen consumed by globes of fire, which broke out continually from the foundations.†]

The prediction of St. Paul concerning the man of sin, and the apostasy of the latter times, is also well worthy of our remark. And though a great deal of the book of Revelation be still concealed under a dark veil; yet the division of the Roman empire into ten kingdoms, the usurpation, persecution, and idolatry of the Romish church, and the long duration of the papal power, with several other extraordinary events, which no human prudence could have foreseen, and which have happened long since the publication of that book, are so clearly foretold there, that I cannot but look on that part of Scripture as an invaluable treasure; and think it not at all improbable, that the more visible accomplishment of some of its other prophecies may be a great means of reviving the Christian cause, which is at present so much on the decline.

"The preservation of the Jews as a distinct people," is another particular under this head, which well deserves our attentive regard.

It is plain they are vastly numerous, notwithstanding all the slaughter and destruction of this people, in former and in later ages. They are dispersed in various most distant nations, and particularly in those parts of the world where Christianity is professed: and though they are exposed to great hatred and contempt, on account of their different faith, and in most places subjected to civil incapacities, if not to unchristian severities; yet they are still most obstinately tenacious of their religion: which is the more wonderful as their fathers were so prone to apostatize from it; and as most of them seem to be utter strangers either to piety or humanity, and pour the greatest contempt on the moral precepts of their own law, while they are so attached to the ceremonial institutions of it, troublesome and inconvenient as they are. Now seriously reflect, what an evident hand of Providence is here; that by their dispersion, preservation, and adherence to their religion, it should come to pass, that Christians should daily see the accomplishment of many remarkable prophecies concerning this people;‡ and that we should always have amongst us such a crowd of unexceptionable witnesses to the truth of those ancient Hebrew records, on which so much of the evidence of the gospel depends: records, which are many of them so full to the purpose for which we allege them, that (as a celebrated writer very well observes §) "had the whole body of the Jewish nation been converted to Christianity, men would certainly have thought they had been forged by Christians, and have looked upon them, with the prophecies of the sybils, as made many years after the events they pretend to foretell." And to add no more here, the preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, evidently leaves room for the accomplishment of those Old and New-Testament promises, which relate to their national conversion and restoration: whereas that would be impossible in itself, or at least be impossible to be known, if they were promiscuously blended with other people. On the whole, it is such a scene in the conduct of Providence, as I am well assured cannot be paralleled in the history of any other nation on earth, and affords a most obvious and important argument in favour of the gospel.

Thus has Christianity been further confirmed, since its first publication, by what God has done to establish it. It only remains that we consider,

(2.) What confirmation it receives, "from the methods which its enemies have taken to destroy it."

And these have generally been, either persecution, or falsehood, or cavilling at some particulars in the revelation, without entering into the grand argument on which it is built, and fairly debating what is offered in its defence. Now who would not think the better of a cause, for being thus attacked?

At first you know, that the professors, and especially the preachers of the gospel, were severely persecuted. In every city bonds and imprisonments awaited them. As soon as ever the apostles began to preach Jesus and his resurrection, the Jewish rulers laid hold on them, and having confined and scourged them, strictly prohibited their speaking any more in that name. A little while after, Stephen was murdered; and afterwards James, and some other of the apostles. Now certainly such a conduct did evidently show a consciousness, that they were not able to answer the apostles, and to support their own cause by the fair methods of reason and argument; to which, so far as the history informs us, they made no pretence; but attempted to bear them down by dint of authority, and to silence them by brutal force.

The time would fail me, should I attempt particularly to show, how these unrighteous methods were pursued in succeeding ages, and distant countries. The savage cruelties of Nero to these innocent and holy men were such, as raised the pity even of their enemies;* yet this was one of the least extensive and destructive of the ten general persecutions, which arose in the Roman empire, besides several others in the neighbouring countries, of which ecclesiastical history informs us.

These early enemies of the gospel added falsehood and slander to their inhumanities. They endeavoured to murder the reputation of Christians, as well as their persons, and were not ashamed to represent them as haters of the whole human species,† for no imaginable reason, but because they would not associate themselves in their idolatrous worship, but with regard to charity and truth, were strongly bearing their testimony against it:‡ nay, they charged them with human sacrifices, incest, idolatry, and all the crimes, for which themselves and their foolish gods were indeed justly detestable; but from which the Christians knew how to vindicate themselves, highly to their own honour, and to the everlasting reproach of these malignant and pestilent accusers: and they have not failed to do it in many noble apologies, which through the divine providence are transmitted to us, and are incomparably the most valuable of any ancient uninspired writings.

Such were the infamous and scandalous methods, by which the gospel was opposed in the earliest ages of the church; and I cannot forbear adding, "that the measures more lately taken to subvert it, especially amongst ourselves, seem to me rather to reflect a glory upon it." Its unhappy enemies have been told again and again, that we put the proof of it on plain fact. They themselves do not and cannot deny, that it prevailed early in the world, as we have shown at large. There must have been some man, or body of men, who first introduced it: they generally confess, that Christ and his apostles were the persons: and these apostles (on whose testimony what we know of Christ chiefly depends) must have been enthusiasts, or impostors, if their testimony was false. Now which of these schemes will the unbeliever take? It seems, that the deists of the present age fix on either, as being secretly conscious they can support neither; but they content themselves with cavilling at some circumstances attending the revelation, without daring to encounter its grand evidence, i. e. they have been laboriously attempting to prove it "to be improbable, or absurd, to suppose that to have been, which nevertheless plainly appears to have been, fact." One most weakly and sophistically pretends to prove, in defiance of the common sense of mankind, that the light of nature is a perfect rule, and therefore that all revelation is needless, and indeed impossible. Another disguises the miracles of Christ by false and foolish representations of them, and then sets himself to ridicule them as idle tales. And a third takes a great deal of fruitless pains to show, that some prophecies referred to in the New Testament are capable of another sense, different from that in which the apostles have taken them. These things have been set in a very artful and fallacious light by persons, whose names will be perhaps transmitted to posterity, with the infamous glory of having been leaders in the cause of infidelity; but not a man of them undertakes directly to answer, what has been said to ascertain the grand fact. Nay, they generally take no more notice of the positive evidence, by which it is even demonstrated, than if they had never heard it proposed; though they cavil at incidental passages in those books, in which it is most clearly stated. And as for what they have urged, though perhaps some, who were before weary of Christianity, may have taken occasion from their writings to reject it; and others, for want of consulting the answers to them, may have been unwarily insnared; yet the examination of these points has been greatly for the honour and vindication of the truth, which seems on this occasion to have been set in a clearer and stronger light than ever, at least in these latter ages.

The cause of Christianity has greatly gained by debate, and the gospel comes like fine gold out of the furnace, which the more it is tried, the more it is approved. I own, the defenders of the gospel have appeared with very different degrees of ability for the work; nor could it be otherwise amongst such numbers of them: but on the whole, though the patrons of infidelity have been masters of some wit, humour, and address, as well as of a moderate share of learning, and generally much more than a moderate share of assurance; yet so great is the force of truth, that (unless we may except those writers who have unhappily called for the aid of the civil magistrate in the controversy) I cannot recollect, that I have seen any defence of the gospel, which has not, on the whole, been sufficient to establish it, notwithstanding all the sophistical arguments of its most subtle antagonists.

‡ This matter is set in the clearest and most beautiful light, by the sagacious Mr. Warburton, in his "Divine Legation of Moses," vol. i. pag. 292—295. to whose labours the learned and Christian world are indebted beyond expression, for as great a number of original thoughts as are perhaps any where to be found in an equal compass.

[This is an observation, which is continually gaining new strength, as new assaults are made upon the gospel. And I cannot forbear saying, that as if it were by a kind of judicial infatuation, some who have distinguished themselves in the wretched cause of infidelity, have been permitted to fall into such gross misrepresentations, such senseless inconsistencies, and such palpable falsehoods,* and in a word, into such a various and malignant superfluity of naughtiness; that to a wise and pious mind they must appear like those venomous creatures, which are said to carry an antidote in their bowels against their own poison. A virtuous and well-bred deist must turn away from some modern pieces of this kind with scorn and abhorrence; and a Christian might almost be tempted to wish, that the books, with all their scandals about them, might be transmitted to posterity, lest when they come to live, like the writings of some of the ancient heathens, only in those of their learned and pious answerers, it should hardly be credited, that ever the enemies of the gospel in such an enlightened age should be capable of so much impiety and folly.]

Thus I have given you a brief view of the chief arguments in proof of Christianity; and the sum of the whole is this:

The gospel is probable in theory; as considering the nature of God, and the circumstances of mankind, there was reason to hope a revelation might be given; and if any were given, we should naturally apprehend its internal evidence would be such as that of the gospel is, and its external, such as it is said to be. But it is also true in fact; for Christianity was early professed, as it was first introduced by Jesus of Nazareth, whose life and doctrines were published by his immediate attendants; whose books are preserved still in their original language, and in the main are faithfully translated into our own: so that the books of the New Testament now in your hands may be depended upon, as written by the persons whose names they bear. And admitting this, the truth of the gospel follows by a train of very easy consequences; for the authors certainly knew the truth of the facts they relate; and considering what appears of their character and circumstances, we can never believe they would have attempted to deceive us; or if they had, they could not have gained credit in the world; yet they did gain it in a remarkable manner; therefore the facts they attested are true: and the truth of the gospel evidently follows from the certainty of those facts, and is much confirmed by what has happened in the world since the first publication of it.

I shall conclude what I have to say on this subject, with a few words by way of reflection.

1. Let us gratefully acknowledge the divine goodness, in favouring us with so excellent a revelation, and confirming it to us by such ample evidence.

We should be daily adoring the God of nature, for lighting up the sun, that glorious, though imperfect, image of his own unapproachable lustre; and appointing it to gild the earth with its various rays, to cheer us with its benign influences, and to guide and direct us in our journeys and our labours. But how incomparably more valuable is that Day-spring from on high which has visited us, that Sun of righteousness which is risen upon us, to give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, and to guide our feet into the way of peace! O Christians, (for I now address myself to you, whose eyes are so happy as indeed to see, and your ears as to hear,) what reason have you for daily and hourly praise! When your minds are delighted with contemplating the riches of gospel grace, when you view with wonder and joy the harmonious contrivance of our redemption, when you feel the burthen of your guilt removed, the freedom of your address to the throne of grace encouraged, and see the prospect of a fair inheritance of eternal glory opening upon you; then, in the pleasing transport of your souls, borrow the joyful anthem of the Psalmist, and say, with the humblest gratitude and self-resignation; God is the Lord, who hath given us light; bind the sacrifice with cords, even to the horns of the altar. Adore God, who first commanded the light to shine out of darkness, that by the discoveries of his word, and the operations of his Spirit, he has shined in your hearts, to give you the knowledge of his glory, as reflected from the face of his Son. Let us all adore him, that this revelation hath reached us, who live in an age and country so distant from that in which it first appeared; while there are to this day, not only dark corners, but regions of the earth, which are full of the habitations of idolatry and cruelty.

Let me here peculiarly address myself to those, whose education and circumstances of life have given them opportunities of a fuller inquiry into the state of those ancient or modern nations, that have been left merely to the light of unassisted reason; even to you, Sirs, who are acquainted with the history of their gods, the rites of their priests, the tales, and even the hymns, of their poets; (those beautiful trifles:) nay, I will add, the reasonings of their sagest philosophers, all the precarious and all the erroneous things they have said, where religion and immortality are concerned.* I have sometimes thought, that God gave to some of the most celebrated pagan writers that uncommon share of genius and eloquence, that they might, as it were, by their art embalm the monsters of antiquity; that so succeeding ages might see, in a more affecting view than we could otherwise have done, how weak the human mind is in its best estate, and the need which the greatest as well as the meanest of mankind have, of being taught by a revelation from above. Permit me to remind you, that while you are daily conversing with such monuments as these, (as I know some of you are,) and are also surveying the evidences of Christianity in a larger and more distinct view than it was proper for me here to propose them, you are under peculiar obligations to be very thankful for the gospel yourselves, as well as to compassionate the case of those to whom it has never been offered, or by whom it is slighted. And this leads me to another reflection;

* [I mention not here that mean buffoonery and scurrility, that industrious, though awkward, disguise, and murderous mixture of the sceptic and dogmatist, which the learned and ingenious Mr Warburton has animadverted upon with such justice and spirit, in his Par Deals edition to the Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated.]

2. What reason have we to pity those, who reject this glorious gospel, even when they have opportunities of inquiring into its clearest evidences!

Such undoubtedly there are in our own age and nation; and surely we should sometimes bestow a compassionate thought upon them, and lift up a humble prayer for them; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth; that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are now led captive by him at his pleasure. We should pity heathens and Mahometans, under their darkness and errors: but how much more deplorable is the case of those, who, though they dwell in Emanuel's land, and in the valley of vision, turn it into the valley of the shadow of death, by closing their eyes against so bright a lustre, and stopping their ears against the voice of the charmer? They are indeed in their own conceit the only people, and wisdom will die with them; so that, to be sure, they will scorn our pity: but who can forbear it? Is there a more melancholy thought than this, that the Son of God should have done so much to introduce and establish the gospel, and his Spirit so much to perpetuate and increase its evidence, and that after all, it should be contemptuously despised, even by creatures who are perishing without it? That the blessed Jesus, instead of being received with open arms as the great deliverer, should either be treated as an empty name; or if acknowledged to be a real person, should then be represented as a visionary enthusiast, or a wicked impostor; for there is no other alternative? And this, not only (though I believe most frequently) by men of profligate and abandoned lives, but sometimes by persons of external morality and decency, of great humanity and sweetness of temper, (for such I know are to be found amongst them,) as well as men of wit and genius, of politeness and learning, of human prudence and experience in affairs. I may also add, that it is the case of some, who were the children of pious parents, who were trained up in religious exercises, who once discovered serious impressions, and gave very encouraging hopes. Alas, whither have they fallen? and whither have we reason to fear, they will at length fall? How shall we shelter those, that were once our brethren, that are perhaps still our friends, from the awful sentence, which the gospel denounces against all that reject it without any exception? As to the wretches, that add insult and derision to their infidelity, I tremble to think of that load of guilt which they are bringing on themselves, and how near they approach to the unpardonable sin, if they have not already committed it. For the rest, who behave in a more modest and decent manner, it will no doubt be a very difficult task to convince them; and so much the rather, as some of them, by too easy a transition, have renounced many of the most important principles of natural religion, nay, I might add, even the whole of it, together with the Christian revelation. But the influences of divine grace are almighty; let us recommend them to these, and omit no other proper method, either of recovering those who are already seduced, or at least of securing those who are not yet infected, but may be (as most of the youth are, especially in the most populous places) in imminent danger of the contagion. To this end let me add,

3. How reasonable is it that Christians should form a familiar acquaintance with the great evidences of our common faith!

It is what we so apparently owe to the honour of God, to the interest of Christ, to the peace of our own souls, and the edification of others, that I hope I need not urge it at large; especially considering what was said in the introduction to these discourses. In consequence of all, let it be your care to make the evidences of Christianity the subject of your serious reflections, and of your frequent converse: especially, study your Bibles, where there are such marks of truth and divinity to be found, that I believe, few that have familiarly known them, and have had a relish for them, were ever brought to make shipwreck of the faith as it is in Jesus. Above all, let it be your care to act on the rules which are there laid down; and then you will find your faith growing in a happy proportion, and will experience the truth of our Saviour's declaration, that if any man will resolutely and faithfully do his will, he shall know of the Christian doctrine whether it be of God. I verily believe, it is the purity of its precepts which lies at the bottom of most men's opposition to it; or a natural pride of heart, which gives them an aversion to so humbling a scheme; or a fond affectation of seeming wiser than others, in rejecting what most of their neighbours do at least profess to believe. When these unhappy prejudices and conceptions are by divine grace conquered and rooted out, the evidences of truth will daily appear with an increasing lustre; as the light of the sun does to an eye recovering from a film with which it had been overgrown, and which before had veiled it with the darkness of midnight in the midst of noon. Once more,

* The great author I mentioned before (pag. 693. note:) has shown in a most convincing manner, that the whole body of the Greek philosophers disbelieved the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, though they popularly taught it, as necessary to society, and held no other immortality of the soul, than what was the result of a most atheistical notion, modernly known by the name of Spinozism, that the universe was God. (See Mr Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses, book iii. sect. 2, 3, 4.) Which surely is one of the strongest proofs of the need of a revelation, that the world ever saw, and the most affecting comment on the words of the learned apostle, 1 Cor. i. 21. The world by wisdom knew not God, but professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, Rom. i. 22.

4. How solicitous should we be to embrace and obey that gospel, which comes attended with such abundant evidences!

I may undoubtedly address myself to most of you, my friends, and say, as Paul did to king Agrippa, Believest thou the prophets, and I may add, the evangelists and the apostles? Yes, I know that you believe them; yet let me entreat and charge you not to rest here, but attentively to examine, how far your hearts are affected, and your lives regulated, by such a belief. The Christian revelation is a practical thing, and it is heard, it is believed, it is professed, and even defended, in vain, if it be not obeyed. Therefore do we so frequently read of obeying the truth, and obeying the gospel, as a matter of so great importance.

In this gospel, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; but it is revealed with redoubled terror against that audacious sinner who holds the truth in unrighteousness. In this gospel, the Lord Jesus Christ is exalted both a Prince and a Saviour; and it is not with impunity that the impenitent rebel can reject his yoke, and trample on his blood: for if he that despised Moses's law died without mercy, of how much sorer punishment than even a capital execution, must they be thought worthy, who have poured contempt on such a Sovereign, and on such a Redeemer?

O let it be most seriously and frequently recollected, that this gospel is the touchstone by which you are another day to be tried; the balance in which an impartial judge will weigh you; and must on the whole prove your everlasting triumph, or your everlasting torment. The blessed God did not introduce it with such solemn notice, such high expectations, such pompous miracles, such awful sanctions, that men might reject or dishonour it at pleasure; but it will certainly be found, to the greatest and the meanest of those that hear it, a savour of life unto life, or a savour of death unto death.

Let it therefore be your immediate care to inquire, which of these it is like to prove to your souls; since it is so far from being a vain thing, that it is your very life. If it has hitherto been despised, and that blessed Redeemer, in whom it so apparently centres, has been neglected; remember, that all which has been said in confirmation of its truth, does but in effect prove, that the hand-writing of God himself is set to the sentence of your eternal condemnation. Oh therefore allow not yourselves a moment's rest, until you have with humble submission applied to his throne, while yet there is hope that it may be reversed.

And as for you, my brethren, who have received Christ Jesus the Lord, be exhorted to walk in him; since it is the design of his gospel to teach us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly; and this not only as you have so comfortable an assurance, that your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord, but as it will be, on the whole, the most effectual method you can take in your respective stations to promote the gospel. If you indeed honour it and love it, and desire it may be propagated in the world, let it be your care, not only to defend it by your tongues, but to adorn it by your lives: and, in the words of that great champion in this sacred cause, be blameless and harmless, the children of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, shining amongst them as lights in the world, and so holding forth the word of life; and perhaps it may serve, not only to entertain their eyes with wonder and glory, but to guide their feet into the way of peace, and may engage them also to join with you in glorifying your Father which is in heaven. Amen!

SERMONS

ON REGENERATION.

PREFACE.

It is undoubtedly the duty of every wise and good man, to be forming schemes for the service of God and his fellow-creatures in future years, if he be continued to them; and it will be his prudence to do it early in life, that he may be gradually preparing to execute them in the most advantageous manner he can. But while a man's heart is thus devising his way, the Lord directeth his steps. And as many such schemes will probably be left unfinished at death, which will quickly come to break off our purposes and the thoughts of our hearts: so it is not improbable, that they who humbly and obediently follow the leadings of divine providence and grace, may often find themselves called out on a sudden to services which, but a little before, were quite unthought of by them.

This has been the case with me in most of the Sermons I have published, of which very few were composed with any view to the press; and it is most remarkably so with respect to these on Regeneration. Besides many other excellent persons, my much honoured friend Dr. Wright has handled the subject in so judicious and lively a manner, and through the great goodness of God to us, so many thousands of his treatise upon it are dispersed in all parts of our land, that I could hardly have believed any one who had told me I should thus have resumed it; nor had I the least intention of doing it, when I began that course of Lectures which I now offer to my reader's perusal.

I did indeed think it necessary last year to treat the subject more largely than I had ever done before, knowing in the general how important it is, and observing that several controversies had about that time been raised concerning it, which (though I do not judge it necessary to mention the particulars of them) I was ready to fear might have had an ill influence to unsettle men's minds, and either to lead them into some particular errors, or into a general apprehension that it was a mere point of speculation, about which it was not necessary to form any judgment at all.*

That these Discourses might be more generally useful, I determined to preach them on Lord's-day evenings, that those of my neighbours who were not my stated hearers might, if they thought proper, have an opportunity of attending them: and accordingly they were attended to the last with uncommon diligence; a great many such persons, of different persuasions and communions, making up a part of the auditory. As practical instruction and improvement was the main thing I had in view, I knew it was necessary to make my Discourses as plain, as free, and as serious as I could. But before I had finished near half of my scheme, several of my hearers earnestly requested that the Sermons might be published: and the request grew more extensive and importunate every week, with this additional circumstance, (which I much regarded,) that some very pious and judicious friends at a distance, being providentially brought to the hearing of some of these Lectures, strongly concurred in the desire; expressing a very cheerful hope, that the reading of what they had heard might be useful in distant parts of the land, to which they assured me they would endeavour to spread them as opportunity might offer. As the advice of several of my brethren in the ministry was joined with all this, I thought myself bound in duty at length to comply; which I was the rather encouraged to do, from the several instances in which I had reason to believe the divine blessing had in some measure attended these Sermons from the pulpit, and had made them the means of producing and advancing the change they described and enforced.

On these considerations, as soon as I returned from that long journey, in which I set out the day after these Lectures were concluded, I applied myself to recollect the substance of them as well as I could, from the short hints I had written of them, with the assistance of those notes which some of my friends had taken after me in characters. Some things are perhaps omitted, though I believe but very few; some contracted, and some enlarged; but my hearers will find them in the main what they heard. It cost me more labour than I was aware, from such materials, to reduce them into their present form; and I hope the multitude of my other business will be allowed as an apology, if I proceeded in them slower than some might expect.

I shall leave it to my reader to observe for himself the manner and method in which I have handled my subject, without giving him a particular view of it here; only must beg leave to tell him in the general, that I hope he will find I have not presumed so far on the sublimity of my subject, as to talk without determinate ideas; for which reason I have omitted many phrases, used particularly of late by some pious and worthy persons, because I freely own, that as I cannot find them in my Bible, so neither can I understand their exact meaning; and it seems very improper to embarrass such plain Discourses as these with a language, which, not being thoroughly master of, I may chance to misapply, supposing those phrases to be really more proper than I can at present apprehend they are. I have endeavoured to keep to one idea of regeneration, which I take to be that which the Scripture suggests: by regeneration I mean "a prevailing disposition of the soul to universal holiness, produced and cherished by the influences of God's Spirit on our hearts, operating in a manner suitable to the constitution of our nature, as rational and accountable creatures." If this be (as I think I have proved at large that it is) the Scriptural notion of it, it will follow, that nothing which may be found where this is not, or which may not be found where this is, can be regeneration in the Scripture sense, which is that sense in which we are much more concerned than we are in that to which any human writers, whether ancient or modern, may think proper to apply it.

If the doctrine which I have endeavoured, in the whole course of these Sermons, to confirm and illustrate by the word of God, be in one form or another generally taught by my brethren in the ministry, of whatever denomination, I rejoice in it for their own sakes, as well as for that of the people under their care. I am very little inclined to contend about technical phrases of human invention, which have, with equal frailty, been idolized by some and anathematized by others. We shall, I hope, learn more and more to bear one another's burthens, and to study the kindest interpretations which the words of each other will admit. But I must take the liberty to say, I am in my conscience persuaded that this view of things which is here proposed, though perhaps not very fashionable, is in the general so edifying, and so naturally leads to the frequent review of many other important doctrines of Christianity, which are closely connected with it, that I am well satisfied it will be our wisdom to adhere to it, and to make it very familiar to our own minds, and to those of our hearers. Nor can I imagine that any variety in the idioms of different languages, or the customs of different ages and nations, can be a sufficient reason for bringing Scripture phrases into disuse, while we keep to the original ideas signified by them. There seems to be a peculiar felicity in them to express divine truth; and they will undoubtedly be found the safest vehicle of religious knowledge, and the surest bond of union among Christians; while, however we may differ in other matters, we so generally agree in acknowledging that our Bibles contain the oracles of God.

Let us therefore, who under different denominations are honoured with the ministry of the everlasting gospel, agree, for a while at least, to suspend our debates upon less necessary subjects, that we may, with united efforts, concur in prosecuting that great design for which the gospel was revealed, the Spirit given, and our office instituted. And since it is so evident that irreligion has grown upon us while we have been attending to other, and to be sure smaller, matters, let us by a plain, serious, and zealous way of preaching the most vital truths of Christianity, joined with a diligent inspection of the souls committed to our care, try what can be done towards preventing the progress of this growing apostasy, and recovering the ground we have already lost. Ignorant and prejudiced people may perhaps accuse us of bigotry or enthusiasm; but let us do our best to convince them of their error, by the candour of our temper, and the prudence of our conduct; and remember that, as Chrysostom excellently speaks in these lively words, "It is a sufficient consolation for our labours, and far more than an equivalent for all, if we may have a testimony in our consciences, that we compose and regulate our discourses in such a manner as may be approved by God, in whose name we speak."

POSTSCRIPT.

To what I have said in the conclusion of the first Sermon concerning the proper import of the word Regeneration, I beg leave to add the following remarks for the further satisfaction of some worthy persons, who think it may be convenient to state the matter a little more particularly.

I acknowledge that many learned and pious divines have taught and contended, that Regeneration does, in the strictest propriety of speech, signify Baptism. So that no unbaptized person, how well disposed soever, can properly be said to be regenerated; whereas that title may justly be given to all who have been baptized, how destitute soever they might have been of Christian faith and holiness when they received the ordinance, or how grossly soever they may since have forfeited the final blessings of a regenerate state. Dr. Waterland has stated this matter at large in his laboured and ingenious treatise on the subject, which is the best I know on this side of the question. And though this would be a very improper place to enter on a critical examination of that piece, I will briefly touch on the chief arguments which he, or others in his sentiments, have urged in vindication of this favourite notion. So far as I can recollect, what they say is capable of being reduced to two heads;—that Christian antiquity uses the word in this sense;—and that there are passages of Scripture which authorize such an application of it.

As to the first of these, I readily own that the word has this sense in the generality of the Christian writers, from about the middle of the second century, though I think not so universally as some have concluded:* but I think it easy to account for such a use of it among them. For in the earliest ages of the church, persons were generally baptized as soon as they were converted to the cordial belief of Christianity; and therefore the time of their conversion, and that of their baptism, might naturally enough be spoken of as one: and as this was a period when they did, as it were, come into a new world, it is no wonder that the action by which they testified a change so lately made, should be put for that change itself. Just as illumination also among the ancients signifies baptism: not to intimate that the grand illumination of the mind was made by this rite, or at the time of it; for that would be supposing the person in darkness when he embraced the gospel, and determined to be baptized, but because it was taken for granted, and that very justly, in those days, that every one savingly enlightened would soon be baptized, that so he might be regularly joined to the society of enlightened or regenerated persons, that is, to the Christian church: which no doubt had the best right of any body of men in the world to that title, though in its purest state it contained some ignorant and wicked members. In a word, a man by baptism solemnly professed himself a Christian; and as it was generally the first overt-act by which his believing the gospel could be publicly and generally known, and was also supposed to be very near the time of his inward conversion, they dated his regeneration, that is, his happy change, (as that word used to signify, even among the heathen,†) from that time. We own therefore that these ancient Christians (of whom I always think and speak with great respect) had a very good excuse for this method of speaking; but whether they were perfectly accurate in this, and whether they did not recede from the Scripture use of the word, may be matter of further inquiry.

As to the arguments from Scripture in support of the interpretation I oppose, they are taken partly from particular places; but chiefly, as I apprehend, from the general tenor of it, in which Christians are spoken of as regenerated.

The particular texts are, John iii. 5. and Tit. iii. 5. on which much of the stress of this controversy is laid; but on considering them attentively, I find nothing in either of them to lead us to think baptism the regeneration spoken of there.

As to the former of them, John iii. 5. when our Lord says, "Except a man be born of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God;" it is (after all the contempt with which that interpretation has been treated) very possible he may mean, by a well-known figure, to express one idea by both those clauses, that is, the purifying influences of the Spirit cleansing the mind, as water does the body: as elsewhere, to be baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire, (Matt. iii. 11.) signifies to be baptized by the Spirit operating like fire. But if there is indeed a reference to baptism in these words, (which I own I am much inclined to believe,) it will by no means follow that baptism is regeneration. On that supposition, I still think the sense of the passage must be that which I have given in my paraphrase on it, (Fam. Expos. vol. i. p. 148.) "Whosoever would become a regular member of the kingdom of God, must not only be baptized, but as ever he desires to share in its spiritual and eternal blessings, must experience the renewing and sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit on his soul, to cleanse it from the power of corruption, and to animate and quicken it to a spiritual and divin life." It is granted therefore, that how excellent soever any man's character is, he must be baptized before he can be looked upon as completely a member of the church of Christ; and that, in general, being born of the Spirit, he will also be solicitous that he may be born of water, and so fulfil all righteousness. But it will never follow from hence, that being born of water and born of the Spirit are the same thing. The text rather implies they are different; and I think every body must own, they may be actually separate. Nothing therefore can be more absurd than to infer from this text, that if there be two persons, one of which is born of the Spirit, and not of water; another of water, and not of the Spirit; the latter, that is, the wicked man who has perhaps with some iniquitous design been baptized, may properly be said to be regenerated, or born of God, and consequently to be an heir of God, (Rom. viii. 17.) rather than a truly religious man who has not yet been baptized, either through want of opportunity, or through some unhappy mistake, as to the nature and design, or the perpetuity and obligations, of that ordinance. Now this I take to be precisely the question, and must declare, that when a baptized person is destitute of true religion, that birth which he had by water, seems to me as it were an evanescent thing, or a thing which disappears as unworthy the mention; and that it must be therefore most safe and advisable, as well as most agreeable to the Scripture sense, to appropriate the title of regenerate persons to those sanctified by divine grace, rather than to use it of all who are baptized.

As to the text in Titus, (chap. iii. 5.) where God is said to save us by the washing of regeneration, or, as some earnestly contend it should be rendered, "by the laver of regeneration:" I might answer, that as that interpretation is by no means necessary,‡ it cannot be proved that baptism is here designed, though

* Clemens Alexandrinus, so often, and to be sure reasonably, quoted on the other side, plainly uses the word for "a change of character by true repentance," (Strom. lib. ii. page 429.) where, speaking of "a penitent harlot," he says, "that being born again by conversion, of a change in her temper and behaviour, she has the regeneration of life." [illegible] Compare also Strom. lib. iii. page 448.

† It is well known that Cicero expresses "the happy change" made in his state, when restored from his banishment, by this word. Cic. ad Attic. lib. iv. Epist. 6. The Greeks expressed by it "the doctrine of the Brachmans," in which they affirmed our entering on a new state of being after death. (Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. iii. page 450.) And the Stoics used it to denote their expected renovation of the world after successive conflagrations. Marc. Antonin. Medit. lib. xi. § 1. v. 12. x. 7. See Lactan. oper. pag. 582. Euseb. Præp. Evang. ex mumen. lib. xv. cap. 19. Phil. Jud. de Mundi Immort. pag. 940, 951. and in many other places. And so the fathers often use it to signify the resurrection which Christians expect. See Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1. in fin. Compare Matt. xix. 28. and the note there. Fam. Expos. Vol. II. page 238.

‡ The original is λουτρου παλιγγενεσιας. Now it is certain, the Seventy use another word, that is λουτρον, to signify laver. Exod. xxx. 18, 28.; xxxi. 9. and I think (so far as I have observed) every where else. and λουω St. Paul's word here is used where it cannot signify laver, for the water in which sheep are washed, Cant. iv. 2. and for a large quantity of water in which an adult person was washed or bathed, Eph. v. 26. And this remark quite overthrows all the argument from this text, if any argument would follow from rendering it laver, but I think I need not urge this.

I acknowledge there may be a graceful allusion to it: the apostle may mean, we are saved by God's washing our hearts by his sanctifying Spirit, (a phrase so often used in the Old Testament,) and thereby making us his children: and in this sense it might have been used, though baptism had never been instituted. But granting (as I have done in the beginning of the seventh Sermon) that λουτρον may be rendered laver, and that baptism may be the laver referred to; and that "there is indeed an allusion to the washing new-born children;" (as Mr. Mede in his diatribe on this text contends;) I think this text will be so far from proving that St. Paul meant to call baptism regeneration, that it will prove the contrary: for regeneration itself, and the laver of regeneration, cannot be the same thing: and whatever Tertullian and other ancients may fancifully talk of our being generated like fishes in the water, in a weak allusion to the technical word ΙΧΘΥΣ, common sense will see how absurd it would be to apply this to a child, and will teach us rather to argue, that as children must be born before they can be washed, so they must be regenerated before the washing of regeneration (that is, the washing which belongs to their new birth) can be applied to them. But on the whole, as washing an infant refers to its pollution, and no pollution attends our regeneration as such, I am more and more inclined to think there is no reference at all to a laver, or the washing new-born children; and therefore, that this washing and the renewing of the Holy Ghost are exegetical, and that the latter clause might be rendered, even the renewing, &c. which makes the text decisive for the sense in which I use the word.

After all then, if any argument can be deduced from Scripture in favour of the manner of speaking now in debate, it must be from the general tenor of it; according to which it seems that all who are members of the visible church are spoken of as regenerate; from which it may be inferred, with some plausible probability at least, that baptism, by which they are admitted into that society, may be called Regeneration: and I am ready to believe, as I hinted above, that this was the chief reason why the ancients so often used the word in the sense I am now opposing.

Now with relation to this, I desire it may be recollected, that when Christianity first appeared in the world, it was attended with such discouragements, as made the very profession of it, in a great measure, a test of men's characters. The apostles therefore, knowing the number of hypocrites to be comparatively very small, generally take no notice of them, but address themselves to whole bodies of Christians, as if they were truly what they professed to be. Just as our Lord Jesus Christ, though he knew the wickedness of Judas, often addresses himself to the whole body of his apostles, as if they were all his faithful servants, and makes gracious declarations and promises to the whole society, which could by no means be applicable to this one corrupt and wretched member of it, telling them, for instance, that they should share in his final triumph, and sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, Matt. xix. 28.

This is therefore the true key to all those passages in which Christians are, in the general, said to be adopted, sanctified, justified, &c. as well as regenerated. The apostles had reason in the judgment of charity, to think thus of by far the greatest part of them: and therefore they speak to them all, as in such a happy state. And agreeably to this, we find not only such privileges, but also such characters, ascribed to Christians in general, as were only applicable to such of them as were Christians indeed. Thus all the Corinthians are spoken of by the apostle Paul as waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, (1 Cor. i. 7.) and all the Ephesians, and all the Colossians, as having faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and love to all the saints, (Eph. i. 15. Col. i. 4.) and all the Philippians, as having a good work begun in them, which Paul was persuaded God would perfect, (Phil. i. 6.) and all the Thessalonians, as remarkable for their work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope, (1 Thess. i. 3.) though it evidently appears there were persons in several of these churches who behaved much amiss, and to whom, had he been particularly addressing to each of them alone, he could not by any means have used such language. On the like principles Peter, when addressing all the Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, speaks of the whole aggregate of them, (1 Pet. i. 8.) as loving an unseen Saviour, and amidst all their tribulations, rejoicing in him with joy unspeakable and full of glory; though probably there were some weak and dejected Christians among them, and undoubtedly in so large an extent of country, in which there were such a vast number of churches, not a few, who (as our Lord afterwards expresses it of some of them) had only a name to live, while they were dead. (Rev. iii. 1.) in which passage, by the way, our Lord uses the same figure, and describes the whole body by the character of those who made the greater part of it.

I state the matter thus particularly, because I think this obvious remark is a sufficient answer to what is most peculiar and important in a late Discourse, consisting of near 130 quarto pages, and entitled, A Key to the Apostolic Writings, &c. prefixed by the Rev. Mr. Taylor of Norwich to his late Paraphrase and Notes on the Romans. I think what I have briefly advanced here, will much more effectually answer the end of fixing the true sense of the Scripture phrases in question. And I cannot forbear saying, that to determine the sense of the words, called, redeemed, sanctified, &c. when applied to the Christian church, by that in which they are used in Moses and the prophets with respect to the whole people of Israel, seems to me as unreasonable, as it would be to maintain, that the dimensions, the strength, and the beauty of a body are to be most exactly estimated by looking on its shadow.

Yet on this evidently weak and mistaken principle, the learned and ingenious author referred to above, ventures not only to attempt an entire alteration in the generally received strain of theological discourses, but to throw out a censure, which considering its extent and its severity, must either be very terrible, or very pitiable. He not only seems to think, if I understand him right, that we were all regenerated, (if at all,) as well as justified, in those of our parents who were first converted from idolatry to Christianity, (Key, 81, 82, and 246.) as indeed he expressly says, "that we are born in a justified," and therefore undoubtedly (if the word is to be retained) in a regenerate, "state;" but he presumes to say, that such doctrines as have been almost universally taught and received among Christians, concerning "justification, regeneration, redemption, &c. have quite taken away the very ground of the Christian life, the grace of God, and have left no object for the faith of a sinner to work upon." (p. 357.) And here upon, lest it should be forgot, he repeats it in the same section, that to represent it as "the subject of doubtful inquiry, trial, and examination, whether we have an interest in Christ, whether we are in a state of pardon, whether we be adopted," (and by consequence, to be sure, whether we be regenerated,) "is" (as the Antinomians I imagine would also say) "to make our justification, as it invests us in those blessings, to be of works, and not by faith alone:" and (as was just before said in the same words) "to take away the very ground of the Christian life, the grace of God, and to leave no object for the faith of a sinner to act upon." And this way of stating things, which has so generally prevailed, is joined with the wickedness and contentions of professing Christians, as a third cause of that distegard to the gospel which is so common in the present day.

Now as no book can fall more directly under this censure, than this of mine, in which it is the business of the three first Sermons to direct professing Christians in an inquiry, whether they be or be not in a regenerate state; I thought it not improper, in this postscript, briefly to acquaint my reader with the principles on which I continue to think the view, in which I have put the matter, to be rational and Scriptural,* and do still in my conscience judge it far preferable to what the advocates of baptismal regeneration on the one hand, or Mr. Taylor on the other, would introduce. It seems to me, that the points in dispute with him are much more important than our debates with them, as a much greater number of scriptures are concerned, and the whole tenor of our ministerial addresses would be much more sensibly affected. Had I leisure to discuss the matter more largely with this gentleman, I should think it might be an important service to the gospel of Christ. I hope it will be undertaken by some abler hand; and shall, in the mean time, go on preaching and writing in the manner so solemnly condemned, with no apprehension from the discharge of all this overloaded artillery, except it be what I feel for the zealous engineer himself, and a few other friends who may chance to stand nearer him than in prudence they ought.

SERMON XXII.

THE CHARACTER OF THE UNREGENERATE.

EPHES. ii. 1, 2.

And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience.

AMONG all the various trusts which men can repose in each other, hardly any appears to me more solemn and tremendous, than the direction of their sacred time, and especially of those hours which they spend in the exercise of public devotion. These seasons take up so small a part of our lives, when compared with that which the labours and recreations of them demand; and so much depends upon their being managed aright, that we, who are called to assist you in the employment and improvement of them, can hardly be too solicitous, that we discharge the trust in a manner which we may answer to God and to you. If this thought dwell upon the mind with due weight, it will have some sensible influence upon our discourses to you, as well as on the strain of those addresses which we present to the throne of grace in your name and on your account. We shall not be over-anxious about the order of words, the elegance of expression, or the little graces of composition or delivery; but shall study to speak on the most important subjects, and to handle them with such gravity and seriousness, with such solemnity and spirit, as may, through the divine blessing, be most likely to penetrate the hearts of our hearers, to awaken those that are entirely unconcerned about religion, and to animate and assist those, who, being already acquainted with it, desire to make continual advances, which will be the case of every truly good man.

It is my earnest prayer for myself, and for my brethren in the ministry of all denominations, that we may, in this respect, approve our wisdom and integrity to God, and commend ourselves to the consciences of all men. It is our charge, as we shall answer it another day to the God of the spirits of all flesh, to use our prudent and zealous endeavours, to make men truly wise and good, virtuous and happy: but to this purpose, it is by no means sufficient to content ourselves, merely with attempting to reform the immoralities and irregularities of their lives, and to bring them to an external behaviour, decent, honourable, and useful. An undertaking like this, while the inward temper is neglected, even when it may seem most effectual, will be but like painting the face of one who is ready to die, or labouring to repair a ruinous house, by plastering and adorning its walls, while its foundations are decayed. There is an awful passage in Ezekiel to this purpose, which I hope we shall often recollect: "Woe to the foolish prophets,—because they have seduced my people, saying, Peace, when there was no peace; and one built up a wall, and lo, others daubed it with untempered mortar: say unto them that daub it with untempered mortar, that it shall fall:—Thus saith the Lord God, I will even rent it with a stormy wind in my fury; and there shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in my fury to consume it; so will I break down the wall that ye have daubed with untempered mortar, and bring it down to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered, and it shall fall, and shall be consumed in the midst thereof; and ye shall know that I am the Lord."

* For the full proof of this, that it is the most Scriptural sense, I must desire the reader diligently to examine [illegible] several texts which are quoted in the following Discourses; for it would [illegible] them a critical examination. Let it still be remembered, that [illegible] remark let any one find can do it put together all the passages [illegible] and baptized persons for persons born of God, and [illegible] words themselves; and I cannot but think he will be struck [illegible] And I must add, that if he look into the context of many of these passages, as with the same [illegible] as some have done, "that regeneration easily [illegible] a motion so fully confuted by our Lord's discourse with Nicodemus, [illegible] compared with 1 Pet. i. 14. iv. 2. which proves that the apostle there [illegible] Gentiles) that I think it quite superfluous to discuss it more largely here.

If there be any, in one body of Christians or another, that abet men's natural disposition to flatter themselves in a way that is not good, by encouraging them to hope for salvation, because they were regularly baptized in their infancy; because they have diligently attended on public worship, in its established or its separate forms; or merely because they do nobody any harm, but are rather kind and helpful to others; or because their faith is orthodox, their transports of affection warm, or their assurance confident; I pray God to awaken them by the power of his grace, before they are consumed, with their hearers, in the ruins of their deceitful building. Those of you who are my stated hearers can witness for me, that in this respect I have delivered my own soul. It has been the steady tenor of my doctrine among you, that our hope and confidence must be in Christ, and not in ourselves; and that, if we desire to be interested in the righteousness he has wrought out, and in the blessings he has purchased by his sacred blood, we must be experimentally acquainted with the work of God's renewing grace upon our souls, curing the inward distempers of our degenerate hearts, and transforming us into the image of his holiness: that is what we are taught in Scripture to call by the name of regeneration; and considering how much the subject is neglected by some, and, I fear I may add, misrepresented and disguised by others, I apprehend I shall profitably employ an evening hour for several succeeding sabbaths, in giving a larger account than I have yet done, of the Scripture doctrine on this important subject, in its various parts. It shall be my care in the series of these discourses, as God shall enable me, to speak the words of truth and soberness; and I entreat you to have recourse to the law and to the testimony, that you may judge of the truth and weight of what I say. I desire not to be regarded any further than I produce evidence from reason and Scripture; but so far as we are disregarded, while we have the concurrent testimony of both, our hearers must see to it; and their danger will then be proportionable to the importance of those truths, which their negligence, or their prejudice, engage them either to reject, or to overlook.

The plan, on which I intend to proceed in the course of these Lectures, is this:

I. I will endeavour to describe the character of those, whom we may properly call persons in an unregenerate state.

II. I will describe the nature of that change, which may properly be called regeneration, or conversion.

III. I will show at large the absolute necessity of this change, and the consequent misery of those that are strangers to it.

IV. I shall endeavour to prove the reality and necessity of the divine influences on the mind, in the production of such a change.

V. I shall describe some of those various methods, by which God is pleased to operate in the production of this holy and important work.

VI. I shall propose some advices to those who are already awakened, as to the method in which they are to seek renewing grace. After which,

VII. I shall conclude these Discourses with an address to those who have experienced this happy change, as to the manner in which they ought to be affected with such a series of sermons as this, and the improvement they should make of what they hear, and what they have felt agreeable to it.

I should be peculiarly inexcusable, if I entered upon such a subject, without earnest and importunate prayers to the Fountain of light, grace, and holiness, that while you hear of this important doctrine, you may have that experimental knowledge of it, without which such discourses will indeed seem obscure and enthusiastical, according to the degree in which they are rational and spiritual. I shall only add, that these Lectures will take their rise from a variety of texts, which I shall not, according to my usual method, largely open and dilate upon, but only touch on them as so many mottos to the respective sermons to which they are prefixed.

As I intend not philosophical essays, but plain, practical, and popular addresses, I shall begin,

First, With describing the character of those, whom we may properly call unconverted and unregenerate persons.

It is absolutely necessary that I should do this, that you may respectively know your own personal concern in what is further to be laid before you in the process of these Lectures.

Now you have the general character of such, in the words of my text; and a very sad one it is. They are represented, as dead in trespasses and sins, utterly indisposed both for the actions and enjoyments of the spiritual and divine life; as walking according to the course of this world, a sad intimation that it was the state of the generality of mankind; nay, according to the prince of the power of the air, that impure and wicked spirit, who works, or exerts his energy, in the children of disobedience, that is, in those who reject and despise the gospel; in which it is implied, (and a dreadful implication it is,) that the course and conduct of those who reject the gospel is according to the desire and instigation of the prince of darkness: they are going on as the devil himself would have them, and choose that path for themselves which he chooses for them, as leading them to most certain and most aggravated ruin.

And who are these unhappy persons? Surely there must be some of them among us: for who can flatter himself, that in so numerous an assembly, the course of all is different from that of the world; and that all have happily triumphed over the artifices of that accursed spirit, who is, by God's righteous permission, become its prince, while it continues in its apostate state? I shall however think it a very happy point gained, if I could convince any of you, who are justly liable to that conviction, that you are the men; if I could, as it were, render visible to your eyes those subtle, yet strongly complicated, chains, in which Satan is binding you, and by which he is drawing you on to eternal ruin; that you might recover yourselves out of the snare of the devil, who are led captive by him at his pleasure.

I am this evening to describe the character of unregenerate men: but I cannot pretend to do it in all the variety of circumstances which may attend it. I shall therefore mention only some particulars which are most important, and which most certainly demonstrate a person to be of that wretched number. There are a great variety of countenances in the human species; yet the principal features in all are the same, though their proportion and lineaments may differ: and I apprehend, the characters which I am now to lay down, will most of them suit every unregenerate person, though they may appear in various persons in different degrees and different instances. I shall chiefly lay down these characters in negatives, as I apprehend it is the safest way; and only would observe, what you may easily perceive, that I speak only of the adult; for I would cautiously avoid entangling this discourse, with what relates purely to the case of infants, lest Satan should get an advantage over us, and turn that into an occasion to amuse curiosity, which I humbly hope, under the influence of the Spirit of God, will be the means of awakening conviction, and of breaking that delusive peace, in which, like the strong man armed, he keeps his vassals, till the fatal hour come which is to complete their ruin.

To wave the formality of laboured demonstrations in a case which admits of such easy evidence, I shall go upon this obvious principle in the whole of my reasoning: "That to be regenerate, and to be born of God, are in Scripture terms of the same import; and consequently, that whatever temper and disposition is in Scripture declared to be inconsistent with the character of a child of God, must necessarily denominate a man an unregenerate person." And one would think this principle could hardly be disputed, since all that allow of regeneration at all, in a Christian sense, seem to understand by it that change, whatever it is, by which a person is made a child of God, and by consequence an heir of heaven.

Now on this principle, you may take the marks of an unregenerate person in such particulars as these; and let those, whose consciences own them, hear and tremble.

1. The soul "that never seriously inquired into its spiritual state," is, beyond all doubt, an unregenerate soul.

The apostle earnestly presses it upon the Christians to whom he wrote, that they should diligently examine themselves whether they were in the faith: and he who has entirely neglected to do it, seems to express, not merely a forgetfulness of religion, but even a contempt of it too. Nevertheless, be it known unto you, Sirs, that a humble return to God, and a cordial dedication of soul to his service, is not so slight an act of a man's life, that it should pass without any observation in doing it, or any serious reflection on having done it. Religion is a deliberate thing; it brings a man seriously to consider his ways, that he may turn his feet to God's commandments; to search and try them, that he may turn again unto the Lord. A good man is so impressed with the thoughts of God, and of eternity, that perhaps he is rather ready to be over anxiously afraid and suspicious, in a matter of so great importance; and therefore will review, on the one hand, the plan of salvation that God has laid down in his word, and on the other, the correspondency to it that he may discover in his own soul. And if there are any of you that have never been thus employed, any that have never separated yourselves awhile from other employments, that you might seek and intermeddle with this divine wisdom, you are assuredly strangers to it. If there are any of you that have never studied God's word, to learn his will from thence; that have never attended to sermons, that you might try yourselves by them, and if possible carry home something of the chief of what you hear, to assist your retired and more diligent inquiries; you may now come to a very quick conclusion, and before you leave this place, yea, before I proceed to any further particulars, you may set it down as the memorable beginning of these Lectures, and of this Discourse, "I am already proved to be an unregenerate creature: I am in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity!" Nay, you may add, that there are perhaps thousands of those that are yet unregenerate sinners, who have not been so careless and so insensible as you. For indeed, Sirs, a man may begin an examination, and start back from the prosecution of it, before it is brought to any important issue; or trying himself by false characters, he may come to a conclusion, which will be so much the more dangerous, as it has been the more deliberate. For the sake of such, therefore, I add,

2. The soul "that is not deeply convinced of its guilt before God, and desirous to seek deliverance from it by the Lord Jesus Christ," is still in an unregenerate state.

All the promises of God's paternal favour do certainly imply the promise of forgiveness; and you well know, that these are appropriated to such as humble themselves before God; and that humbling which is merely external, and implies no deep sense of inward guilt, can pass for very little with that God, who searches the heart and tries the reins of the children of men.

The Scripture assures us, that whosoever believes that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God; and nothing can be more certain from the whole tenor of it, than that he that believes not shall be damned: and surely a state of damnation is not, and cannot be, a state of regeneration. But what is this faith in Christ? Is it no more than a bare notional persuasion, that he is the Son of God? If this were all, the devils themselves believe; and many were the instances in which you know that they confessed it, and trembled before him. You cannot then be ignorant, that the faith, to which the promises of salvation are made, is a faith which receives the Lord Jesus Christ in all his offices, which trusts his atonement, as well as admits his revelation: and flies to him for righteousness and life. And how can that man seek righteousness from Christ, who is insensible of his own guilt? or how can he depend upon him for life, who is not aware that he is under a sentence of death and condemnation.

But imagine not you are secure, because you acknowledge yourselves to be sinners. If that acknowledgment be slight and formal, it shows you are strangers to the operation of that Spirit, whose office it is to convince men of sin. If you have not been made sensible of the pollution of your hearts, as well as the rebellion of your lives; if you have not received as it were a sentence of death in yourselves, and submitted to that sentence as righteous, though ever so dreadful; if you have not been made to loathe and abhor yourselves, and to repent in dust and ashes; if you have not laid your hand on your mouth, and your mouth in the dust, crying out, Unclean, unclean; and in this sense, at least, adopted that pathetic complaint, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me? it is a certain sign, that sin still reigns in your mortal bodies, and is unto this day bringing forth fruit unto death.

3. The soul "that is unconcerned about the favour of God, and communion with him," is still in an unregenerate state.

Common reason may tell you, that a soul destitute of the love of God can never be the object of his complacential regards; and that it is impossibl you should love him, while you are unconcerned about his favour, and habitually indifferent to converse with him. You believe there is a God;—you acknowledge that he is the great Benefactor of the whole world;—you know your happiness depends upon his favour;—you wish, therefore, that you may enjoy it;—that is, you wish that, some way or other, you may be happy rather than miserable. But let conscience say, whether you have ever felt, that in his favour is life? whether you have ever known, what it is to cry out with intenseness and ardour of soul, Lord, lift up the light of thy countenance upon me? Alas, Sirs, had you been sons, God would have sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts: and if this be not the sincere, if it be not the habitual, language of your soul; if you do not thus earnestly desire to live under the manifestations of the divine love, and to be able to say, Truly our communion is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ; you are spiritually dead, and under the fatal influences of that carnal mind, which being enmity against God, engages men to live contented without God in the world, so long as their corn and their wine increase. A heart thus alienated from God, was never savingly turned to him, and can have no just reason to imagine itself the object of his paternal favour.

4. The soul "that is destitute of a sincere love to mankind," has reason to consider itself as in an unregenerate state.

You may, perhaps, think it unnecessary to mention this: but the apostle was undoubtedly a much better judge, and his own words suggest this particular to me: "Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God: he that loveth not, knoweth not God, and consequently cannot be born of him; for God is love." And our Lord strongly intimates the same thought, when he exhorts his disciples to the most universal and unlimited benevolence by this argument, That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; plainly implying, that otherwise they could not really be born of God, or claim him for their Father. Regeneration is to form a man for intimate communion with the general assembly and church of the first-born, and to prepare him for the region of complete and everlasting love; and the first-fruits of it are to appear, and to be manifested here. It is a faithful saying, that they who have believed in God should be careful to maintain good works; and unfeigned love is to be the root of them: so that if you cannot stand this trial, your religious hopes are all delusive and vain.

Let me entreat you, therefore, that you would now look into your lives and hearts. Do any of the malignant passions harbour there? Ask yourselves, "Is there any of my fellow-creatures whom I would wish to see miserable; or would make so, if it were in my power to do it by the secret act of my will, so that no mortal on earth should ever know me to be the cause of their calamity?" If it be so, and this be your settled temper, you hate your brethren, and are murderers; and therefore are the children of the devil, who was a murderer from the beginning; and we may thus say of you, in the very words of our Lord, who never uttered a rash censure, You are of your father the devil, for his passions you cherish, and his lusts you would do.

But reflect further, If you wish others no harm, do you really wish them well? and that so really, and so sincerely, as to be ready to do them good? for merely to say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled, when you have it in your power to help them, is at once to mock the poor, and to despise him that made him. You that are conscious of a mean selfish temper, and wrap yourselves up, as it were, in your own separate interests, or in those of your own families, and can feel a concern for no others; you that devise what you may imagine shrewd and prudent things, but none that are liberal and compassionate; you, whose eye does not affect your heart, when you see the distresses of your brethren, while you have this world's good; how dwelleth the love of God in you? How can you imagine you are the children of him whom you so little resemble?

Nay, permit me to add once more upon this head, that, if all your compassion is only moved by men's temporal calamities, and works not in any degree with respect to their spiritual and eternal interests, you have reason to fear that it is no better than an unsanctified humanity; and, indeed, that you never have learned the worth of your own souls, while you set so little value on the souls of others, even of those to whom you profess and intend friendship. And this concluding hint is of importance, to prevent a dangerous mistake, in which too many good-natured sinners are ready to flatter themselves, and in which, perhaps, others are too ready to join in flattering them.

5. He "that does not know what it is to struggle with indwelling sin, and heartily to resolve against indulging it in any kind or degree," is undoubtedly still in an unregenerate state.

You will observe, I do not say, "that every one who knows what it is, to feel a struggle in his own mind, when assaulted by temptations to sin, is a truly good man;" the contrary is dreadfully apparent. A principle of natural conscience often makes very strong remonstrances against sin, and sends out bitter cries when subjected to its violence; and this is so far from denominating a man a real Christian, that it rather illustrates the power of sin, and aggravates its guilt. But when a man's inclinations run entirely one way, and when he gives a swing to his natural passions without any regard or restraint; when he is a stranger to any inward conflict with himself, and any victory over his own lusts and his corrupted will; it is a certain sign he is yet under the dominion of Satan, and is even to be numbered among the tamest of his slaves. For they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts; have learnt to deny themselves, and to mortify their members upon earth.

It is also of great importance to add, that there must be "a resolution to oppose sin in every kind, and in every degree:" for he that is born of God sinneth not; nay, it is elsewhere said, He cannot commit sin: and though it is too visibly true in fact, and apparent from several other passages in the very epistle whence these words are taken, that this expression is to be interpreted with some limitation; yet the least that it can be imagined to signify is this, that he does not wilfully allow himself in the practice of any sin. He has learnt to hate every false way, and to esteem all God's precepts, concerning all things, to be right: so that, upon the whole, if he might have his request, and God would grant him the thing that he longs for, it would be this, to sin no more, and to get rid of every sentiment, desire, and affection, in any degree contrary to the purity of God's nature and law. If therefore there be any of you that spare one accursed thing, though you should seem eager on destroying all the rest; if it be the secret language of your soul, "There is but one lust that I will indulge; there is but one temptation that I will comply with." I perceive your hearts are not right in the sight of God: for though you could, according to your pretended purpose, keep all the rest of the law, and yet offend in this one point alone, you would in effect be a transgressor of all. In short, he that committeth sin, is of the devil: but he that is begotten of God, keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

6. He "that does not know what it is to overcome this world, and to place his happiness in another," is yet in an unregenerate state.

This is another of those certain marks which God has given us of his own children. Whatsoever is born of God, (as it is very emphatically expressed in the original,) overcometh the world. It is not, you see, the extraordinary attainment of a few more eminent Christians; but it is an essential branch of every good man's character: for he is begotten again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, even to the hope of an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. You have reason therefore to judge very uncomfortably concerning your state, if you are strangers to this lively hope; which is a very different thing from that hope to be saved, of which some people talk in so indolent, not to say, in so profane, a manner, as to show, that it is the hope of the hypocrite, which will perish, when God takes away his soul. If you are conscious to yourselves, that you mind earthly things, your end will be destruction; for having your heart on earth, it is plain your only treasure is here; and if you govern yourselves by worldly maxims alone, and your great care be to obtain those riches and honours which the children of the world pursue: if the importance of eternity has never appeared in such a light, as to make you judge every thing trifling, that can come in competition with it; nay, whatever your views of eternity have been, if you are not practically carrying on a scheme for it; and if you cannot, and do not, deny your worldly interest, when it cannot be secured without hazarding your eternal hopes; it is plain you are friends of the world, in such a sense as none can be, but he must be an enemy of God. If indeed you were dead to the world, and your life hid with Christ in God, you would set your affections on things above, on those things which are there, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God: but the want of this temper shows, that you are carnally minded, which it is death to be; and that the redeeming love of Christ has never exerted its influence upon your souls, nor his cross had any due efficacy upon you; for if it had, the world would have been crucified to you, and you also to the world.

7. The soul "that does not long for greater improvements in the divine life," is still a stranger to the first principles of it.

You know, that we are called, as Christians, with a high and holy calling; and as he that is the Author of this calling is holy, so are we to be holy in all manner of conversation, and to be perfect, even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect. Here will therefore be room for improvement, not only during our continuance in the present life, but through all the ages of a glorious eternity: and it is the ardent desire of every good man, that in this sense, above all others, his path may be like the shining light, that shineth more and more until the perfect day. And this is the one thing that he does, or that in which all his labours centre; being conscious to himself how far he is from having already attained, or being already perfect, forgetting the things that are behind, he reacheth forth unto those things that are before, and presses toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. In this view he seriously considers the circumstances of life in which Providence has placed him, that he may observe the advantages which these circumstances give him for religious improvements; and it is delightful to him to discover such advantages.

Now if there be any of you, who know nothing of this temper, you are certainly in an unregenerate state, for none can be born of God, that do not love him; and none can truly love him, that do not earnestly desire more and more to resemble him. So that if your hearts can indulge such a thought as this, "I wish I knew how much religion would be just sufficient to save me, and I would go so far, and stop there;" your conscience must tell you, that you secretly hate religion, and are unwillingly dragged toward the form of it, by an unnatural and external violence, the fear of misery and ruin in neglecting it; and that you are not actuated by the free and liberal principles of a nature savingly renewed.

8. The soul "that does not know what it is to live by faith in Christ, and in dependence on his Spirit," is still in an unregenerate state.

We are all the children of God, by faith in Christ Jesus, if indeed we are so at all: and he that is joined to the Lord, in this sense, is one spirit with him. But if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his; for as God has predestinated us to the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ, to himself; so of his fulness it is, that all believers do receive, even grace for grace, or an abundance and variety of grace, by virtue of their union with him, who is the head; from whom the whole body, being fitly joined together, and strengthened by what every joint supplies, by an energy proportionable to every part, increases to the edifying of itself in love. These things, as you see, are not only hinted in Scripture, but are copiously insisted upon, as very material points: and though I readily acknowledge, good men may apprehend and consider them very differently, and may express those apprehensions in different phrases; yet as experience makes it plain, that those souls generally flourish most who have the most distinct conceptions of them, so I think it is plain from these scriptures, that there can be no religion at all where there is a total insensibility of them. If, therefore, there are any of you that apprehend it is enthusiasm to talk of the assistances of the Spirit; nay, I will add, if there are any of you that do not earnestly desire these assistances, and do not seek them daily from the hand of Christ, as the great covenant-head of his people; you are, I fear, strangers to some of the first principles of the oracles of God; and are sensual, not having the Spirit. And though you may now and then form a hasty, and perhaps a warm, resolution in religion, you will quickly, with the proud youth that are conceited with their own sufficiency, faint and be weary, and, with the young men, you will utterly fail; while they only that wait upon the Lord, shall renew their strength, shall mount up as on eagle's wings, and, pressing on with an unwearied pace, according to the different degrees of vigour which the different parts of their course may require, shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint. In short, if you do not thirst after the water of life, that is, (as the evangelist himself explains it,) the Spirit, which they that believe on Christ shall receive, however bountiful he is, he makes no promise to impart it to you; and if you never receive it, all your other sources of comfort will soon be dried up, and the miserable condition of the creature, that asked in vain for one drop of water to cool his tormented tongue, will certainly be yours.

Here I apprehend multitudes will miscarry, who have made a fair show in the eyes of men; and if you are condemned by this mark, I am sure you will not be acquitted by any of the preceding. For all the branches of a holy temper have such a connexion with this, and such a dependence upon it, that a man who is destitute of this can have only the semblance of the rest.

And thus, Sirs, I have, with all plainness and faithfulness, as in the sight of God, and sensible of my account to him, laid before you a variety of hints, by which I think you may safely and truly judge, whether you be or be not in an unregenerate state; and I shall now beg leave to conclude this discourse with one plain inference from the whole, viz.

That baptism is not regeneration, in the Scriptural and most important sense of the word.

To prove this as a corollary from the preceding discourse, I shall only assume this most reasonable concession, with which you may remember I at first set out; "that regeneration and being born of God signify the same thing." Now I have shown you, from a variety of Scriptures, under the former heads, that every one whom the sacred oracles represent as born of God, receiveth Christ, overcometh the world, and sinneth not. But it is too plain, that these characters do not agree to every one that is baptized; and consequently it evidently follows, that every one who is baptized is not of course born of God, or regenerate; and therefore, that baptism is not Scripture regeneration.

I think no mathematical demonstration plainer and more certain than this conclusion; and therefore, whatever great and ancient names may be urged on the other side of the question, I shall rest the matter here, without leading you into the niceties of a controversy so easily decided. I would only further observe, that they who most vigorously contend for the other manner of speaking (for after all it is but a dispute about a word) acknowledge expressly, that a man may be saved without what they call regeneration, and that he may perish with it. And though persons are taught to speak of their state, in consequence of baptism, in very high, and I fear dangerous, terms; yet when wise and good men come to explain those terms, it evidently appears, that many of whom they are used are so in a state of salvation, as to be daily obnoxious to damnation; so the children of God, as also to be the children of the devil; and so inheritors of the kingdom of heaven, as to be children of wrath, and on the brink of hell.

Where persons of real piety apprehend themselves under a necessity of using such phrases with respect to all that are baptized, we cannot blame them for endeavouring to bring down their signification as low as possible: but they will, I hope, excuse those who choose to speak in what they apprehend to be a more Scriptural, rational, and edifying language.

It was matter of conscience with me to state the matter as you have heard. I do therefore earnestly entreat you, my dearly beloved, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and for the sake of your own immortal souls, that you deceive not yourselves with vain words; but that where your eternal salvation is so plainly concerned, you bring the cause, the important cause, to an immediate trial; and if you are convinced, as I suppose many of you quickly may be, that you are at present dead in trespasses and sins, then let me beseech you to reflect on what the most transient survey of the Scripture may teach you, as to the danger of such a case. For though it will be my business, in the process of these Discourses, more largely to represent it, when I come to speak of the necessity of the new birth, God only knows whether your lives may be continued till we advance so far in the subject, and where a case of this kind is in question, the delay of a week, or even of a day, may be inevitable and eternal ruin.

SERMON XXIII.

OF THE NATURE OF REGENERATION, AND PARTICULARLY OF THE CHANGE IT PRODUCES IN MEN'S APPREHENSIONS.

2 Cor. v. 17.

If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

The knowledge of our true state in religion, is at once a matter of so great importance, and so difficult, that in order to obtain it, it is necessary we should have line upon line, and precept upon precept. The plain discourse which you heard last Lord's day, was intended to lead you into it; and I question not but I then said enough to convince many that they were in an unregenerate condition. Nevertheless, as there are various approaches towards regeneration and conversion, which on the whole fall short of it, I think it very expedient now to give you, what I may properly call the counterpart of this view; which I shall, by divine assistance, attempt from the words I have now been reading.

The apostle who wrote them was transported to such a zeal for Christ, and for the souls of men, that some thought him beside himself; and no doubt many would represent him as the greatest enthusiast upon the face of the earth. But as it was a very small thing to him to be judged of man's judgment, he calmly vindicates himself, by declaring that there was a cause for all this warmth, as the honour of God, and the Redeemer, and the eternal salvation of men, were so intimately concerned in the affair: "The love of Christ, says he, constrains us, or, as the word* properly signifies, it bears us away with it, like a mighty torrent, which we are not able to resist; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead, under the sentence of God's righteous law, or they would not have needed such an atonement as the blood of his Son; and we further judge, that he died for all, that they who now live, only in consequence of his dying love, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them." We therefore live to this Jesus; we consecrate our lives and labours to this purpose; and in consequence of it, we henceforth know no man after the flesh, that is, we do not regard our temporal interests, nor consider how we may most effectually obtain the favour and friendship of those who may be useful to us in life; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, or have expected a temporal Messiah, who should make our nation triumphant over the Gentiles, and enrich it with the spoils of other nations, yet now henceforth we know him no more under such a character. And in this respect the same temper will prevail in the heart of every real Christian; and therefore, i. e. in consequence of what was said before of the Redeemer's love, if any man be in Christ, if he be really one of his faithful servants, united to him by a lively faith, and in consequence of that union interested in his salvation, he is a new creature; his views and sentiments, his affections and pursuits, are so entirely changed, that he seems as it were to be come into a new world, and to be transformed quite into another person from what he formerly was: old things are passed away, and (behold the astonishing transformation!) all things are become new. This is the thought that I am now to illustrate; and you cannot but see how proper a foundation it will be for our discourse on the second general I proposed, which is,

Secondly, Particularly to describe the nature of that great change, which passes on every soul, that is truly regenerate, in the Scriptural and most important sense of the word.

And here it may hardly seem necessary to tell you, that I do not mean to assert, that the substance of the soul, and its natural faculties, are in a strict and proper sense changed: a man might as reasonably assert from such a scripture, that the former body was annihilated, and a new one produced; and common sense and decency will not allow us to imagine, that the apostle meant any thing of this nature, by the general terms he uses here. But the plain meaning is, that when a man becomes a real Christian, the whole temper and character of his mind is so changed, as to become different from that of the generality of mankind, and different from what it formerly was, while in an unenlightened and unrenewed state. It is not merely a little circumstantial alteration; it is not assuming a new name, professing new speculative opinions, or practising some new rites and forms: but it is becoming (as we frequently say, in our usual forms of speech) a different creature, or a new man.—And thus the sacred writers express themselves in many other passages, which very happily serve to illustrate this. They, in particular, represent God as promising, with relation to this work, "A new heart will I give them; and a new spirit will I put within them; and I will take away the heart of stone," the stubborn, obstinate, impenetrable disposition they once had, "and will give them a heart of flesh," a tender, compliant temper, which shall incline them to submit to my will with humility, and to obey it with delight. And thus, when the apostle had exhorted the Ephesians to put off, with respect to their former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt according to its deceitful lusts, he adds, And be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and put on the new man, which after God, or in conformity to his image, is created in righteousness and true holiness; which is further illustrated by his important exhortation to the Romans, Be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind. And on the same principles, what in one place he calls the new creature, in another parallel place he expresses, by faith that works by love, and by keeping the commandments of God; for all these, as equivalent characters, he opposes to circumcision and uncircumcision, or to the mere externals of a religious profession; declaring the utter insufficiency of the latter, and the absolute necessity of the former.

The general nature of this change may then be understood, by an attentive consideration of such scriptures as those mentioned above; which indeed contain what is most essential on this subject. But for the more complete illustration of the matter, I shall particularly show you, that where there is reason to speak of a man, as one of those who are in Christ Jesus, or who are truly regenerate, there will be "New apprehensions, new affections, new resolutions, new labours, new enjoyments, and new hopes:" and perhaps there are few important branches of the Christian character, which may not be introduced, as illustrating one or other of these remarks.

The former of them is indeed the foundation of the rest; because, as religion is a reasonable service, all the change which is made in the affections and resolutions, in the pursuits, enjoyments, and hopes of a good man, arises from that different view, in which he is now taught to look on those objects, the nature of which is to direct his choice, to determine his conduct, and regulate his passions: it will therefore be the business of this evening's discourse to show you,

I. That wherever there is a real principle of regeneration, there will be new apprehensions of things.

When God created the natural world, he said, in the very beginning of his work, Let there be light, and there was light: and thus he deals in this new creation, which raises the soul from a chaos, to such a beautiful, well-ordered, and well-furnished frame. God, says the apostle, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, has shined into our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ; whereas before, the understanding was darkened, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that was in them, because of the blindness or perverseness of their hearts.

Now this illumination, of which I am speaking, does not so much refer to a speculative, as to a practical and heart-impressing knowledge. It is true, that when a man once comes to be in good earnest in religion, he generally arrives at a clearer and fuller knowledge, even of the doctrines of Christianity, than he had before: for he then sets himself to inquire with greater diligence, and to seek light of the great Father of lights with greater earnestness; he gets clear of many evil affections, that put a corrupt bias upon his judgment; and he comes within the reach of those promises, "Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord, and if any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." Yet, I think, I may very properly say, that at various times, when our judgment of any object is the same, our apprehensions of it are very different. It is one thing, for instance, to believe that God is the omnipotent, all-wise, and all-gracious governor of the world; and another and very different thing, to have the heart powerfully impressed with an apprehension of his ability and readiness to help us. I will, therefore, a little more particularly illustrate those respects, in which the apprehensions of such as are really regenerate, differ from those which they formerly had: and I hope you will do yourselves the justice to reflect, as we go along, how far you have felt these apprehensions which you hear me describe; and I have a pleasing persuasion, that many of you have felt them in a much livelier manner than they can be described. I would observe then to you, that a regenerate soul has new apprehensions "of God,—of itself,—of Christ,—of eternity,—and of the way and method that God has marked out for its being happy there."

1. A regenerate soul has new apprehensions "of the blessed God."

There are very few who pretend so much as to doubt of the being of a God; and fewer yet, that will venture to deny it: and even among those who have denied it, and disputed against it, some by their own confession, have felt their hearts give them the lie, and upbraid them for using the powers of reason and speech against the Giver and Preserver of both. I persuade myself, at least, there are none that hear me this day, who would not look upon a professed atheist as a monster, unworthy to be a member of human society, and little to be trusted in any of its relations. Yet after all, while the being of the blessed God is warmly asserted, his nature is so little understood and considered, that there are thousands who may still properly be said to be without God in the world, or in practice and temper, though not in notion, to be atheists in it. Wicked men therefore, in general, are described as those that know not God: but where God has determined to glorify his mercy in the salvation of a sinner, he shines into the heart for this blessed purpose, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God. And thus the glories of the divine Being are known to the regenerate soul in such a manner, as they are not to the most acute metaphy-sician, or the sublimest philosopher, who is himself a stranger to the spiritual life.

The person of whom we now speak, has new apprehensions "of the spirituality and omnipresence of God,—of his majesty and purity,—of his power and patience,—of his goodness,—and his intimate access to men's spirits, with the reality and importance of his operations upon them." Permit me a little to represent the views of each, both to direct your inquiries, and also to impress your minds, and my own, with truths in which we have all so intimate a concern.

The divine spirituality and omnipresence is apprehended by the good man in a peculiar manner. That there is some immaterial substance, and that matter is moved by his active power continually impressed upon it, according to stated laws, is indeed so plain a dictate of reason, that I question not but the thought influences the minds of some, who have not so much acquaintance with language as to be able properly to express it: but, alas! it easily passes through, as if no way important. It is quite a different thing to feel, as it were, the presence of an infinitely intelligent and all-observing Deity, actually surrounding us in all times and places;—to say from the heart, O Lord, thou hast searched me and known me, so that thou understandest my thoughts afar off: whither shall I go from thy Spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? Thou hast beset me behind and before, and laid thine hand upon me;—to feel, as it were, the hand of God, which indeed we may feel, if we duly attend to it, in all the impressions made on our bodily senses, and on the powers of our mind;—to feel ourselves even now supported by it, and to argue from the constant support of his hand, the never-failing notice of his eye. "He reads my present thoughts; he knows even now, all the secrets of my soul, and has always observed my conduct in every the minutest particular: and recorded, in permanent characters, the whole history of my life, and of my heart; of this depraved, sinful life, of this vain, this treacherous, this rebellious heart."

With this conception of the divine observance, are closely and intimately connected new apprehensions of the purity of God, and of his infinite Majesty; views, which mutually assist and illustrate each other. The irreverence with which the generality of men behave in the presence of God, and the easiness with which they admit the slightest temptation to sin against him, plainly show what low notions they have of him: but God does, as it were, appear to the eye of a renewed mind, arrayed in his robes of light and majesty; so that he is ready to cry out, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee: I see the eternal, self-existent, self-sufficient God, who sits upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; who spreadeth out the heavens as a tent to dwell in, and looks down on the nations as the drop of a bucket, and counts them as the small dust of the balance. Who would not fear before him? who would not tremble at his presence? who would not revere that God, who is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and cannot look upon iniquity: who cannot be tempted with evil, but must see it, and hate it, even in all its forms!"

And such too are the views it has of his almighty power, that the enlightened mind will further add, "A God of almighty power, who could speak a whole world into ruin; (undoubtedly he could, for he spoke it into existence;) who by one single thought, by one silent volition, could easily abase the proudest creature in the universe; must have it in his power to bring me in a moment to the dust of death, and to the flames of hell; to lay me as low in misery, and to hold me as long in it, as he should please: this, O my soul, this is the God, against whom such feeble worms as we are daily offending, and whom we madly presume to make our enemy."

This gives the regenerate man a further sense of the patience of God than ever he had before. Others may look round upon the world, and wonder there is so much penal evil in it; but the renewed soul wonders there is not a thousand times more. When he sees, how the world lieth in wickedness; when he observes, how poor impotent mortals are, many of them perhaps, in words blaspheming the God of heaven; many more of them, most presumptuously violating all the plainest and most important precepts of his law; and most of the rest, living in a perpetual forgetfulness of him, as if he were not at all, or were not so considerable as to be any way worth their notice; such an one cannot but wonder, that the Almighty Majesty of heaven does not in a moment make himself known by the thunder of his power, and confound all their madness and folly by crushing the world with its inhabitants into ruin. He often sees the rising sun, and the descending rain, with astonishment that it should be sent down on such a world as ours.

He has also more affecting views than ever of the divine goodness. Most men speculatively believe it; and they take occasion, even from that belief, to affront it: but a good man views it at once as a delightful and a venerable thing; he fears the Lord and his goodness; and while it encourages him, guilty as he is, to repose himself upon it as his hope, it awakens a generous kind of confusion at the thought of ever having offended him, and fills his very soul with indignation at the thought of repeating such offences.

And once more, the regenerate man has quite different notions than before, of the intimate access which God has to the spirits of men, and his important power of operating upon them. The greatest part of men indeed consider not, as they ought, how the whole material world perpetually depends upon a divine agency, and is no other than one grand machine, on which the great Artificer continually acts, to make it an instrument of mercy to his sensitive and intelligent creatures. But there are yet fewer, who seriously consider how entirely the hearts of men are in the hand of the Lord, and how much depends on his influences upon them. Nevertheless, experience teaches the renewed soul, that he is the God of the spirits of all flesh; and that he not only views, but manages, them as he pleases. "Lord," does he say, "this spirit of mine is shaded with thick darkness, but thou canst illuminate it; it is diseased, but thou canst cure it; it is unstable as water, and lighter than a feather, yet thou canst fix and establish it; and whatever thou wouldst have me to be, and to do, for thy glory, and mine own happiness, thou canst work in me both to will and to perform it: so that all I need, to the rectitude and felicity of my nature, is only this, that I may have more of thine inward, vital, operative presence." It is not easy to conceive, what efficacy this thought has, for the transformation of the soul. But again,

2. New apprehensions are connected with these sentiments in the regenerate soul, "concerning itself, and its own state."

It is surprising to think, how many run through successive years in life, without ever turning the eye of the mind inward, that the soul may survey itself. I speak not of a philosophical survey of the faculties of the mind; which, though indeed in its place it be useful and entertaining, is no more necessary in its refinements to a well-ordered state, than skill in anatomy is to a healthful constitution: but I speak of those views of the mind, which are in the reach of all, how low soever their genius or their education may have been.

As all true happiness is an internal thing, wherever God intends to produce it in the heart of a revolted and corrupted creature, (and such, alas! we all naturally are,) he leads it into a view of itself; and shows it (if I may be allowed the expression) a mixture of grandeur and misery, that lies within; which yet the greatest part of mankind live and die without ever observing. "I am here," does the awakened creature say, "an intelligent being; far superior to this well-wrought frame of flesh and blood, which God has given me for a little while to command, and which I must quickly drop in the dust: I am made capable of determining my own choice, of directing my own actions, of judging concerning the importance of ends, and the propriety of means in subserviency to them; and while I see a vast variety of creatures in different forms beneath me, I see no rank of creatures above me, nothing nobler than man, here on earth, where I dwell. Yet I see man, in the midst of his glory, a feeble, dependent, mortal creature, who cannot possibly be his own end, nor can of himself alone, by any means, command or insure his own happiness.—Every thing tells me that he is the creature of God; and that it is his greatest honour and felicity to know, and practically to acknowledge, himself to be so: every thing tells me that it is most reasonable that God, who is the great original of man, should also be the end of his being; but have I made him the end of mine? My soul, thou art conscious to thyself thou hast lived in many instances without him in the world.—He has given thee, even in the system of thine own nature, and of the visible beings that are round about thee, compared with his providential interposition in the management of them, the intimations of his holy and righteous will: he has expressed these dictates far more plainly in his written word: and when thou comest to examine them, how art thou condemned by them! When thou comest to think of the spirituality and purity of his being and his law, how shameful does thy temper and thy life appear to have been! what an infinite disproportion is there between that and its perfect rule!—And whom, O my soul, hast thou offended? whose law hast thou broken? whose grace hast thou despised?—The law, the grace of that eternal God, of whom I have now been hearing; who is here present with me, who is even within me, and who sees, O my heart, (more distinctly than thou canst see,) all thy guilt, and all its aggravations. O Lord! I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes. I have talked of sin, and of the sentence of God against it, as a thing of course: but oh, my soul, it is thine own concern! The guilt, the stain of sin is still upon thee; the sentence of God is pronounced against thee; and it must be reversed, or thou art undone for ever. These irregular habits and dispositions that prevail in thee must be corrected, or they will prove thy mortal disease and everlasting torment.—Thou art a poor, weak, irresolute creature; the experience of every past day of life, since I began to think of religion at all, proves it: yet thou must, by some means or other, attain to inward strength and inward purity, or thou art lost; and all these great capacities, and glorious faculties, will but make thy ruin so much the more distinguished. Oh how weighty the care! Oh how great the charge! What shall I do, that thought, that reason, that immortality, may not be my destruction? Where shall I find a rock that will be firm enough for my support and safety? Where shall I find the means to build the fabric of such a happiness, as thine, O my soul, must be, if ever I am happy at all?"

Thus does God teach the mind, by its inward reviews and reflections, this important lesson of its own impotence and guilt, of its depravity and ruin; and so prepares it for those new apprehensions of Christ which I mentioned as the third particular.

3. The regenerate soul has new apprehensions "concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, considered as a Mediator in general, and as such a particular Mediator as he is exhibited in the word of God."

That affecting view which the regenerate soul has of the majesty, glory, power, and purity of the blessed God, will undoubtedly convince him how unfit he is in himself to appear before his awful presence. He is ready to sink down in the dust at the very thought, and to say, "Who is able to stand before such a great and holy God as thou art? If I were in all the original rectitude and glory of my nature, I could not do it: how much less, surrounded as I am, with so much guilt, with so much pollution! I need, as it were, a days-man betwixt us, who might lay his hand upon us both, who should transact affairs in my name with God, and bring the peaceful messages of God to me: let such a one speak with me, and I will hear; but let not God speak with me, lest I die."

And when he comes to take a more near and intimate view of this Mediator which God has exhibited in the gospel, the renewed soul is even charmed and transported with the view: and that Jesus, whose name he before pronounced with so much coldness, that the very mention of it was a kind of profanation, now is regarded by him as the chiefest among ten thousand. He beholds his glory, as that of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. The union of the divine and human nature in the person of Christ, though it appears indeed a mystery, which he cannot fully explain, is nevertheless a glorious certainty, which in the general he most cordially believes. He sees Emanuel, God dwelling with us in human flesh, and acquiesces in the sight; while the rays of divine glory are attempered by passing through the veil, that is to say, his flesh. He considers Christ as made of God unto him wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: and each of these views rejoices him to the very heart. "Ignorant as I am, I shall be taught and instructed by him, that great Prophet, whom God sent into the world: by him, who is incarnate wisdom, as well as incarnate love; whose words resound in the gospel, and whose Spirit seals the instructions of his word. Guilty as I am, my crimes shall be expiated; for there is redemption in his blood, even the forgiveness of sins: there is an everlasting righteousness that he has introduced: and O how richly will it adorn my soul!—This pollution of mine shall not for ever exclude me from a comfortable intercourse with the pure Majesty of heaven: for Christ is come to be my sanctification, and he can cleanse me by his Spirit, and transform me into that divine, delightful image which I have lost.—Victorious Lord, how easily canst thou redeem me from that state of servitude, in which I have been kept so long complaining! how easily, and how powerfully, canst thou vindicate me into the glorious liberty of the children of God!—Blessed Jesus, thou art my light and my strength, my hope and my joy! Thou art just such a Saviour as my necessity requires; thou fillest up all my wants, and all my wishes; thou art all in all to me! I would not be ignorant of thee for ten thousand worlds; I would not live a day, nor an hour, without recollecting who and what thou art, and maintaining that intercourse with thee, which is the life of my soul."

4. The regenerate soul has also new apprehensions "of the importance of eternity, when compared with time and all its concerns."

It is indeed a most pitiable thing, and awakens our astonishment, grief, and indignation, to observe how the things of this world press down immortal spirits, and reduce them almost indeed to a state of brutality. Most deplorable it is, to see the power and energy of those motives, which are taken merely from this earth, and its little concernments; so that if a man did but know what was the favourite vanity, he might almost predict, from the knowledge of circumstances, how a man's actions would be ordered; and might almost be sure that he would follow, whithersoever this interest, or that pleasure, this ambitious, or that mercenary, view, called him; though all the prospects of an eternal world pleaded the contrary way. Such is the folly and madness that is in men's hearts while they live; and after that, they go down to the dead, and spend that immortal duration, which they have despised, in fruitless lamentations. Fatal delusion! which it is the great design of the gospel to cure.

But when a soul becomes wise to salvation, it is taught to look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; because it has now a full sense of what before it only notionally confessed, that the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.—Eternity! it is impossible I should tell you how much an eye, that is enlightened by God, sees and reads, as it were, in that one word; while one scene beyond another is still opening on the mind, till its sight and its thoughts are swallowed up: and as the creatures are as nothing with respect to God, so all the interests of time, with respect to eternity, appear as less than nothing and vanity. To be made for an everlasting existence appears in so awful a view, that while it has some pleasing hope, it rejoices with trembling; and every remaining fear, with relation to this great interest, seems a greater evil than the certainty of any temporal calamity.

I might add upon this head, that the regenerate soul has not only new views of the importance, but likewise of the nature, of the invisible and eternal state; and particularly of the nature of the celestial happiness. It does not consider it merely, or chiefly, as a state of corporeal enjoyment, formed to gratify and delight the senses; but as a state of perfect conformity to God, and most endearing intercourse with him; of which, as it begins already by divine grace to taste the pleasures, so it most ardently thirsts after them; and would be heartily willing to lose this body for ever, and to bid an eternal adieu to every object capable of giving it delight; rather than it would consent to lose, in a perpetual succession of such objects, the sight of the Father of spirits, and that sensibility of his love which adds the most substantial solidity, and exalted relish, to every inferior good that can be desired from it.

5. A regenerate man has also new apprehensions "of the way which God has marked out to this happiness."

Nothing is more common than for carnal and ignorant men to imagine, that it is a very easy thing to get to heaven; and upon this presumption, they hew out to themselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water; and often live and die with a lie in their right hand. But the renewed soul, having such awful notions of the blessed God, and such apprehensions of the excellency and glory of the heavenly state, as you have heard, deeply feels how absolutely necessary it is, that something of a very great and important change should pass in the mind of that sinful creature, that ever hopes to be a partaker of it. He sees, that it is impossible any external rite should secure so great an end; impossible, that baptism should be regeneration, in that sense in which the Scripture uses the word, or that by this alone, though ever so regularly administered, a man's eternal happiness should be secured. He sees, that to be associated to this or that party of Christians, to join with established or separate churches, and to be ever so zealous for their respective order, worship, and discipline, is a thing quite of foreign consideration here; and that the best or the worst of men may be, and probably are, on one side, and on another; nay that ignorance, pride, and bigotry may take occasion from hence, to render men further from the kingdom of God, than any mistake in judgment or practice on these disputed points could have set them.

No, my brethren, when a man's eyes are enlightened by God's renewing Spirit, he sees and feels that, in the language of Scripture, he must be created anew in Christ Jesus: he sees, that holiness is a character without which no man shall see the Lord; and he is perhaps little anxious, whether this, or the faith that produces it, shall be called a condition, or a qualification, or an instrument, while he sees he must perish without it: he sees, that as it is absolutely necessary, so it is very extensive, as the commandment, which is its rule, is exceeding broad: he sees, that it must not only effectually regulate the actions of his life, but control all the sentiments of his heart: nay, he sees, it must not only be submitted to as a necessary, but be chosen as a most amiable, thing; and accordingly, he does choose it as such.—The unregenerate soul, when he hears of repentance and reformation, though he understands not half that it means, nor is aware of what will, in fact, be the greatest difficulty of it, looks upon it at best as a nauseous medicine, which he must take, or die; but the regenerate man finds his heart so wonderfully and so happily changed, that he regards it for itself, as the food, the health, and the life of his soul; as that which necessarily brings its own pleasures, and, in a considerable degree, its own reward, along with it; so that now, as David beautifully expresses it, He openeth his mouth, and panteth, because he longs for God's commandments.

And I will add once more, the good man is also made sensible of the place which faith and holiness hold, in the scheme which God has laid, for our justification before him, and our acceptance with him. I do not say, that all Christians conceive of this with equal perspicuity, or express their conceptions with equal exactness: the most candid allowance should here be made for the different ideas they fix to the same phrases, as they have been used to look upon them with veneration, or with suspicion. But this I will venture to say, because I am persuaded the Scripture will bear me out in it, "that the confidence of a regenerate soul is not fixed on his own holiness, or faith, as the meritorious cause of his acceptance with God." He is deeply and cordially sensible, that he is made accepted in the Beloved; and seeing nothing but guilt, and weakness, and ruin in himself, he ascribes to the blessed Jesus, and to the riches of God's free grace in him, his righteousness, his strength, and his salvation. And where a man is thus persuaded, I think he must, in effect, believe, even though he might scruple in words expressly to own it, "that Christ, as our great Surety, having perfectly obeyed the law of God himself, and by his blood having fully satisfied the divine justice for the breach of it, we, on our believing in him by a vital faith, are justified before God by the imputation of his perfect righteousness." This latter way of stating it, when rightly explained, appears just equivalent to the former: and it is a manner of conceiving and expressing it, which, when rightly understood, seems extremely suitable to that deep humility, and poverty of spirit, to which the renewed soul is brought, when like a new-born babe, it desires the sincere milk of the word, that it may grow thereby. But as the mind, at such a time, finds little inclination to contend about words and phrases, it would be much less proper for me to enter into any controversy about them here.

Let it suffice for the present, that I have given you this plain representation of that change which is wrought in a man's apprehensions, when he is made a new creature. When old things are passed away, he has new apprehensions of God, of himself, of Christ, of eternity, and of the way to obtain the happiness of it; and as at this happy time all things are become new, there are "new affections, new resolutions, new labours, new enjoyments, and new hopes," which are the result of the change already described. But it will be much more difficult to reduce what I have to offer on these heads within the bounds of the next discourse, than proper to attempt any of them in this. Go home, my friends, and try yourselves by what you have already heard; and be assured, that if you are condemned by this part of the description, it is impossible you should be approved by any that will follow; since they have all their foundation in this.

SERMON XXIV.

ON THE NATURE OF REGENERATION, WITH RESPECT TO THE CHANGE IT PRODUCES IN MEN'S AFFECTIONS, RESOLUTIONS, LABOURS, ENJOYMENTS, AND HOPES.

2 Cor. v. 17.

If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new.

Among the various subjects which exercise the thoughts and tongues of men, few are more talked of than religion. But it is melancholy to think how little it is understood, and how much it is mistaken and misrepresented, in the world. The text before us gives a very instructive view of it; such a view, that I am sure an experimental knowledge of its sense would be infinitely preferable to the most critical and exact knowledge of all the most curious passages, both of the Old Testament and the New. From it, you know, I have begun to describe that great change, which the word of God teaches us to represent under the notion of regeneration, or, according to the language of St. Paul, in this passage of his writings, by a new creation. I know I am explaining it before many, who have been much longer acquainted with it than myself, and, it becomes me to believe, before many that have attained much higher advancements in it: but I fear also, at the same time, I speak of it before many who are yet strangers to it; and I am labouring, by the plainest addresses that I can, to give them at least some just ideas of it. O that, to all the descriptions that either have or shall be given, God may, by his grace, add that understanding which arises from feeling correspondent impressions on the mind!

I have already endeavoured to illustrate those new apprehensions, which arise in the regenerate mind; apprehensions of the blessed God, of itself, of Christ, of the eternal world, and of the way to obtain the happiness of it. It now remains, that I consider those "new affections, resolutions, labours, enjoyments, and hopes," which result from them. I observe, therefore,

II. That these new apprehensions will be attended with new affections.

I readily acknowledge, that the degree in which the affections operate may, and will be, different in different persons, according to their natural constitution: but as, in some degree or another, they make an essential part of our frame, it is impossible but they must be impressed with a matter of such infinite importance, as religion will appear. And the apprehensions described above, must awaken the exercise of correspondent affections, and direct them to objects very different from those by which they were before excited, and on which they were fixed. And here now,

1. This may be especially illustrated in love.

Love is indeed the ruling passion of the mind, and has all the rest in an avowed and real subjection to it. And here lies the very root of human misery in our fallen state: we are naturally lovers of ourselves in a very irregular degree; lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. But, on the contrary, the first and great commandment of the law is written in the breast of every regenerate man: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. It is true indeed, that if his soul were perfectly delivered into this mould, and his attainments in divine love were complete, there would be an end of all sin, and almost of all calamity too; for what evil could assail or impress a mind entirely and unchangeably fixed upon God? yet that the love of God should be the prevailing affection, is not merely a circumstance, but an essential part, of true religion. While the good man sees him who is invisible, as infinitely perfect in himself, and as the Author of being and happiness to the whole creation, he cannot but acknowledge, that he is, beyond comparison, the most amiable of all objects.

And though it is certain, that nothing can so much induce and inflame our love to God, as a well-grounded assurance, that he is become our God, and our Father in Christ; yet before the regenerate soul has attained to this, a sense of those favours which he receives from God in common with the whole human race, and more especially of those which are inseparable from a Christian profession, together with the apprehension of his being accessible through a Mediator, and reconcilable to sinful men, will diffuse some delightful sense of God over the mind, which will grow sweeter in proportion to the degree in which his own hopes brighten and settle, while they are growing toward the full assurance of faith.

And as the real Christian loves him that begat, he loves him also that is begotten of him. He loves the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, viewing him, not in a cold and insensible manner, as he once did, but with inflamed affections, as the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. If he knows in any degree the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, in becoming incarnate for the salvation of his people, in making himself a sacrifice for their sins, and paying his life for the ransom of their lives; he feels himself drawn toward Jesus, thus lifted up on the cross; and the love of Christ constrains him to such a degree, that he longs to find out some acceptable method to express his inward and overbearing sense of it. How divided soever true Christians may be in other respects, they all agree in this, in loving that Jesus whom they have not seen.

We may further recollect on this head, that the apostle in a solemn manner adjures Christians by the love of the Spirit, thereby plainly implying, that such a love to him is an important branch of their character; and it must be so in all those who regard him, as every regenerate soul does, as the author of divine light and life, and as the source of love and happiness, by whom this love of God is shed abroad in the heart, while it is enlarged with sacred delight to run the way of his commandments; as that Spirit, by whom we are sealed to the day of redemption, and who brings down the foretastes of heaven to the heart in which he dwells, and which, by his presence, he consecrates as the temple of God.

And most natural is it, that a soul filled with these impressions and views should overflow with unutterable joy, and feeling itself thus happy in an intercourse with its God, should be enlarged in love to man; for, says the apostle, ye are taught of God to love one another. Those whom he apprehends as his brethren by regenerating grace, he knows are with him beloved of the Lord; and as he hopes to dwell with them for ever in glory, he must love them so far as he knows them now. And though a narrow education, and that bigotry which sometimes conceals itself under very honourable and pious names, may perhaps influence even a sanctified heart, so far as to entertain unkind suspicions as to those whose religious sentiments may differ from his own, and it may be, to pass some rash censures upon them; yet, as his acquaintance with them increases, and he discerns, under their different forms, the traces of their common Father, his prejudices wear off, and that sometimes by very sensible degrees; and Christians receive one another, as Christ has received them all. And where the good man cannot love others with a love of complacency and esteem, he at least beholds them with a love of compassion and pity; and remembers the relation of fellow-creatures, where he sees no reason to hope that they are fellow-heirs with him. In a word, the heart is melted down into tenderness; it is warmed with generous sentiments; it longs for opportunities of diffusing good of all kinds, both temporal and spiritual, wide as its influence can reach; it beats with an ardour which sometimes painfully recoils upon a man's self, for want of ability to help others in proportion to his desire to do it: and that God who knows all the inmost workings of his mind, hears many an importunate intercession for others in the hours of solemn devotion, and many a compassionate ejaculation, which he is occasionally sending up to heaven from time to time, as he passes through so sinful and so calamitous a world.

These are the ruling affections in the heart of a good man; and though it is neither reasonable nor possible, that he should entirely divest himself of self-love, yet he endeavours to regulate it so, that it may not interfere with the more important consideration of general good. Self has the lowest place in his regards, nor does he limit his affection to a party; but aiming at extensive usefulness, he guards against those immoderate attachments to particular friendships, and those extravagant sallies of personal fondness, which are often no more than self-love under a specious disguise; which at once alienate the heart from God, and contract the social affections within very narrow, and those very irregular, bounds; and so prove almost as fatal to the health of the mind, as an excessive flow of blood into one part would be to that of the body.

I have enlarged so copiously on this change in the leading affection of the mind, that I must touch in a more transient manner on the rest. I add, therefore,

2. That a regenerate soul has new aversions.

He once hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord. He hated the light, which disclosed to the aching eye of his conscience the beloved and indulged irregularities of his heart. He hated every thing that laid an embargo upon his lust; and was ready to count those for his enemies that plainly admonished him, and secretly to dislike those whose conduct even silently reproved him. But now all these things are amiable to him; and those are esteemed his most valuable friends, whose examples may be most edifying, whose instructions may be most useful, and whose admonitions may be most faithful. For he now hates every false way; yea, and every vain thought too. He looks upon every irregular desire as an enemy, which he longs utterly to subdue; and especially strives against that sin which does most easily beset him, and abhors it more than he ever delighted in it. And though he rather pities than hates the persons of the most wretched and mischievous transgressors, yet he can no longer continue an endearing friendship with those who were once his seducers to sin, and his companions in it. In this sense, like David, he hates the congregation of evil-doers, and will not sit with the wicked; and if they will not be wrought upon by his compassionate endeavours to reclaim them, he will soon break off the intercourse, and say, Depart from me, ye evil-doers, for I determine that I will keep the commandments of my God.

3. The regenerate man has also new desires.

There was a time, when sinful passions, as the apostle expresses it, did work in his members to bring forth fruit unto death. He was fulfilling the desires of the flesh, and of the mind, and making provision to fulfil the lusts of both. But now he earnestly desires a conformity to God, as his highest happiness; and can look up to him, and say, "O Lord, the desire of my soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee; to maintain such a sense of thy presence at all times, as may influence my heart to think, my lips to speak, and my hands to act, in a manner suitable to that remembrance, and agreeable to thy wise and holy will." He now hungers and thirsts after righteousness; feels as real an appetite after more advanced degrees of piety and holiness, as he ever felt towards the gratification of his senses; and esteems the proper methods of attaining these advanced degrees, even more than his necessary food. Instead of desiring to run through a long course of animal enjoyments, he desires to get above them; longs to be a pure and triumphant spirit in the refined regions of immortality; and is willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.

But I wave the further illustration of this, till I come to consider the new hopes which inspire him. I therefore add, as a necessary consequence of these new desires,

4. That the regenerate man has new fears.

Pain and sorrow, disappointment and affliction, he naturally feared; and the forebodings of his own mind would sometimes awaken the fears of future punishment, according to the righteous judgment of an offended God: but now he fears not merely punishment, but guilt: fears the remonstrance of an injured conscience; for he reverences conscience as God's vicegerent in his bosom. He therefore fears the most secret sins, as well as those which might occasion public disgrace; yea, he fears, lest by a precipitate and inconsiderate conduct he should contract guilt before he is aware. He fears, lest he should inadvertently injure and grieve others, even the weakest and the meanest. He fears using his liberty, in a manner that might insnare his brethren, or might occasion any scandal to a Christian profession: for such is the sensibility of his heart in this respect, that he would be more deeply concerned for the dishonour brought to God, and the reproach which might be thrown on religion by any unsuitable conduct of his; than merely for that part of the shame that might immediately and directly fall upon himself. But again,

5. The regenerate man has new joys.

These arise chiefly from an intercourse with God through Jesus Christ; and from a review of himself, as under the sanctifying influences of his grace, and as brought into a state of favour with him, in proportion to the degree in which he can discern himself in this character and state.

You know David, speaking of God, calls him his exceeding joy; and declares the gladness he had put into his heart, by lifting up the light of his countenance upon him, to be far beyond what they could have, whose corn and wine increased. And the apostle Paul speaks of Christians, as joying in God through Jesus Christ, and as rejoicing in Christ Jesus: and Peter also describes them as those, who believing in him, though unseen, rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory.

Perhaps there was a time, when the good man censured all pretences of this kind, now at least in these latter days of Christianity, as an empty enthusiastic pretence: but since he has tasted that the Lord is gracious, he has that experimental knowledge of their reality and excellence, which he can confidently oppose to all the most artful and sophistical cavils; and could as soon doubt, whether the sun enlightens his eyes, and warms his body, as he could question, whether God has ways of manifesting himself to souls when it is felt with unutterable delight: and when thus entertained, he can adopt David's words, and say, that his soul is satisfied as with marrow and fatness, so that with joyful lips he praises God, when his meditation of him is thus sweet, and God says unto his soul, I am thy salvation.

The survey of the Lord Jesus Christ gives him also unutterable joy: while he reflects on that ample provision, which God has made by him, for the supply of all his necessities, and that firm security which is given to his soul by a believing union with Christ, whereby his life is connected with that of his Saviour. In his constant presence, in his faithful care, he can boast all the day long; and that friendship, which establishes a community of interests between him and his Lord, engages him to rejoice in that salvation and happiness, to which he is advanced at the right hand of God, and gives him, by joyful sympathy, his part with Christ in glory, before he personally arrives at the full possession of it.

I add, that he also rejoices in the consciousness of God's gracious work upon his own soul, so far as he can discern the traces of it there. He delights to feel himself, as it were, cured of the mortal disease with which he once saw himself infected; to find himself in health and vigour of mind, renewed to a conformity with the divine image. He delights to look inward, and see that transformation of soul which has made the wilderness like the garden of the Lord, so that instead of the thorn there shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier the myrtle. Thus the good man is satisfied from himself; and though he humbly refers the ultimate glory of all to that God, by whose grace he is what he is, he enters with pleasure into his own mind, and reckons it a part of gratitude to his great Benefactor, to enjoy with as high a relish as he can the present workings of divine grace within him, as well as the pleasing prospect of what it will further do.

But this head has so near a resemblance to some that are to follow, that were I to enlarge upon it, as I easily might, I should leave room for nothing different to be said upon them. I will only add,

6. That as the counterpart of this, new sorrows will arise in the mind of a regenerate man.

These are particularly such as spring—from the withdrawings of God's presence,—from the remainder of sin in the soul,—and from the prevalence of it in the world about him.

The regenerate man will mourn, "when the reviving manifestations of God's presence are withdrawn from his soul." It seems very absurd to interpret the numberless passages in the sacred writers, in which they complain of the hidings of God's face from them, as if they merely referred to the want of temporal enjoyments, or to the pressure of temporal calamities. If the light of God's countenance, which they so expressly oppose to temporal blessings, signify a spiritual enjoyment, the want of it must relate to spiritual desertion. And I believe there are few Christians in the world who are entirely unacquainted with this. They have most of them their seasons when they walk in darkness, and see little or no light: and this, not only when anxious fears arise with relation to their own spiritual state; but at some other times, when though they can in the main call God their Father, yet he seems as it were to stand afar off, and to continue them at a distance, which wears the face of unkindness, especially under temptations and other afflictions, in which they lose their lively sense of God's presence, and that endearing freedom of converse with him, which, through the influence of the Spirit of adoption on their souls, they have sometimes known. If this be mysterious and unintelligible to some of you, I am heartily sorry for it; but I do not remember that I was ever intimately acquainted with any one, who seemed to me a real Christian, that has not, upon mentioning the case, acknowledged, that he has felt something of it: at least I will boldly venture to say this, that if you are truly regenerate, and do not know what I mean by it, it is because you have hitherto been kept in a continual flow of holy joy, or at least in a calm and cheerful persuasion of your interest in the divine favour: and even such may see the day, when, strong as their mountain seems to stand, God may hide his face to their trouble: or, however, they will infer from what they now feel, that it must be a mournful case whenever it occurs; and that sorrow, in such a circumstance, will soon strike on a truly sanctified heart, and wound it very deep.

The sorrow of a good man also arises "from the remainder of sin in his soul." Though he is upright before God, and proves it by keeping himself from his iniquity; yet he cries out, Who can understand his errors? who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin? A sense of the sinfulness of his nature humbles him in the dust; and the first risings of irregular inclinations and passions give him a tender pain, with which a carnal heart is unacquainted, even when sin is domineering within him.

And once more, "the prevalence of sin in the world around him," is a grief to one that is born of God. It pierces him to the heart to see men dishonouring God, and ruining themselves; he beholds transgressors, as David well expresses it, with a mixture of indignation and sorrow; and when he seriously considers how common, and yet how sad, a case it is, he can perhaps borrow the words of the same prophet, so far as to say, that rivers of waters run down his eyes, because men keep not the law of God. Now, as these are sorrows that seldom do at all affect the heart of an unregenerate man, I thought it the more proper to mention them, to assist you in your inquiries into your own state.

Such are the affections of love and aversion, of desire and fear, of joy and sorrow, which fill the breast of the regenerate man, and naturally arise from those new apprehensions which are described under the former head. I add,

III. That he has also new resolutions.

You will easily apprehend I speak of those that are formed for the service of God, and against sin.

I readily acknowledge, that there are often, in unregenerate men, some resolutions of this kind, and perhaps those very warm, and for the present very sincere; yet there is considerable difference between them and those we are now to represent; as the resolutions of the truly good man are more universal, more immediate, and more humble.

1. The resolutions which he now forms are more universal than they ever were before.

He does not now resolve against this or that sin, but against all; against sin, as sin, as opposite to the holiness of God, and destructive of the honour and happiness of the rational creation. He does not say, with Naaman, concerning this or that more convenient iniquity, The Lord pardon thy servant in this thing; nor does he resolve to excuse himself in an indulgence, even to that sin which does most easily beset him: but rather, in his general determination against sin, and in those solemn engagements with which such determinations may be attended, he fixes especially upon those sins which he might before have been most ready to except.

2. The resolutions of the regenerate man are more immediate.

It very frequently happens, that while others are under awakening impressions, as they see a necessity for parting with their sins, and engaging in what they may call a religious life, they resolve upon it: but then they think it may be delayed a little longer; perhaps a few years, or at least a few weeks or days; or they, perhaps, refer it to some remarkable period which is approaching, which they flatter themselves they shall make yet more remarkable, as the era of their reformation; but, in the mean time, they will take their farewell of their lusts by a few more indulgences: and thus they delude themselves, and rivet on their chains faster than before. But the good man, with David, makes haste, and delays not to keep the commandments of God. He is like the prodigal, who, as soon as ever he said, I will arise and go to my father, immediately arose and came to him. He reckons the time he has already spent in the service of sin may suffice, and that indeed it is far more than enough: he wishes he could call back that which is past; but he determines that he will not take one step further in this unhappy path. He fully purposes, that he will never once more deliberately and presumptuously offend God, in any matter, great or small; if any thing can be called small, which is a deliberate and apprehended offence: and he determines, that from this moment he will yield himself to God, as alive from the dead, and employ his members as instruments of righteousness. But then,

3. His resolutions are more modest and humble than they have ever been before.

And this indeed is the great circumstance that renders them more effectual.—When an awakened sinner feels himself most enslaved to his vices, he pleases himself with this thought, that there is a secret kind of spring in his mind, which when he pleases to exert, he can break through all at once, and commence, whenever that unhappy necessity comes upon him, a very religious man in a moment. And when conscience presses him with the memory of past guilt, and the representation of future danger, he cuts off these remonstrances with a hasty resolve, "I will do so no more:" but then, perhaps, the effect of this may not last a day; though possibly it may, at other times, continue a few weeks or months, where the grosser acts of sin are concerned: and indeed his resolutions seldom reach further than these; for the necessity of a sanctified heart is a mystery which he has never yet learned. But a truly regenerate man has learned wisdom from this experience of his own, and the observation of other men's, frailty. He feels his own weakness, and is so thoroughly aware of the treachery of his own heart, that he is almost afraid to express in words the purpose which his very soul is forming; he is almost afraid to turn that purpose into a vow before God, lest the breach of that vow should increase his guilt; but this he can say, with repenting Ephraim, Lord, turn thou me, and I shall be turned; and with David, hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps may not slip. "I am exceeding frail; but, Lord, be thou surety for thy servant for good, and then I shall be safe! Do thou rescue me from temptations, and I shall be delivered! Do thou fill my heart with holy sentiments, and I will breathe them out before thee! Do thou excite and maintain a zeal for thy service, and then I will exert myself in it!" And when once a man is come to such a distrust of himself; when, like a little child, he stretches out his hand to be led by his heavenly Father, and trusts in his guardian care alone for his security and comfort; then out of weakness he is made strong, and goes on safe, though perhaps trembling; and sees those that made the loudest boasts, and placed the greatest confidence in themselves, falling on the right hand and on the left, and all their bravery melting away like snow before the sun.

IV. The regenerate man has new labours and employments.

Not that his former employment in secular life is laid aside: it would ordinarily be a very dangerous snare for a man to imagine that God requires this. On the contrary, the apostle gives it in charge to Christian converts, that in what calling soever a man is found, when he is called into the profession of the gospel, he should therein abide with God. But when he becomes a real Christian, he prosecutes this calling, whatever it be, with a new spirit and temper, from new principles, and to new purposes.

While his hands are labouring in the world, his heart is often rising to God; he consecrates his work to the divine honour, and to the credit of religion; and desires, that his merchandise and his gain may in this sense be holiness to the Lord, by employing it to support the family which Providence has committed to his charge, and to relieve the poor which Christ recommends to his pity: and as he depends upon God to give him wisdom and success in the conduct of his affairs, he ascribes the glory of that success to him; "not sacrificing to his own net, nor burning incense to his own drag."

And I will further add, that regeneration introduces a set of new labours, added to the former, with which the man was before utterly unacquainted.—We may consider as the principal and chief of these, the great labour of purifying the heart, of conquering sinful inclinations and affections, and of approaching God by a more intimate access and more endeared converse. Now they that imagine this to be an easy matter, know little of the human heart, little of the spirituality of God's nature and his law. Give me leave to say, that the labours of the body, in cultivating the earth, are much more easily performed than this spiritual husbandry. To weed a soil so luxuriant in evil productions, and to raise a plentiful harvest of holy affections and actions in a soil so barren of good; to regulate appetites and passions so exorbitant as those of the human heart naturally are, and to awaken in it suitable affections; to be abundant in the fruits of righteousness, and to converse with God in the exercise of devotion: these are no little things; nor will a little resolution, watchfulness, and activity, suffice, in order to the discharge of such a business. It is comparatively easy to go through the forms of prayer and praise, whatever they are; to read, or from present conception to utter, a few words before God; but to unite the heart in God's service, to wrestle with him for a blessing, to pour out the heart before him, to speak to him as searching the very heart; so that he should say, "This is prayer:" this, my brethren, is a work indeed; and he that is conscientious in the discharge of it will find, that it is not to be despatched in a few hasty moments, nor without serious reflection, and a resolute watch maintained over the spirit.

New labours also arise to the regenerate soul, in consequence of the concern it has to promote religion in the world.—Being possessed, as I formerly showed you the heart of the good man is, with unfeigned love to his fellow-creatures, and knowing of how great importance religion is to the happiness of men, he pleads earnestly with God for the propagation and success of the gospel; and he endeavours, according to his ability and opportunity, to promote it; to promote pure and undefiled religion in his family and his neighbourhood, even in all around him. And this requires observation and application, that this attempt may be prudently conducted, and great resolution, in order to its being rendered effectual: it requires great diligence in watching over ourselves, lest our examples prove inconsistent with our precepts; and no small degree of courage, considering how averse the generality of mankind are to admonitions and reproofs; in consequence of which, a person can hardly act the part of a faithful friend without exposing himself to the hazard of being accounted an enemy.

Such are the new labours of the real Christian: let any man try to perform them, and he will not find them light: but to encourage the attempt, let me further add,

V. That the regenerate soul has its new entertainments too.

He has pleasures, which a stranger intermeddles not with, and which the world can neither give, nor take away: pleasures, which a thousand times overbalance the most painful labours, and the most painful sufferings too; and which sweetly mingling themselves with the various circumstances of life, through which the Christian passes, do, as it were, gild all the scene, and make all the fatigues and self-denial of his life far more agreeable, than any of those delights the worldling, or the sensualist, can find in the midst of his unbounded and studied indulgences.—But here I shall be in great danger of repeating what I said under a former head, when I was speaking of the new joys which the Christian feels, in consequence of the great change that regeneration makes in his soul: and therefore, omitting what I then observed, concerning the pleasure of communion with God through Christ, and of perceiving a work of divine grace upon the soul, I shall now touch upon some other sources of exalted entertainment, which did not so directly fall under that head.

1. The Christian finds new pleasures in the word of God.

You know with what relish the saints of old spake of it. "Thy words were found," says the prophet, "and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart." "Thy statutes," says the Psalmist, "are more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold; they are sweeter also than honey, and the honeycomb."—The apostle Peter beautifully represents this, when he exhorts the saints to whom he wrote, as new-born babes to desire the sincere milk of the word, that they might grow thereby. And the infant that smiles on the breast, and with such eagerness and delight draws its nourishment from it, seems an amiable image of the humble Christian, who receives the kingdom of God, and the word of that kingdom, as a little child: who lays up Scripture in his heart, and draws forth the sweetness of it, with a firm persuasion, that it is indeed the word of God, and was appointed by him for the food of his soul.

2. He also finds new pleasures in the ordinances of divine worship.

He is glad when it is said unto him, Let us go into the house of the Lord. He indeed esteems the tabernacles of the Lord as amiable, and regards a day in his courts as better than a thousand elsewhere.—And this pleasure arises, not merely from any thing peculiar in the administrations of this or that man who officiates in holy things; but from the nature of the exercise in general, and from a regard to the divine authority of those institutions which are there observed. He feels a sacred delight in an intercourse with God in those solemnities; in comparison of which, all the graces of composition and delivery appear as little as the harmony of instruments, or the perfume of incense, to one of the Old-Testament saints, when compared with the light of God's countenance, which was lifted up on the pious worshipper under the Mosaic forms, when in his temple every one spake of his glory. One thing has he desired of the Lord, and that he seeks after, that he may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of his life; not to amuse his vain imagination, not to gratify his ear, not to indulge his curiosity with useless inquiries, nor merely to exercise his understanding with sublime speculations; but to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple.

3. He likewise finds a new entertainment in the conversation of Christian friends.

He now knows what it is to have fellowship with those whose communion is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. His delight is now in them that are truly the excellent of the earth. He delights to dismiss the usual topics of modern conversation, that some religious subject may be assumed, not as matter of dispute, but as matter of devout recollection; and loves to hear the plainest Christian express his experimental sense of divine things. Those sentiments of piety and love, which come warm from a gracious heart, are always pleasing to him; and those appear the dearest bands of friendship, which may draw him nearer to his heavenly Father, and unite his soul in ties of more ardent love to his Redeemer. A society of such friends is indeed a kind of anticipation of heaven; and to choose and delight in such, is no contemptible token, that the soul has attained to some considerable degree of preparation for it. I only add,

VI. That in consequence of all this, the regenerate soul has new hopes and prospects.

Men might be very much assisted in judging of their true state, if they would seriously reflect what it is they hope and wish for? what are those expectations and desires that most strongly impress their minds? A vain mortal, untaught and unchanged by divine grace, is always dressing up to himself some empty phantom of earthly happiness, which he looks after and pursues; and foolishly imagines, "could I grasp it, and keep it, I should be happy." But divine grace teaches the real Christian to give up these empty schemes: "God," does he say, "never intended this world for my happiness: he will make it tolerable to me; he will give me so much of it as he sees consistent with my highest interest; he will enable me to derive instruction, and it may be consolation, out of its disappointments and distresses: but he reserves my inheritance for the eternal world. I am begotten again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, even to the hope of an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away: and though it be, for the present, reserved in heaven, it is so safe, and so great, that it is well worth my waiting for, though ever so long; for the things that are not seen are eternal." And this indeed is the true character of a good man. Eternity fills his thoughts; and growing sensible, in another manner than he ever was before, of the importance of it, he pants for the enjoyment of eternal happiness. Assign any limited duration to his enjoyment of God in the regions of glory, and you would overwhelm him with disappointment: talk of hundreds, of thousands, of millions of years, the disappointment is almost equal: periods like these seem scarce distinguishable from each other, when compared with an eternal hope. To eternity his desires and expectations are raised; and he can be contented with nothing less than eternity: perfect holiness and perfect happiness for ever and ever, without any mixture of sin, or any allay of sorrow; this he firmly expects, this he ardently breathes after; a felicity which an immortal soul shall never outlive, and which an eternal God shall never cease to communicate. This heavenly country he seeks; he considers himself as a citizen of it, and endeavours to maintain his conversation there; to carry on, as it were, a daily trade for heaven, and to lay up a treasure there; in which he may be rich and great, when all the pomp of this earth is passed away as a dream, and all its most precious metals and gems are melted down and consumed among its vilest materials in the last universal burning.

This is the change, the glorious change, which regeneration makes in a man's character and views: and who shall dare to speak, or to think, contemptibly of it? Were we indeed to represent it as a kind of charm, depending on an external ceremony, which it was the peculiar prerogative of a certain order of men to perform, and yet on which eternal life was suspended; one might easily apprehend that it would be brought into much suspicion. Or should we place it in any mechanical transports of animal nature, in any blind impulse, in any strong feelings, not to be described, or accounted for, or argued upon, but known by some inward inexplicable sensation to be divine; we could not wonder, if calm and prudent men were slow to admit the pretension to it, and were fearful it might end in the most dangerous enthusiasm, made impious by excessive appearances of piety.—But when it is delineated by such fair and bright characters as those that have now been drawn; when these divine lineaments on the soul, by which it bears the image of its Maker's rectitude and sanctity, are considered as its necessary consequence, or rather as its very essence; one would imagine, that every rational creature, instead of cavilling at it, should pay an immediate homage to it, and earnestly desire, and labour, and pray, to experience the change: especially as it is a change so desirable for itself; as we acknowledge health to be, though a man were not to be rewarded for being well, nor punished, any further than with the malady he contracts, for any negligence in this respect.

Where is there any thing can be more ornamental to our natures, than to have all the powers of the mind thus changed by grace, and our pursuits directed to such objects as are worthy of the best attention and regard?—To have our apprehensions of divine and spiritual things enlarged, and to have right conceptions of the most important matters;—to have the stream of our affections turned from empty vanities, to objects that are proper to excite and fix them;—to have our resolutions set against all sin, and a full purpose formed within us of an immediate reformation and return to God, with a dependence on his grace to help us both to will and to do;—to have our labours stedfastly applied, to conquer sin, and to promote religion in ourselves and others;—to have our entertainments founded in a religious life, and flowing in upon us from the sweet intercourse we have with God in his word and ordinances, and the delightful conversation that we sometimes have with Christian friends;—and finally, to have our hopes drawn off from earthly things, and fixed upon eternity?—Where is there any thing can be more honourable to us, than thus to be renewed after the image of him that created us, and to put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness?—and where is any thing that can be more desirable, than thus to have the darkness of our understandings cured, and the disorders rectified that sin had brought upon our nature? Who is there that is so insensible of his depravity, as that he would not long for such a happy change? Or who is there that knows how excellent a work it is, to be transformed by the renewing of the mind, that would not, with the greatest thankfulness, adore the riches of divine grace, if it appear that he is thus become a new creature; that "old things are passed away, and behold all things are become new?"

But I shall quickly show you, that regeneration is not only ornamental, honourable, and desirable, but absolutely necessary, as ever we would hope to share the blessings of God's heavenly kingdom, and to escape the horror of those that are finally and irrevocably excluded from it. This argument will employ several succeeding discourses; but I would dismiss you at present with an earnest request, that you would, in the mean time, renew your inquiries, as to the truth of regeneration in your own souls; which, after all that I have been saying, it will be very inexcusable for you to neglect, as probably you will hear few discourses, in the whole course of your lives, which centre more directly in this point, or are more industriously calculated to give you the safest and clearest assistance in it. May God abase the arrogance and presumption of every self-deceiving sinner; and awaken the confidence and joy of the feeblest soul, in whom this new creation is begun!

SERMON XXV

THE NECESSITY OF REGENERATION ARGUED FROM THE IMMUTABLE CONSTITUTION OF GOD.

JOHN iii. 3.

Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

WHILE the ministers of Christ are discoursing of such a subject as I have before me in the course of these Lectures, and particularly in this branch of them which I am now entering upon, we may surely, with the utmost reason, address our hearers in those words of Moses to Israel, in the conclusion of his dying discourse: Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe and do, even all the words of this law; for it is not a vain thing for you, because it is your life. That must undoubtedly be your life, concerning which the Lord Jesus Christ himself, the incarnate wisdom of God, the faithful and true witness, has said, and said it with a solemn repeated asseveration, that without it a man cannot see the kingdom of God.

The occasion of his saying it deserves our notice; though the niceties of the context must be waved in such a series of sermons as this. He said it to a Jew of considerable rank, and, as it appears, one of the grand Sanhedrim, or chief council of the nation: who came not only for his own private satisfaction, but in the name of several of his brethren, to discourse with Christ concerning his doctrine, at the first passover he attended at Jerusalem, after he had entered on his public ministry. Our Lord would, to be sure, be peculiarly careful what answer he returned to such an inquiry: and this is his answer, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God: as if he should have said, "If the princes of Israel inquire after my character, let them know that I came to be a preacher of regeneration; and that the blessings of that kingdom which I am come to reveal and erect, are to be peculiar to renewed and sanctified souls; who may, by an easy and natural figure, be said to be born again." And the figure appears very intelligible, and very instructive to those that will seriously consider it; and might lead us into a variety of pertinent and useful remarks.

You easily perceive, that to be born again must intimate a very great change; coming, as it were, into a new world, as an infant does; when, after having lived awhile a kind of vegetative life in the darkness and confinement of the womb, it is born into open day; feels the vital air rushing in on its lungs, and light forcing itself upon the awakened eyes; hears sounds before unknown; opens its mouth to receive a yet untasted food, and every day becomes acquainted with new objects, and exerts new powers, till it grows up to the maturity of a perfect man. Such, and in some respects greater and nobler than this, is the change which regeneration makes in a heart before unacquainted with religion; as you may have seen at large from the preceding discourses.

But I might further observe, that the phrase in the text may also express the humbling nature of this change, as well as the greatness of it. Erasmus gives this turn to the words; and it is so edifying, that I should have mentioned it at least, though I had not thought it so just as it appears. To be born again must signify, to become as a little child; and our Lord expressly and frequently assures us, that without this we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. He has pronounced the very first of his blessings on poverty of spirit; and where this is wanting the soul will never be entitled to the rest. A mild and humble, a docile and tractable, temper, a freedom from avarice and ambition, and an indifference to those great toys of which men are generally so fond, are all essential parts of the Christian character; and they have all, in one view or another, been touched upon in the preceding discourses. Let it be forgiven, however, if, considering the importance of the case, you are told again, that in malice ye must be children; and that, if any man think himself wise, he must become a child, and even a fool, that he may be wise indeed.

I might observe once more, that these words intimate the divine power, by which this great and humbling change is effected. Our first formation and birth is the work of God, and no less really so in the succeeding generations of men, than the first production of Adam was, when God formed him of the dust of the earth, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life. We may each of us say, with respect to the natural birth, and in an accommodated sense with respect to the spiritual too, "thine eyes did see my substance, being as yet imperfect, and in thy book all my members, which in continuance of time were fashioned, were written, when as yet there was none of them." All the first gracious impressions that were made upon the mind, and all the gradual advances of them, till Christ was formed in the heart, and the new creature animated, must (as I shall hereafter show at large) be ultimately and principally referred into a divine operation; and in this sense, it is God that brings every good purpose in the mind to the birth, and God that gives strength to bring forth.

But I omit the further prosecution of these remarks at present, because they coincide with what I have said in former discourses, or what will occur in those which are yet to come: and shall only further consider the words, as they are a confirmation of, and therefore a proper introduction to, what I am to lay before you under the third general head of these discourses; in which (as I have already shown, who may be said to be in an unregenerate state, and how great that change is which regeneration makes in the soul) I shall now proceed, Thirdly, To show the high importance, yea, the absolute necessity, of this change.

Our Lord expresses it in a very lively and awakening manner, in these few determinate words, which are here before us: Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. You see how emphatical the words are: he who is himself invariable truth, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, repeats it again and again, with as much solemnity as he ever uses upon any occasion; repeats it to us, as he did to Nicodemus, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, that is, I seriously deliver it as a truth of infinite moment; Except a man, i. e. any man, whatever his profession, whatever his knowledge, or whatever his privileges may be, though he be a Jew, though he be a Pharisee, though he be as thou Nicodemus art, a ruler or a senator; except he be born again, and have that great change, so often described in the word of God, wrought by the operation of the Spirit in his mind, he cannot see the kingdom of God: he cannot by any means approach it, so as to enter into it, or have any share in the important blessings which it contains."

That we may more fully understand, and enter into, this weighty argument, I shall from these words,

I. Briefly consider, what it is to see the kingdom of God.

II. Show how absolutely impossible it is, that any unregenerate man should see it. And,

III. How wretched a thing it is to be deprived of the sight and enjoyment of it.

And I am well persuaded, that if you diligently attend to these things, you will be inwardly and powerfully convinced, that no argument could be more proper to demonstrate the importance and necessity of regeneration, than this, which our Lord has suggested in these awful, emphatical, and comprehensive words.

I. I am to show you what it is to see the kingdom of God.

And for the explication of it, it will be necessary to consider,—what we are to understand by this kingdom,—and what is meant by seeing it.

[1.] I would show you what we are to understand by the kingdom of God.

And you will pardon me if I state the matter pretty largely; because the phrase is used in Scripture in different senses; and the true interpretation of many passages in it depends on a proper distinction between them. You may observe then for the explication of this phrase,—that the kingdom of God in general signifies "the society of those who profess themselves the servants and subjects of Christ;" and in consequence of this,—that there are some passages, in which it peculiarly relates to "the imperfect dispensation of this kingdom, and the beginning of it in the world;"—and others, in which it relates to "the more perfect form, which this society is to bear in the world of glory."

1. The kingdom of God, or the kingdom of heaven, (for they are synonymous phrases,) does in the general signify "the society of those who profess themselves the servants and subjects of Christ."

You well know this was a phrase used among the Jews; and therefore the original of it is to be traced from the Old Testament: and I apprehend it to be this:—Almost every Christian is aware, that in the early days of the Jewish commonwealth, as Samuel with great propriety expresses it, God was their king. Jehovah was not only the great object of their religious regard, as the creator and supporter of the whole world; but he was also their supreme civil magistrate, settling the forms of their political government, and reserving to himself some of the chief acts of royal authority. They did indeed afterwards desire another king, like the other nations round about them. But still those kings being appointed by God, were indeed to be looked upon as no other than his vicegerents, though another kind of governors than he had originally instituted. By degrees their peculiar regard to the civil authority of God among them, as well as to his religious authority, which was nearly connected with it, in a great measure wore out; and their government went through a great many different forms, which it would be unnecessary here particularly to describe. Nevertheless God was pleased to declare by king David, and by many others of his holy prophets, that he would in due time interpose to erect another, and a far more extensive, kingdom in the world: not indeed upon the same political principles, with that which he exercised over the Jews; which principles would by no means have suited this extensive design: but it should be a kingdom in which the authority of the God of heaven should be acknowledged, and his laws of universal righteousness observed with greater care, and to nobler purposes, as well as by a vastly greater number of subjects, than ever before. This kingdom he determined to commit to the government of the Messiah, who with regard to this was called the Lord's Anointed, his King whom he set upon his holy hill of Zion; and to whom indeed he would give all power, not only on earth but in heaven too; so that having trained up his subjects here, in the discipline of holiness and obedience, he should at length translate them to another and a better country, that is, a heavenly, where they should see his glory, and should reign with him in eternal life.

This plainly appears from the whole tenor of the Old and New Testament, to have been the grand plan of God, with respect to the Messiah's kingdom: and you will easily see, that coming from God as its great Author, and referring to him as its end, it may, with great propriety, be called the kingdom of God; and ultimately terminating in the heavenly state, it may also properly be called the kingdom of heaven. These were phrases which prevailed in the Jewish nation, before Christ or his immediate forerunner appeared: and indeed they were used by Daniel in a very remarkable manner, which probably made them so familiar to the Jews, who had some peculiar reasons for studying his writings, even more than those of some other prophets. After that prophet had foretold the rise and fall of several great empires of the world, he adds, and in the days of these last kings (i. e. of the Romans) shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall not be destroyed,—but shall stand for ever. And the person whom the Ancient of days, i. e. the eternal and ever-blessed God, should fix on the throne of this kingdom, from his appearing in the human nature, is called the Son of man.—I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

In allusion to this, when our Lord Jesus Christ appeared, he called himself the Son of man: and he particularly used this phrase, and it was exceedingly proper that he should, in this conference with Nicodemus, again and again. And all those who being convinced of the divine commission he bore, submitted themselves to him, might in this respect be said, to enter into the kingdom of God, or of heaven; that is, into the society which had so long been foretold and expected under that title. This kingdom, as the above-mentioned prophecy declared, was to be raised from very low beginnings, under the personal ministry of Christ and his apostles, till at last it should extend through very distant regions of the world, and kings and princes should submit themselves to it, and reckon it their glory to enrol themselves among his subjects.

Agreeable to this meaning of the phrase, and to this view with respect to the establishment of his kingdom, our Lord opened his ministry with preaching, as John the Baptist had done, the kingdom of heaven. And you will see, that in most places of the gospel, where the phrase occurs, it is to be taken in this sense. Thus our Lord says, Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven; i. e. they are fit to be members of this society, and to receive the blessings of it. Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; i. e. labour to serve the interest of this society that I am erecting, and to obtain and promote that righteousness which it recommends, and is intended to establish in the world. And again, Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God: persons with such a disposition are most fit to become my subjects, and to enter into this holy and spiritual society. And when our Lord says to the Pharisees, publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you; he means, no doubt, they are more ready than you to join themselves to the society of those who profess themselves my subjects. And once more, when he speaks of some who chose the severities of a single life, that with less entanglements they might serve the interests of his church, he expresses it, by their making themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake.

I shall only add, that the phrase, by a near connexion with this sense, sometimes signifies the charter of this society, or the privileges which it affords to its members; as when our Lord says, "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in nowise enter therein."

This then is the general sense of this phrase: it signifies "the society of those who should submit themselves to the government of Christ, as appointed by God to rule over them; who are thereby to be considered as God's people and subjects." In consequence of this you will easily apprehend,

2. That it comprehends "the more imperfect dispensation, under which the members of this society are, during their abode in the present world."

All that passes here is indeed but the opening of Christ's kingdom: nevertheless, the phrase does sometimes more particularly refer to this opening; and there are several passages, in which it would be apparently absurd to suppose it comprehended the glories of the invisible state, to which Christ intended finally to conduct his faithful servants. Thus our Lord tells the Pharisees, The kingdom of God is come unto you, i. e. that gracious dispensation under the Messiah, by which God is gathering subjects to his Son. And elsewhere he says to them, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation, i. e. not with such outward show and grandeur as you expect; but behold, it is within, or, (as it might be rendered,) among you: God has begun to open and establish it, though you know it not; and has actually brought many poor sinners into it, whom you proudly deride as ignorant and accursed. Thus also, when our Lord says to Peter, I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, it would be most absurd to suppose, he meant to grant to him the power of admitting into, or excluding from, the world of glory: but the plain meaning is, that he should bear a distinguished office in the church upon earth, and be the means of admitting Jews and Gentiles into it. Here, as in many other instances, the kingdom of God, or of heaven, means much the same with the professing church of Christ, during its settlement in this imperfect state: as it undoubtedly does, when Christ threatens his hearers, that the kingdom of God should be taken away from them: and when he represents it, as consisting of good and bad, of tares and wheat; but declares, that at the last day he will gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity; whereas nothing of that kind shall ever enter into the kingdom of glory. But yet,

3. It ultimately relates to "the more perfect form and state of this society in the kingdom of glory."

You very well know, that the design of God in his gospel was not to establish a temporal kingdom, as the Jews expected; nor merely to form a body of men, who should live upon earth with some peculiar forms of worship, under very excellent rules, and with distinguished privileges of a spiritual nature, but that all these ultimately referred to the invisible world. Thither the Son of man was removed, when he had finished his labour and sufferings upon earth; and thither all the true and faithful members of the kingdom were sooner or later to be brought, and there were to have their final settlement and everlasting abode, in a far more splendid and happy state, than the greatest monarch on earth has ever known: they shall there, as the apostle most properly expresses it, reign in life by Jesus Christ. Now as the kingdom of God upon earth is to be considered with a leading view to this, so we sometimes find, that this glorious state of its members, or (which will come much to the same thing) the society of the faithful in this glorious state, is, by way of eminence, called the kingdom of God: and with regard to this, they whose characters are such that they shall be excluded from thence, are represented as having no part in the kingdom of heaven, though they have been by profession members of the church of Christ on earth. Of this you have a remarkable instance, where our Lord says, Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doth the will of my Father which is in heaven: now it was calling Christ, Lord, or professing a regard to him as a divine teacher and governor, which was the very circumstance that distinguished the members of his kingdom on earth from the rest of mankind; yet as they who do this insincerely shall be excluded from final glory, it is said, they shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. So also the apostle tells us, that flesh and blood, i. e. such gross machines of animal nature as those in which we now dwell, cannot inherit the kingdom of God, they cannot dwell in so pure a region; and therefore it is necessary, that before they enter upon it, those who are found alive at the illustrious day of Christ's appearance, should undergo a miraculous change to fit them for such an abode. In reference to this we are likewise told, that then, i. e. at the great resurrection-day, the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. And this is what our Lord most certainly had in view, when he tells the impenitent Jews, that there should be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when they should see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and they themselves thrust out; which could not be meant of the privileges of the Christian church upon earth, in which the patriarchs had no share; nor did the Jews at all envy those professing Christians, who most evidently had: it must undoubtedly therefore be numbered among those passages, in which the kingdom of heaven chiefly refers to the state of glory. And I apprehend, the text here before us may be added to that catalogue; which leads us to show, [2.] What we are to understand by seeing the kingdom of God.

Now, in general, you will easily apprehend, that to see the kingdom is to enjoy the blessings of it.—There is no need of enumerating many passages of Scripture, where to see properly signifies to enjoy. This is apparently the sense of it, when Christ declares, Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God: for the Deity cannot be an object of sight; but the promise is, that such souls, (O that we may be in their number!) shall for ever enjoy the most delightful communications from him. And thus again we are to understand it, where it is said, What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see, i. e. that he may enjoy, good! for otherwise, to see it without enjoying it, would be a great aggravation of misery and distress. And in this sense it is most evident, that seeing the kingdom of God must here be put, for enjoying the chief and most important blessings appropriated to this happy state; because, as I have just been observing, condemned sinners are represented in another sense, as seeing that kingdom, and the glorified saints in it; but viewing it only at an unapproachable distance, as a spectacle that fills them with horror and despair.

This therefore is, upon the whole, the meaning of this passage: "that no unregenerate soul shall finally have any part in the glory and happiness which Christ has prepared for his faithful subjects; nor can any that appear to be such, according to the tenor and constitution of the gospel, be admitted into the number even of professing Christians." It is true indeed, a man may appear under such a disguise, that those who are in this sense the stewards of the mysteries of God, may in the judgment of charity, be obliged to think well of him, and to admit him; but Christ, who intimately knows him, does even now discern him. The present external privileges he enjoys, are such as he has no just right to; and in a little time, Christ will root him out of this kingdom with a vengeance, and he shall be openly declared a rebel, and one whom the Lord of it never knew, or never approved. So that, upon the whole, it is so little a part that he had in the kingdom, and that for so short a time, that it may, in the free language of Scripture, be said, that he has never seen the kingdom of God at all; that he has neither part nor lot in this matter, has no part with God's chosen, nor any lot with his inheritance.

Having thus largely explained the meaning of this phrase, I now proceed,

II. To show you how certain this declaration of our Lord in the text is, or how absolutely impossible it is, that any unregenerate man should thus see the kingdom of God.

Now this I shall argue,—partly "from the immutable constitution of God, whose kingdom it is;"—and partly "from the nature of its blessings.

which are such, that no unregenerate man, while he continues in that state, can have any fitness or capacity to enjoy them."

The first of these considerations is copious and important enough, to furnish out abundant matter for the remainder of this discourse; and it will be difficult to despatch it within these limits.

[1.] The impossibility there is, that any unregenerate man should enter into the kingdom of God, appears, "from the immutable constitution of that God, whose kingdom it is."

This might be sufficiently argued, from the express and emphatical words of our Lord Jesus Christ in the text. For he bore his Father's commission to preach the gospel of the kingdom, to publish the good news of its erection and success, and likewise to declare its nature, and the method of admittance into it. And he is himself the great Sovereign of that kingdom; and consequently cannot but perfectly, and beyond all comparison with any other, know the whole of its constitution.—But God has repeated the declaration by him, and by his other messengers to the children of men, in different ages, and under different dispensations, in such a manner as suited its infinite importance.—And, therefore, for the further illustration of the argument, I shall enumerate a great variety of scriptures that speak the same language; not so much aiming therein at the speculative proof of the point, as attempting to impress the consciences of my hearers with a sense of its certainty; and humbly hoping that some of those sharp-pointed arrows, which I am now drawing out of the quiver of God, may, by the direction of his Spirit, enter the reins of some against whom they are levelled, and convince them of the absolute necessity of an entire change in their hearts, as well as their lives, or of the vanity of all those hopes which they entertain, while that change is wanting. And let me bespeak your attention, not to the conjectures or reasonings of a frail mortal man, but to the solemn admonitions and declarations of the eternal God; and be assured, that in one sense or another, his word shall take hold on you, as it has done on sinners of former generations, either for conviction or condemnation.

That I may not be confounded in the multiplicity of my proofs, I shall range them under these three distinct heads: "The prophets of the Old Testament were commissioned to make this declaration;—it was renewed by the preaching of Christ;—and was supported by the testimony of the apostles under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

1. The prophets of the Old Testament were commissioned in effect to make this declaration, that no unregenerate sinners should enter into the kingdom of God.

Well might our Lord say to Nicodemus, Art thou a teacher in Israel, and knowest not these things! for to this in effect all the prophets bear witness, and it might be learned from almost every page of their writings. It is true, the particular phrase of being born again, or regenerated, does not occur there; nor is it expressly said, that an unregenerate man shall not be admitted into God's kingdom; but then the prophets every where assert, what is in effect the same, that no wicked man, who does not heartily repent of his sins, and turn from them to God, must expect the divine favour. Now if you consider what we mean by an unregenerate man, according to the description I have given before, you will find it is just the same as an impenitent sinner: and if it be declared that such are not to expect the divine favour, nay, that they must certainly prove the objects of his displeasure, this must certainly imply an exclusion from his kingdom, and must intend a great deal more than being deprived of everlasting happiness. And thus you see that all those scriptures, which speak of the irreconcilable hatred of God against sin, and against all impenitent sinners, come in to do service here, and are equivalent to the declaration in the text. And I may hereafter show you, that there are many scriptures in the Old Testament which lead men to consider that change, said to be so necessary, as what must be effected by a divine operation on their souls. But as that will more properly come in under a following head, I shall at present content myself with selecting a few scriptures, as a specimen of many hundreds more, in proof of the main point before us; and I beseech you that you would endeavour to enter, not only into the sense, but into the spirit, of them.

You well know that unregenerate sinners are wicked men; and of such it is said, God is angry with the wicked every day; or all the day long, as the original imports. The sinner lies down and rises up, goes out and comes in, under the divine displeasure; and though with great patience God bears with him for a while, he is described as preparing his dreadful artillery against him, to smite him even with a mortal wound: so far will he be from admitting him into his kingdom, that, as it is there added, if he turn not he will whet his sword; he has bent his bow and made it ready; he has also prepared for him the instruments of death. And in another place, he describes the dreadful consequence of that preparation in most lively terms: If I whet my glittering sword, and my hand take hold on judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me: I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh from the beginning of revenges on the enemy, i. e. as soon as I begin this awful work. And elsewhere he compares the destruction which he will bring upon sinners at last, to that which he executed on Sodom and Gomorrah, when he scattered fire and brimstone on their habitations, and reduced their pleasant country to a burning lake: Upon the wicked he will rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this will be the portion of their cup; and oh, how unlike the state and abode of those who are the happy subjects of his kingdom.

None of the prophets speak in milder and more gentle language to returning penitents than Isaiah; yet he declares, There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked. Yea, he does, as it were, call in the concurrence of all who feared God, and who loved their country, to echo back and enforce the admonition: say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him; but, on the other hand, woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him.

The enumeration would be endless; and it would require more than the time of a whole discourse, only to read over, without any comment or remark, one half of the passages which might properly be introduced on this occasion. I will, therefore, only mention two more, which, though some of you may hear with indifference, I confess I cannot read without a very sensible inward commotion.

The one is that passage in the Mosaic law, where God directs his servant to say, If there be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood, or any unregenerate soul, who, when he hears the words of this curse, shall bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst, and run into one debauchery and sin after another: the Lord will not spare him, but the anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke and be inflamed against that man;—and the Lord shall separate him unto evil out of all the tribes of Israel, according to all the curses of the covenant, that are written in the book of the law. There is a terrible emphasis of which we cannot but take notice here: God declares, that if, among all the thousands of Israel, there was but one such presumptuous sinner, that thus flattered himself in the way of his own heart, he would make a terrible example of him, and separate that one man to evil, out of thousands and ten thousands of his faithful and obedient servants.

This, therefore, is a passage full of apparent terror: the other is indeed a language of mercy; but it contains a most awful insinuation, which appears, as good Archbishop Tillotson expresses it, "like a razor set in oil, which wounds with so much the keener edge." As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live; turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel? thereby plainly intimating, that, notwithstanding all that gentleness of the divine nature, which he expresses in a most tender invitation, which he confirms even with the solemnity of an oath; yet, if sinners did not turn from their evil ways, there was no remedy, but they must die for it.

And how, Sirs, will any of you that continue in an unregenerate state, arm yourselves against these terrors? Is it by saying, "that these are the thunders of Mount Sinai; that these are the denunciations of the Old Testament; whereas the New speaks in milder language?" You may easily know the contrary; and to this purpose I am further to show you,

2. That this declaration was renewed by the preaching of Christ.

It is true, indeed, that grace and truth came by Jesus Christ: yet all the grace and gentleness of that administration he brought did not contradict those awful threatenings; nay, it obliged him to set them in a stronger light.—He presently repeats to Nicodemus what he had just before asserted in the text, and declares, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water, and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God; i. e. "As he must be baptized with water, in order to a regular entrance into the society of my people, so he must also be sanctified and transformed by the cleansing and renewing influences of the Spirit, signified by the water there used, or he can have no part in the blessings which my gospel brings."—And that this must produce a universal change in the life as well as in the heart, and a faithful subjection to the will of God, without which no profession will stand a man in any stead, our Lord solemnly declares in the conclusion of his incomparable discourse on the mount: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doth the will of my Father who is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity." And shall you, Sirs, merely for having a name and place in his house, escape; when those that have preached his gospel, and wrought miracles in confirmation of it, when those that personally conversed with Christ, and those that ministered unto him, shall perish, if destitute of a holy temper of heart, and of its solid fruit in their lives?—Has not our Lord expressly said, that he will gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity; and will cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth?—Nay, in his infinite compassion, he has given to sinners, as it were, a copy of the sentence that will another day be pronounced upon them; that they may meditate upon it, and review it, and judge whether they can bear the terror of its execution: hear it attentively, and then say whether unregenerate sinners shall enter into his kingdom. The dreadful doom is this: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. And what now will you say to this? Can any soul of you imagine, that the Lord Jesus Christ did not know what would pass in this day in which he is appointed to preside? or that knowing it, and knowing it would be something different from this, he would, on any consideration whatsoever, make a false representation, and lay so much stress upon it? Yet one or other of these things you must secretly imagine; or must own, that every unregenerate sinner, and you among the rest, must not only be excluded from his presence, but be condemned to suffer all the fury of his wrath, in company with devils and damned spirits, in final darkness and everlasting burnings. It only remains that I show you,

3. That the same testimony was renewed by the apostles, under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

You know that they were authorized by their great Master to declare, in an authentic manner, the constitution of this kingdom; and that he who despises them despises Christ. Now I would fain persuade you all to consider this argument as it lies in Scripture; to read over the epistolary parts of the New Testament in this view, to observe what encouragement they any of them give to an unregenerate sinner, to expect any part of the kingdom of heaven. In the mean time, permit me to present you with a few texts, as a specimen of the rest.

The apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, does indeed speak of God's justifying the ungodly; but lest any should vainly imagine that he encourages the hope of those that continue so, he expressly tells us, in the very same epistle, that the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; and that ere long this wrath shall be executed, even in the day of the more ample revelation of the righteous judgment of God; who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them that do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, (which is the character of every unregenerate sinner,) indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doth evil, of the Jew first, as having had the most signal advantages, though advantages inferior to yours, and also of the Gentile. And further he assures us, that to be carnally minded is death; and that the carnal mind, which universally prevails in men, till by regenerating grace they are made spiritual, is enmity against God, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.—In another epistle he mentions it as a first principle, in which, it might reasonably be supposed, no Christian was uninstructed, Know ye not, says he, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? And elsewhere he declares, that all external modes of religion, separate from that entire change of soul which I have described, are worthless and vain: In Christ Jesus, says he, or to those that desire any part in him and his kingdom, neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.—He likewise tells us to this purpose in another place, that his grace, which has appeared unto all men, teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world; and yet after all to acknowledge, that it is not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saves us, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he has shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour.—And without holiness, which is the effect of these sacred operations upon the soul, he expressly tells us in another place, that no man shall see the Lord.—And to allege but one more passage from him; as it is evident that all unregenerate sinners, and only they, are ignorant of God, and disobedient to the gospel; he solemnly assures us, that instead of receiving such at last into this kingdom, the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.—This is the testimony of the apostle Paul in his own emphatical words, zealous as he was for the doctrine of free grace, which such declarations as these do not in the least degree contradict.

Let us now hear his brethren, the other apostles of the Lord.—James urges sinners, if they ever desire to draw nigh to God, and to have him draw nigh to them, to cleanse their hands, and purify their hearts. And yet more expressly he says, when he speaks of those who should receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him: Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.—The apostle Peter describes Christians, as those whose souls were purified in obeying the truth through the Spirit, being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible; and as those, who were made partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.—Again, John, the beloved disciple, tells us, that every one that doth righteousness is born of God; but he that committeth sin is of the devil: and that every one that has a well-grounded hope of being like Christ, and seeing him as he is, when he appears, purifies himself even as he is pure.—And once more, the apostle Jude, as he describes those who are sensual, and have not the Spirit, as men that, if they were saved at all, must be plucked out of the fire; so he echoes back that awful prophecy which Enoch had so long since delivered, that the Lord will come with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convict all that are ungodly of all those ungodly deeds and words by which they have violated his law.

This then appears, from the whole tenor of the Scriptures, to be the positive and immutable constitution of the great God, "that none who are unregenerate shall be admitted to enjoy the happiness of heaven." And from the view that we have taken of the sacred writings it is manifest, that this, in every age, has been the language of the word of God; and under every dispensation we have sufficient evidence of this important truth. This is the doctrine of the Old Testament; and many are the passages that I have offered from the law of Moses, and from the Prophets, and the Psalms, that show it is impossible an unrenewed soul should enter into heaven. And the same also is asserted in the strongest terms in the New Testament; and when Christ came to set the gospel of the kingdom in a clearer light, the purport of the declaration that he makes to Nicodemus in the text, was frequently repeated by him in the course of his preaching, and represented as the rule he would regard at the last day. And the inspired apostles speak the same thing with a united voice, and testify at large in their epistles, that it is absolutely necessary we should be born again, if ever we would hope to see the kingdom of God.

So that now, Sirs, I may say, Call, if there be any that will answer; and to which of the saints will you turn, to encourage your vain and presumptuous hope, of finding your lot among God's people in the kingdom of glory, if you are strangers to that important and universal change, which we before described as regeneration in the Scripture sense of the word? The prophets under the Old Testament, and Christ and his apostles under the New, concur, in all the variety of the most awful language, to expose so presumptuous a hope. And is it not audacious madness in any, to venture their souls upon it? Thus you would undoubtedly judge of any man, who should strike a dagger into his breast, or discharge a pistol at his head, on this presumption, that the almighty power of God could prevent his death, though the heart or the brain were pierced. But it is much greater folly for a man, while he continues in an unregenerate state, to promise himself a part in the kingdom of heaven. For though there would be no reason in the world to expect a miraculous interposition, to save a life which a man was so resolutely bent to destroy; yet none can say, that such an interposition would contradict any of the express engagements of God's word; whereas to admit an unregenerate sinner into the regions of glory, would be violating, not this or that single declaration, but the whole series and tenor of it: and we shall further show, in the next Discourse, that it would also be, in effect, altering the very nature of the heavenly kingdom itself, as well as its constitution. Now what hope can be more desperate, than that which can have no support but in the subversion of the Redeemer's kingdom, and even of the eternal throne of God, the foundations of which are righteousness and truth?

SERMON XXVI.

OF THE INCAPACITY OF AN UNREGENERATE PERSON FOR RELISHING THE ENJOYMENTS OF THE HEAVENLY WORLD.

JOHN iii. 3.

——Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

IN order to demonstrate the necessity of regeneration, of which I would fain convince not only your understandings, but your consciences, I am now proving to you, that without it it is impossible to enter into the kingdom of God: and how weighty a consideration that is I am afterwards to represent.

That it is thus impossible, the words in the text do indeed sufficiently prove; but for the further illustration of the subject, I have proposed to consider it under two distinct views.

I have already shown it is impossible, because "the constitution of the kingdom of heaven is such, that God has solemnly declared, and this under different dispensations, and more or less plainly in all ages of his church, that no unregenerate person, i. e. no impenitent sinner, shall have any part in it." And I am now further to show,

[2.] That "the nature of the future happiness (which is here chiefly signified by the kingdom of God) is such, that an unregenerate person would be incapable of relishing it, even upon a supposition of his being admitted into it."

This is a thought of so great importance, and so seldom represented in its full strength, that I shall at present confine my discourse entirely to it.

I know, sinners, it will be one of the most difficult things in the world, to bring you to a serious persuasion of this truth. You think heaven is so lovely and so glorious a place, that if you could possibly get an admittance thither, you should certainly be happy. But I would now set myself, if possible, to convince you that this is a rash and ill-grounded persuasion; that on the contrary, if you were now in the regions of glory, and in the society of those blessed inhabitants, that unrenewed nature and unsanctified heart of yours would give you a disrelish for all the sublimest entertainments of that blissful place, and turn heaven itself into a kind of hell to you.

Now for the demonstration of this, it is only necessary for you seriously to consider "what a kind of happiness that of heaven is, as it is represented to us in the word of God;" for from thence undoubtedly we are to take our notions of it.

You might to be sure sit down and imagine a happiness to yourselves, which would perfectly suit your degenerate taste; a happiness which the more entirely you were enslaved to flesh and sense, the more exquisitely you would be able to enter into it. If God would assign you a region in that beautiful world, where you should dwell in fine houses, magnificently furnished and gaily adorned; where the most harmonious music should soothe your ear, and delicious food and generous wines in a rich variety should regale your taste: if he should give you a splendid retinue of people, to caress and attend you, offering you their humblest services, and acknowledging the most servile dependence upon your favour: especially if with all this he should furnish you with a set of companions just of your own temper and disposition, with whom you might spend what proportion of your time you pleased, in gaming and jollity, in riot and debauchery, without any interruption from the reproof, or even the example, of the children of God, or from indispositions of body, or remorse of conscience: this you would be ready to call life and happiness indeed: and if the great Disposer of all things were but to add perpetuity to such a situation, you would not envy persons of a more refined taste the heaven you lost, for such a paradise as this.

Such indeed was the happiness which Mahomet promised to his followers: flowery shades and gay dresses, luxurious fare and beautiful women, are described with all the pomp of language in almost every page of his Alcoran, as the glorious and charming rewards which were to be bestowed on the faithful after the resurrection. And if this were the felicity which the gospel promised, extortioners and idolaters, whoremongers and drunkards, would be much fitter to inherit the kingdom of God, than the most pious and mortified saint that ever appeared on earth. But here, as almost every where else, the Bible and the Alcoran speak a very different language; and far from leading us into such gross and sensual expectations, our Lord Jesus Christ has told us, that the children of the resurrection neither marry, nor are given in marriage; but are like the angels of God in heaven, and enjoy such pure and spiritual delights, as are suited to such holy and excellent creatures.

It is true, that in the book of Revelation, stately palaces and shining habits, delicious fruit and harmonious music, are all mentioned, as contributing to the happiness of those who have the honour to inhabit the New Jerusalem. But then the style of that obscure and prophetical book, naturally leads us to consider these merely as figurative phrases, which are made use of to express the happiness that divine wisdom and love has prepared for the righteous, in a manner accommodated to the weakness of our conceptions: or at least, if in any of these respects provision be made for the entertainment of a glorified body, whatever its methods of sensation and perception may be, all will be temperate and regular: and after all, this is even there represented but as the least considerable part of our happiness, the height of which is made to consist in the most elevated strains of devotion, and in an entire and everlasting devotedness to the service of God and of the Lamb.

Let us therefore immediately proceed to settle the point in question, by a more particular survey of the several branches of the celestial felicity, as represented to us in the word of God: and from thence it will undeniably appear, that were an unregenerate soul in the same place with the blessed, and surrounded with the same external circumstances, the temper of his mind would not by any means allow him to participate of their happiness. For it is plain the Scripture represents the happiness of heaven as consisting,—in the perfection of our minds in knowledge and holiness;—in the sight and service of the ever-blessed God;—in beholding the glory of our exalted Redeemer;—and enjoying the society of glorious angels and perfected saints,—throughout an endless eternity.—Now, sinners, it is impossible you should enter into any such delights as these, while you continue in an unregenerate state.

1. One very considerable part of the happiness of heaven consists, "in that perfection of knowledge and holiness to which the blessed shall be there exalted;" in which the unregenerate soul can have no pleasure.

Thus we are told, that the spirits of just men shall there be made perfect; for nothing that defiles, as every degree of moral imperfection does, shall enter into the New Jerusalem. An Old-Testament saint conceived of future happiness, as consisting in being satisfied with the likeness of God: a character that is manifestly most agreeable to the view of it which the beloved disciple gives us, where he says, that when Christ shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is: which must certainly refer to the glories of the mind, which are of infinitely greater importance than the highest imaginable beauty and ornament that can be put upon the corporeal part of our nature in its most illustrious state.

Now from this perfection of holiness, which shall then be wrought in the soul, there will naturally arise an unspeakable complacency and joy, something resembling that which the blessed God himself possesses, in the survey of the infinite and unspotted rectitude of his most holy nature. And in proportion to the degree, in which the "eyes of our understandings are enlightened" to discern wherein true excellency consists, will the soul be delighted in the consciousness of such considerable degrees of it in itself.

But surely it will be superfluous for me to undertake to demonstrate, that an unregenerate soul can have no part in this divine pleasure, which implies the complete renewal of the mind as its very foundation. For to imagine that he might, would be supposing him regenerate and unregenerate at the same time. As Mr. Baxter very well expresses it, "The happiness of heaven is holiness; and to talk of being happy without it, is as apparent nonsense, as to talk of being well without health, or being saved without salvation."

I would only add on this head, That the highest improvement of our intellectual faculties could not make us happy, without such a change in the affections and the will, as I have before described under the former general head. For the more clear and distinct the knowledge of true excellence and perfection is, the greater would be your anguish and horror, to see and feel yourselves entirely destitute of it; and it is exceeding probable that spirits of the most elevated genius have the keenest sensation of that infamy and misery, which is inseparable from the prevalence of sinful dispositions in such minds as these.

2. Another very considerable branch of the celestial happiness, is that which arises "from the contemplation and enjoyment of the ever-blessed God;" but of this likewise an unregenerate sinner is incapable.

As our own reason assures us, that God is the greatest and best of beings, and the most deserving object of our inquiries and regards, one would think it would naturally lead us to imagine, that the perfection and happiness of the human soul consists in the knowledge and enjoyment of him; and that when it arrives at the seat of complete felicity, it must intimately know him, and converse with him. And in this view, I have sometimes been surprised, that men of such abilities, as some of the heathen poets and philosophers appear to have been, should have had no greater regard to the Supreme Being in the descriptions which they give us of the future happiness. That sort of friendship for them, which an acquaintance with their writings must give to a person of any relish for the beauties of composition, makes one almost unwilling to expose the low and despicable ideas, which they often give of the state of their greatest heroes in the regions of immortality.—But the word of God speaks a very different language. Our Lord represents the rewards to be bestowed on the pure in heart, by telling us that they shall see, i. e. contemplate and enjoy, God: and virtuous souls, who overcome the temptations with which they are here surrounded, shall be "made as pillars in the house of their God, and shall go no more out:" and it is elsewhere said, that his servants shall serve him, and shall see his face. And David's views under a darker dispensation rose to such a degree of refinement, as to say, As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness: Which he mentions as a felicity infinitely superior to all the delights of the most prosperous sinner.

But now, sinners, it is utterly impossible that while you continue in an unregenerate state, you should behold the face of God with pleasure. The unutterable delight which the blessed inhabitants of heaven find in it, arises not merely from the abstract ideas of his essential perfections, but from a sense of his favour and love to them. It is this that gives a relish to the whole survey, and rejoices the heart of all the saints, both in heaven and on earth. He is a God of awful majesty and irresistible power, of infinite wisdom and unspotted holiness, of unerring justice, invariable fidelity, and inexhaustible goodness: and "this God is our God, he will be our guide and our portion for ever." And were it not for this view, let a creature think of God with ever so much spirit and propriety, he must think of him, and be troubled; yea, he must be filled with unutterable horror and confusion, as the devil is at the thought of an infinitely perfect being, in whom he has no interest, from whom he has nothing friendly to expect; and if nothing friendly, then every thing dreadful.

Now it is certain, sinners, that while you continue in an unregenerate state, under the influence of that carnal mind which is enmity against God, and full of unconquerable rebellion against his law, there can be no foundation for a friendship between him and your souls; nor for any persuasion, or any apprehension, of your interest in his favour and love. Friendship, you know, supposes something of a similitude of nature and sentiment; for, as God himself argues, "how can two walk together except they be agreed?" Now I have before observed to you at large, that God being of purer eyes than to behold evil, must necessarily "hate all the workers of iniquity: the foolish therefore shall not stand in his sight," or shall not be admitted to such a situation; nor would they indeed be able to endure it.—Let conscience judge what satisfaction you could find in the presence of a God, that you knew scorned and hated you, even while he suffered you to continue among the crowd of his children and servants. The more lively ideas you had of the beauty and perfection of the divine nature, the more you must loathe yourselves for being so unlike him, and so abominable to him: and what pleasure do your think consistent with such self-contempt and abhorrence? Or rather, would not the wretched degeneracy of your nature lead you another way; and a kind of unconquerable self-love, joined even with this consciousness of deformity and vileness, lead you to hate God himself? It is described as the fatal effect of prevailing wickedness in the heart, "my soul loathed them, and their soul also abhorred me." And thus would it probably work in you, and produce in your wretched breasts a mortal hatred against him, and an envious rage at the thought of his perfect happiness: a state of mind, of all others that can be imagined, the most odious, and the most tormenting. How, Sirs, could your hearts, possessed with these diabolical passions, bear to see the beams of his glory surrounding you on every side? How could you bear to hear the songs and adorations, that were continually addressed to his throne; and to observe the humble attendance of all the hosts of heaven about it, who perpetually reckon it their honour and happiness to be employed in obedience to his commands? Such a sight of the glory and felicity of your divine enemy would make you, so far as your limited nature was capable of it, miserable even in proportion to the degree in which he is happy. This was, no doubt, the torment of the devils as soon as they had harboured a thought of hostility against God; and the remembrance of that glory in which they once saw him, and which they know he still invariably possesses, is surely an everlasting vexation to them; and it would be so to you, if you were within the sight of it.

But further, the blessed in heaven find their everlasting entertainment "in the service of God." They rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty; i. e. they are continually employed, either in the immediate acts of devotion, or in other services, in which they still maintain a devotional temper, and are breathing out their souls in holy affections, while their active powers are employed in the execution of his commands. But as I have already shown you, that while in an unregenerate state you could have no sense of his favour to you; it is very apparent, that you could have no sentiments of gratitude and love towards him. So that while angels and glorified saints were breathing out their souls in the most delightful and rapturous praises, you must keep a sullen kind of silence: or, if it were possible that your harps and voices should sound as melodiously as theirs, it would be all ceremony and show; the music of the heart would be wanting; and you would look on all the external forms of service but as a tedious task, and count it your misfortune, that the customs of the place obliged you to attend them. You may the more easily apprehend and believe this, when you consider what little relish you now have for those solemnities of divine worship, in which sincere Christians have the most lively foretastes of heaven. You know, in your own consciences, that short and interrupted as our public services are, they are the burthen of your lives. You know that you say, in your hearts at least, "When will the sabbath be past, and the new moon be gone?" Judge then how insupportable it would be to you, to spend an everlasting sabbath thus. I question not, but to your wretched spirits annihilation would appear vastly preferable to an eternal existence so employed.

3. Another very considerable branch of the happiness of heaven, is that which arises "from the sight of the glory of an exalted Redeemer;" but for this likewise no unconverted sinner can have any relish.

This is a view of the future happiness, which our Lord gives us, when he prays for his people in those memorable words, engraven, as I hope, upon many of our hearts; "Father, I will that they whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me." And he elsewhere promises it, as the great reward he would bestow upon his people: "If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there also shall my servant be." And agreeable to this, the apostle Paul represents it as the transporting view in which he considered the happiness of the future world; I desire, says he, to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better; incomparably beyond any of the enjoyments of the present world which can come into competition with it.—But for this part of the happiness of angels, and of the spirits of just men made perfect, it is also evident, that you, sinners, can have no relish.

The sight of Christ will afford holy souls a transporting delight, because they will regard it as the glory of their Redeemer and their friend, and as a pledge and security of their own glory. But what foundation can you, sinners, find for such a joyful sympathy with Christ, and such a comfortable conclusion with regard to yourselves? Such is the wretched degeneracy of your nature, that though Christ be indeed "the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely, being the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person," possessed of every divine perfection and excellence, yet you now slight and neglect him, and discern in him no form nor comeliness, for which he is to be desired: and were you unregenerate in heaven, the same principle would prevail. Now where there is no love to a person, there can be no delight in his converse, nor any pleasure in his happiness. Nay, the contrariety of your nature to his would rather occasion aversion and terror. You could not but know, that the blessed Jesus is holy and undefiled, and separate from sinners; that he abhors all moral evil to such a degree, that he laid aside all the glory and entertainments of heaven, that he might destroy the interest of sin in this world of ours, and might purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works: and when you should recollect at the same time that sinfulness, that continued to reign in your hearts, and made you to every good work reprobate, you could not but know that you must be hateful to him; and therefore could not but fear, lest his almighty power should be exercised for your punishment and destruction: and thus your terror must rise, in proportion to the sensible evidence you had of his dignity and authority. In a word, you would stand like guilty rebels in the presence-chamber of their injured and displeased Sovereign: his throne and his sceptre, his robe and his crown, his courtiers and his guards, though in themselves splendid and magnificent objects, only serve to terrify and amaze them, while they display the grandeur and power of their enemy.

4. Another very considerable branch of the celestial happiness will be "the society of angels and glorified saints;" but for this likewise an unregenerate sinner must be unfit.

You know, that when the apostle speaks of our alliance to the heavenly world, he represents it as a social state; where excellent spirits dwell together, and converse with each other with mutual esteem and endearment: "Ye are come (says he) to the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven, and to the spirits of just men made perfect." It is sitting down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with all the patriarchs and prophets, all the apostles and martyrs, in the kingdom of heaven: and perhaps you think you shall want nothing more to complete your happiness, than to be admitted to a place among them. But reflect a little more attentively upon the circumstances of things, and I am persuaded you will form a different judgment.

There is no reason to doubt, but that at your first entrance into the regions of glory you would be agreeably struck with the view of those inhabitants. As for those beauties of their character, which consist in love to God, and in zeal for his honour and interest, it is certain, that you would be insensible of them, and pay but little regard to them: but the humanity and benevolence of their temper would no doubt render them agreeable to you: and so much the more, as self-love might lead you to expect some personal advantage by it. And it is more than possible, that you would be much prejudiced in their favour by those resplendent and attractive forms in which they appear; forms, no doubt, far more beautiful and engaging than any which the children of men ever saw upon earth. On both these accounts it might be natural enough for you at first to address them with an air of respect, as persons that you could be glad to be upon good terms with, and in whose friendship you could desire to share.

But how do you think that any such proposal of friendship would be received by an angel or a glorified saint? No doubt, if there were any prospect of converting you, or any hope you might be brought to a devout and holy temper, they would immediately become preachers of righteousness to you; and endeavour, by the most rational, the most pathetic, and the most insinuating address, to awaken and charm you to a sense of religion, and so to form you to a capacity for happiness. But they would know, that according to the eternal constitution of God, there could be no room to entertain such a hope; but that being filthy, you must be filthy still: and therefore, as they would know you to be incorrigible, their love to God, and their concern to be approved and accepted by him, would prevent their forming any intimate friendship with persons whose natures were so contrary to him, and on whom he looked with such irreconcilable abhorrence. And besides this, their own personal sanctity of character would give them an aversion to such corrupt and degenerate creatures; so that how much soever they might pity your condition, they would turn away from you as objects whose presence and converse were not to be endured.

And do you not easily apprehend, that such a refusal on their part would be both shameful and very provoking to you? For which way could you bear it, to be thus rejected and dishonoured by the most excellent part of the creation; by those whom perhaps you once intimately knew, and with whom you conversed upon equal terms; nay, by many who were once much your inferiors, and whom perhaps, in the pride of your hearts, you would not condescend to regard? The natural effect of this must surely be, that you would soon be proportionably displeased and enraged with the refusal, as you were at first charmed at their appearance; and when you saw that transporting pleasure which they took in the affection and friendship of each other, and the joy which the divine favour poured into their souls, while you, in the very same place, were excluded from these rich entertainments, your heart would soon burn with envy and indignation; and as much as you before admired them, you, upon this, would come to hate them. And perhaps that hatred would put you upon some attempt to interrupt, or even, if it were possible, to destroy, that happiness which you were not allowed to share. But then, when you saw them continually under the divine protection, and compassed with his favour, as with a shield, so that your malice could not reach them, all the keenness and rancour of your spirit would recoil upon itself; you would fly from their presence as insupportable: and would be glad to retire to some meaner apartment, or to hide yourselves in the shades of darkness; so that you might but get rid of the sight of so many dazzling objects, whose lustre, instead of cheering your vitiated eye, would pain and overpower it.

But if you should not be transported to this diabolical excess; if it were possible for you to behold the glorified saints, and to live among them, without these envious and tormenting passions; yet surely you would want a relish for the most entertaining part of their conversation. Had you indeed a good natural genius, which to be sure many unconverted sinners have, it might be very agreeable to hear them discoursing of the wonders of nature; and that curiosity, which is, in some measure, incident even to persons of the meanest capacities, would make it pleasant to hear them recount the important history relating to the revolutions of the angelic world, which we on this earth are entirely strangers to, or at least have been very little acquainted with them. But surely the most delightful topics of conversation, which heaven itself can furnish out, must be those which are religious and divine; the infinite perfections of the ever-blessed God; the personal glories and incomparable love of his condescending, but exalted Son; and the sanctifying operations of the blessed Spirit on the soul, transforming it into the divine image, and making it meet for eternal glory. Yea, even when the blessed spirits above are handling philosophical or historical subjects, they still consider them with a regard to God, as his perfections are displayed and illustrated in the works of his hands, and in the conduct of his providence. And here their pleasure flows, not merely from a set of rational ideas, which arise in their own minds, or are suggested to them by others; but from the exercise of those devout affections upon the blessed God, which are correspondent to these several subjects of discourse.

And can you, Sirs, who are alienated from the divine life, and accustomed to live in a continual neglect and forgetfulness of the Great Parent of universal nature, can you relish such subjects as these? You would, no doubt, be discontented and uneasy in such a scene; the heavenly oratory of this holy society would have no charms for you; but you would be longing for some of those vain and worthless companions, which you were so fond of here upon earth, to hear a merry story, or a song, or to join with them in the pleasures of a debauch.

5. Another considerable branch of the happiness of heaven, arises "from the assured prospect of the everlasting continuance of this felicity;" but, if an unregenerate soul could find any entertainment at all in heaven, he certainly could have no ground for such an expectation of its continuance.

When the children of God on earth think of the happiness of heaven, the eternity of it makes a very deep impression on their hearts, and even swallows up their souls with ardent desire and unutterable joy: it raises their esteem, and animates their hope, while they reflect on that exceeding and eternal weight of glory, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, and that inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and which fadeth not away.—And no doubt but the blessed in heaven regard it in the same view, and all the pleasures they enjoy are vastly increased by the prospect of their endless duration; so that by the anticipation of an eternity still to come, they do, as it were, every moment enjoy an infinite satisfaction.—But as for you, sinners, while you are so ill attempered to the happiness of heaven, the prospect of an eternal abode there would not, on the principles I have laid down above, be a prospect of eternal happiness, but rather, on the whole, of eternal uneasiness to you.

But suffer me a little to discourse upon another supposition; and let me now, for argument sake, wave what I have been so long insisting upon, and suppose, that you could so far command the turbulent passions of your own heart, and so unite (as it were) the whole powers of your soul, to attend to the beauty of place, the harmony of music, and whatever else may be supposed capable of regaling the senses or the imagination; as upon the whole, to find heaven a pleasing and delightful abode, and to wish, that though some of its entertainments were above your taste and capacity, yet you might be allowed an eternal enjoyment of the rest; could there be any room for you to expect a perpetual abode in these blissful seats? No, sinners, you would not be able so much as to hope it. The good itself is so great, and perpetual enjoyment, even in any degree, has such a kind of infinite value, that I know not how the purest and noblest spirits in heaven could absolutely have been secure of it, separate from the engagement of a divine promise. And what divine promise would you be able to have recourse to in such a circumstance as we now suppose? Where could you find it in all the book of God, that persons of your character should ever enter into heaven at all, much less that you should for ever continue there? You could have therefore no security of the continuance of your abode in heaven, if it were possible that you should enter on the possession of it: but when you should consider the unsullied holiness of the ever-blessed God, the Sovereign of this sacred province, and the spotless purity of that gracious Redeemer, to whom the government of it is committed, you could not but fear, that you should quickly be seized by the hand of vengeance, be hurled from the battlements of heaven, and plunged low into the pit of destruction. You know this was the condemnation of the rebel angels, and your guilt, compared with that dreadful event, which makes so considerable a scene of the history of heaven, would, I doubt not, be sufficient to create everlasting jealousy and uneasiness, and to turn every pleasurable circumstance into a source of horror, in the apprehensions of being deprived eternally of it.

Thus you see, Sirs, from a particular survey of the various lights in which heaven is represented, and of the various branches of which its happiness consists, an unregenerate sinner is incapable of it, even though we should suppose that he was actually admitted to it. Let me entreat you to reflect on all these things, and you will see the reasonableness of that one remark with which I shall conclude this discourse.

How vain are all those hopes of heaven, which in your present condition you are ready to entertain!

I have been proving at large, that if God were to admit you to the possession of heaven, which it is certain he never will, you would be incapable of relishing the enjoyments of it; nay, that there would be a solid foundation in your own hearts, for many of the most tumultuous and disquieting passions. Envy and grief, fear and rage, those roots of bitterness, would spring up even in the paradise of God, and turn the fertility of that blessed soil into their own nourishment. And do you imagine that any external accommodations or ornaments could make you easy and comfortable under the transports of such hellish passions? What if you were to take a man that was tormented with a violent fit of the stone or gout, and to place him in a most delicious garden, or in a palace of marble and cedar, to set him on a throne of gold under a canopy of purple, to clothe him with robes of velvet and embroidery, regaling him with the most delicious fruits and generous wines, and at the same time soothing his ear with all the harmony of sound, which the most melodious symphony of instruments and voices could afford? Would all this magnificence and luxury make him insensible of that anguish which was racking his very vitals? or would not that inward torture rather render him insensible of this association of pleasurable impressions from without? Yea, would it not incline him to suspect, that you intended all these pompous preparations only to deride and insult him? As little would your distempered and unholy souls be capable of relishing the entertainments of heaven, while these entertainments, and these souls of yours, continue what they are at present.

There must be therefore a change: and will you consider where that change must be made? If you continue still in your present character and circumstances, there must be a vast change in heaven itself, before you can be happy in it. The whole temper, character, and disposition of every saint and angel there, must be changed from what it now is, before they can be capable of any friendly and complacential conversation with you. Yea, our "Lord Jesus Christ, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," must divest himself of those beauties of holiness, which are infinitely dearer to him than any external grandeur or authority, before he can receive you into his kingdom. Nay, the very "Father of lights with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning," must be entirely changed. He must lay aside that holiness which is essential to his nature, and which is the brightness and glory of it; he must love that which he now hates, and be indifferent to that which he most affectionately loves, before he can open his arms to you, and smile upon your souls. And can you dare to hope for such an unaccountable, such an inconceivable, revolution as this? No, Sirs, infinitely sooner would God change earth into hell, and bury you, and all of your character, under the ruins of this world which you inhabit and pollute, than he would thus tarnish the beauties of heaven, and divest himself of the brightest glory of his own divinity. "God," says Archbishop Tillotson, "has condescended to take our nature upon him, that he might make us capable of happiness; but if this will not do, he will not put off his own nature to make us happy."

What then do you imagine? Do you think that God will prepare some separate apartments in heaven, furnished with a variety of sensual pleasure, for the entertainments of persons of your character? some apartments from whence the tokens of his presence shall be withdrawn, from whence the exercise of his worship shall be banished, from whence saints and angels shall retire to make way for those inhabitants, who, like you, have sinned themselves beyond a capacity of enjoying God, or of being fit companions for any of his most excellent creatures? This were to suppose the Christian religion false, and to contradict the light of natural reason too, which not only shows such a disposition of things to be unworthy the divine sanctity and majesty, but also shows that if there be a future state, it must be a state of misery to wicked men, in whose minds those vicious habits prevail, which are even now the beginning of hell; which therefore they must carry along with them wherever they are, in proportion to the degree in which they are predominant.

Upon the whole then, you must evidently see that it is absolutely necessary that you, sinners, should be changed, if ever you expect to have any part or lot in the future happiness. And when do you expect that change should be wrought? Do you expect it when death has done its dreadful office upon you, and your soul arrives at the invisible world? Is the air of it (if I may be allowed the expression) so refined, that it will immediately purify and transform every polluted sinner that comes into it? You cannot but know, that the whole tenor of Scripture forbids that presumptuous, destructive hope. It assures us, that there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave; but that we must be judged according to what we have done in the body, and not according to what has passed in any separate state, whether the actions we have done be good, or whether they be evil.

If ever therefore you are regenerate at all, it must be while you are here below, in this state of education and trial: and if you continue in your sins till death surprise you, your souls will be for ever sealed up under an irreversible sentence, and by the decree of God, and the constitution of things, will be excluded from happiness, as by no means either entitled to it, or prepared for it. So evident is the truth of this assertion in the text, that "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

And will you then sit down contentedly under such a conclusion as this, "I shall be excluded from this kingdom as accursed and profane?" Alas, Sirs, the conclusion is big with unutterable terror and death; as I should now proceed to show you at large if my time would allow: for I am next to represent the infinite importance of entering into that kingdom, and consequently of that entire change which has been proved to be necessary to that entrance. But I must reserve that to the next opportunity of this kind. In the mean time let me add, that I doubt not but there are many present, who have heard this description of the heavenly world with delight, and who are saying in their hearts, "This is my rest for ever; here will I dwell, for I have desired it: this is the felicity to which my heart aspires with the most ardent breathing." Such may with the utmost reason regard it as a token for good, and may go on in a cheerful assurance, that the grace that has made them meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, will at length conduct them to it, in perfect safety and everlasting triumph. Amen.

SERMON XXVII.

OF THE IMPORTANCE OF ENTERING INTO THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN

JOHN iii. 3.

—— Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

How impossible it is that an unregenerate sinner should see, i. e. enjoy, the kingdom of God, or that future blessedness to which the gospel is intended to lead its professors, I have shown you at large. I have appealed to the testimony of God's holy prophets, and apostles, in concurrence with that of his incarnate Son, to prove that persons of such a character are, by the inviolable constitution of that kingdom, excluded from it. And I have further, in my last discourse, proved, that if they were actually admitted to it, they would be incapable of relishing its pleasures; that their vitiated palate would have a distaste to the choicest fruits of the paradise of God; yea, that in these blissful regions, thorns and briers would spring up in their paths, and make them wretched in the very seat of happiness.

I doubt not, but you are in your consciences generally convinced, that the truth of these things cannot be contested. You are inwardly persuaded that it is indeed so; and I fear many of you have also reason to apprehend, that you are of this unhappy number, who are hitherto strangers to regenerating grace. But how are your minds impressed with this apprehension? Do I wrong you, Sirs, when I suspect that some of them are hardly impressed at all? Do I wrong you, when I suspect there are those of you, who have spent the last week with very little reflection upon what you have heard? The cares and amusements of life have been pursued as before, and you have not taken one hour to enter into the thought with self-application, and seriously to consider, "I am one of those concerning whom eternal wisdom and truth has pronounced, that, if they continue such as at present they are, they shall not see the kingdom of God." You have not paused at all upon the awful thought; you have not offered one lively petition to God, to beg that you may be recovered from this unhappy state, and brought to a meetness for his kingdom, and a title to it. For your sakes therefore, and for the sakes of others in your state, having already explained, illustrated, and confirmed the proposition in my text, I proceed,

III. To represent to you the importance of the argument suggested here; or to show you, how much every unregenerate sinner ought to be alarmed to hear that, while he continues in his present state, "he cannot see the kingdom of God."

And O that, while I endeavour to illustrate this, my words might enter into your minds as goads, and might fix there as nails fastened in a sure place! The substance of my argument is given forth by the one great Shepherd; may the prosecution of it be blessed, as the means of reducing some wandering sheep into his fold!

Now, in order to illustrate the force of this argument, I beseech you seriously to consider,—what this kingdom is, from which you are in danger of being for ever excluded;—and what will be the condition of all those who shall be finally cut off from any interest in it.

[1.] Consider "what that kingdom is from which the unregenerate, or those who are not born again, shall be excluded."

And here you are not to expect a complete representation of it; for that is an attempt in which the tongues of angels, as well as men, might fail; or how proper soever their language might be in itself, to us would be unintelligible; for "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." And surely these final and most illustrious preparations of his love must, beyond all others, exceed our description and conception. A minister that, with the apostle Paul, had been caught up into the third heaven, if he would attempt to speak of the glorious scenes which were there opened to him, must say, they were unutterable things: and one that, with John, had lain in the bosom of Christ himself, must say, as that apostle did, "It does not yet appear what we shall be." And, indeed, when we go about to discourse of it, I doubt not but the blessed angels pity the weakness of our apprehensions and expressions, and know that we do but debase the subject, when we attempt the most to exalt and adorn it.

Yet there are just and striking representations of this kingdom made in the word of God; and we are there often told in general, wherein it shall consist. You no doubt remember that I was, in the last of these Lectures, going over several important views of it. I then told you, it will consist in the perfection of our souls in knowledge and holiness; in the sight of God, and our blessed Redeemer; in exercising the most delightful affections towards them, and in being for ever employed in rendering them the most honourable services; in conversing with saints and glorious angels; and in the assured expectation of the eternal continuance of this blessedness in all its branches. That this is the Scriptural representation of the matter, I proved to you from many express testimonies in the word of God: and I doubt not, but you have often heard the excellency of each of these views represented at large, in distinct discourses on each.

I will not, therefore, now repeat what has been said upon such occasions; but will rather direct you to some general considerations, which may convince you of the excellency of that state and world, from which, if you continue unregenerate, you must for ever be excluded: for I would fain fix it upon your minds, that it is in this connexion, and for this purpose, that the representation is made. And O that you might so review it, as no longer to neglect so great a salvation, nor act as if you judged such everlasting life to be beneath your attention, and unworthy your care and regard! You cannot think it so when you consider,—that it is represented in Scripture under the most magnificent images;—that it is the state which God has prepared for the display of his glory, and the entertainment of his most favourite creatures;—that it is the great purchase of the blood of his eternal Son;—that it is the main work of his sacred Spirit to prepare men's hearts for it;—and the great business of our inveterate enemy the devil, by all possible means, to prevent our obtaining it.—Each of these considerations may much illustrate the excellency of it, and all taken together yield a most convincing demonstration.

1. Consider, "by what a variety of beautiful and magnificent images this happiness is represented in the word of God;" and that may convince you of its excellency.

When the blessed God himself would raise our conceptions of a state of being, so much superior to any thing we have ever seen or known, unless he intended a personal and miraculous revelation of it, he must borrow our language, and in painting the glory of heaven must take his colours from earth. And here the magnificence of a city, the sweetness of a garden, the solemn pomp of a temple, the lustre of a crown, and the dignity of a kingdom, strike powerfully on the human mind, and fill it with veneration and delight. But when such figures as these are borrowed from this low world of ours, faintly to shadow out that which is above, there is always the addition of some important circumstance, to intimate how far the celestial original exceeds the brightest earthly glory, by which the divine condescension has vouchsafed to describe it.

The enumeration of a variety of Scriptural descriptions will set these remarks in the strongest light.—If therefore heaven be described as a city, it is the New Jerusalem, the city of our God, that cometh down from God out of heaven: the pavement of its streets is all of pure gold, its gates are pearl, and its foundation jewels.—If it be a garden, it is the paradise of God, and so far superior to that which he at first prepared and furnished out for the entertainment of Adam in his state of innocence, that it is planted on every side with the tree of life, of which there was but one alone in the garden of Eden; and is watered, not with such common rivers as the Tigris and Euphrates, but with that living, copious, unexhausted stream, the river of the water of life, which proceeds from the throne of God, and gently glides along through all its borders. When it is represented as a temple, we are told, that instead of a golden ark placed in the remotest recess, to which only the high priest might once a year approach, and on which he might not be allowed to gaze, the throne of God is erected there, perpetually surrounded with myriads of worshippers who see his face, and like the high priest when clothed in his richest robes, have his name written in their foreheads: instead of the feeble rays of that golden candlestick, whole lamps shone in the holy place, the heavenly temple is illuminated in a more glorious manner, and needs no candle, neither light of the sun; for the glory of God continually enlightens it, and the Lamb is the light thereof: nay, we are assured that its sacred ministers are made kings as well as priests unto God; and accordingly being clothed in white raiment, they have crowns of gold on their heads; as well as harps and golden vials, or censers full of incense, in their hands: and lest we should think these pompous services are only the entertainment of some peculiarly sacred seasons, we are told that they rest not day nor night, adoring him that sits upon the throne, and are fixed as pillars in his temple, to go out no more.—Again, if it be spoken of as a crown, it is represented as incorruptible; a crown of glory that fadeth not away.—And when it is called a kingdom, the Scripture does not only add, as here in the text, that it is the kingdom of God, which must certainly exalt the idea of it; but that it is a kingdom which cannot be moved, an everlasting kingdom: nay, to carry our thoughts to the highest degree of dignity and glory, it is spoken of as a sitting down with Christ on his throne.

But further, the value of these illustrious representations is much enhanced, if we consider the character of the persons by whom they are made. They were persons well acquainted with these things, having received their information from a divine revelation, and from the immediate visions of God. They were also persons of such sublime and elevated sentiments, that they had a sovereign contempt for all the enjoyments of time and sense, even those which the generality of mankind set the greatest value upon, and counted all things but loss for the knowledge of Christ, and the testimony of a good conscience, while they looked not at temporal but at eternal things. They could deliberately, constantly, and even cheerfully, resign all the riches, and honours, and carnal pleasures, which they might have purchased by their apostasy from religion; and were ready to embrace bonds, imprisonments, or death itself, when it met them in the way of their duty.—Now certainly a glory, with which such holy, wise, and heroic persons were so passionately enamoured, and which they describe with such pathos of language, and such ecstasy of delight, while they were trampling with so generous a disdain on every thing which earth calls good and great, must deserve our very attentive regard. And this it yet more evidently will appear to do, if we consider,

2. "It is the state and world, which God has prepared for the display of his glory, and the entertainment of the most favoured of his creatures."

This argument seems to be hinted at, when it is said, (as in the place I referred to before,) "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." God well knows the capacity of his creatures, and how much happiness they are able and fit to receive; and he can fill their capacities to the utmost; nay, he can further enlarge them to what degree he pleases, that they may admit superior degrees of glory and felicity. A happiness, therefore, which he has prepared on purpose, to display the riches of his magnificence and love, and to show what he can do to delight his creatures, must certainly be in some measure proportionable, if I may so express it, to the infinity of his own sacred perfections. Let us then seriously consider who God is; and attentively dwell, in our meditation, on the extent of his power, and the riches of his bounty; and our conception of the happiness of heaven must be raised to something more glorious, than the most emphatical words can perfectly describe.

And here, to assist our imagination in some degree, let us look round us, and take a survey of this visible world. This earth, how conveniently has he furnished it, how beautifully has he disposed it, how richly has he adorned it! What various and abundant provision has he made for the subsistence, the accommodation, and the entertainment of the creatures that inhabit it! and especially of man, in whom this scheme and system of things appears to centre, and to whom it is all most wisely and graciously referred! Yet earth is the habitation of a race of mean and degenerate creatures, who are but in a state of trial; nay, it is the habitation of thousands and ten thousands of God's incorrigible enemies, with whom he is angry every day. Already it is marked with some awful characters of the divine displeasure; and the Scripture assures us, that it is reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men. Yet even this earth is not a spectacle unworthy our regard; nor can we, if we allow ourselves to survey it with becoming attention, behold it without an affecting mixture of admiration, of love, and of joy: passions that will strike us yet more powerfully, if from this earth of ours we raise our eyes to the visible heavens, and there behold the glory of the sun, the brightness of the moon, and all the numerous hosts of heaven that attend in her train. Who that considers, with any degree of attention, their magnitude, their lustre, their motion, and their influence, can forbear crying out, "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth, who has set thy glory above the heavens!" And when, with even these in our view, we further reflect, that there is another apartment, as yet invisible, of which this spangled firmament is but, as it were, the shining vail; an apartment, where the great Creator and Governor of all has fixed his stated residence, and erected the throne of his glory; even that throne which is for ever surrounded by all the most holy and excellent of his creatures; we must be convinced, it is something more beautiful and more magnificent than this harmonious system itself. And, methinks, when we have said more beautiful and more magnificent than this, imagination is ready to fail us, and to leave the mind dazzled and overwhelmed with an effulgence of lustre which it cannot delineate, and can scarce sustain. Yet will our venerable apprehensions of it be further assisted, if we consider,

3. That the kingdom of heaven is "the great purchase of the blood of God's only-begotten Son;" and therefore to be sure it must be inconceivably valuable.

If you are at all acquainted with your Bibles, you must know, that we are by sin in a state of alienation from God; that we had forfeited all our title to his love, and stood justly exposed to his severe displeasure; and that it is Jesus who delivers us from the wrath to come. Now if we owe it to his merit and atonement that we live, much more are we to ascribe it to him, if we are raised to any superior degree of happiness. If God could not, with honour to his justice, have suffered us, without such a propitiation, to have passed off with impunity; much less could he, without it, have received us to his embraces, and have advanced us to sit with him on his throne. Accordingly, it is said of the blessed martyrs in the heavenly world, even of those who had so gloriously distinguished their fidelity and zeal, and loved not their lives unto the death; that they had washed their robes, and made them white, in the blood of the Lamb: and they gratefully acknowledge it in their hymns of praise, that "Christ had redeemed them to God by his blood, and made them kings and priests unto God."

Now let us seriously reflect, and consider what this blood of the Lamb is. The apostle Peter tells us, that silver and gold, and all the peculiar treasures of kings and princes, are but corruptible things, or perishing and worthless trifles, when compared with it. And no wonder it is represented in such exalted language, when we consider it was the blood of the only-begotten Son of God, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person, and indeed one with him, being possessed of a nature truly and properly divine; so that it is called the blood of God. We may well argue, even from these transient surveys, that it was some important happiness which he came to procure at so expensive a rate. Had an angel been sent down from heaven, we should naturally have concluded, it must have been upon some momentous errand: surely, then, when the Lord of angels comes down, not only to live on earth, but to expire in bitter agonies on the cross, to purchase a benefit for us, we may be well assured that this benefit must be very considerable. Our Lord Jesus Christ must certainly set a very great value upon it, or he would not have purchased it at such a price: and we are sure, the value that he apprehended in it must be its true value. He could not be imposed upon by any false appearance of glory and splendour: he despised, with a just and generous contempt, all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and he was also well acquainted with the celestial kingdom, having so long dwelt in it, and so long presided over it: yet so highly does he esteem it, that he speaks of it upon all occasions, as the highest possible gift of divine bounty, the richest preparation and noblest contrivance of divine love; yea, he regards it as a felicity so great, that when he conducts his people into it, with the last solemn pomp of the judgment-day, it is said, He shall see of the travail of his soul, and be satisfied, allowing it to be a just equivalent for all he has done and all he has suffered in so glorious a cause.

4. The excellency of the heavenly kingdom will further appear, if we consider, that "it is the main work of the Spirit of God upon men's hearts, to prepare them for an admittance into it."

You well know, that the blessed Spirit of God is spoken of as that divine agent by whom all the hosts of heaven were created, and all God's various works produced; and it is he that knows the things of God, even as the human spirit knows the things of a man. Now it is his peculiar office in the economy of our redemption, to form the soul to a meetness for glory. Accordingly, when the apostle Paul had been reminding the Corinthians, that while they continued in their sinful state, they were unfit for the kingdom of God; he adds, "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."

That the Spirit should condescend to engage at all in such a work, must give us a very sublime idea of the end at which it aims. But much more will that idea be raised, when we consider with what a variety, and what a constancy, of operations he begins, continues, and perfects it. He attempts it (as we shall hereafter more particularly show you) sometimes by convictions of terror, and sometimes by insinuations of love; and by one method or another, in the hearts of all the heirs of this glory, he works so great a change, that it is represented by turning a heart of stone into a heart of flesh, by raising the dead from their graves, yea, by producing a new creation. For this does he watch over the soul with the tenderest care, and continues his friendly offices, to recover it from relapses, and gradually to form it to advancing degrees of sanctity, till at length it be enabled to perfect holiness in the fear of God. Nay, so intent is this sacred agent on the important work, that when sinners most insolently and ungratefully reject him, and by resisting him oppose their own happiness, he does not immediately leave them; he strikes them again and again; and waits upon them for succeeding days, and months, and years: and when, perhaps, the sincere convert makes the most ungrateful return for the experience of his goodness, even after he has acknowledged, and at length obeyed, it; when, under the fatal transport of some ungoverned passion, and the influence of some strong temptation, he acts as if he were intent upon tearing down the work of the Spirit of God upon his soul, and driving him for ever away; yet in how many instances does he return again after all these injuries, pleading the cause of God with a sweetly prevailing eloquence, and thus healing the wound, and repairing the breach, and making it perhaps stronger than before? And all this for what? That the happy subject of all these kind operations may be formed to the fitness of the kingdom of heaven. —And are we to regard this blessed Spirit as an unmeaning agent, or as incapable of judging of the importance of this end for which he acts? Is that almighty energy of his employed in an insignificant manner? Surely Nicodemus, slow of understanding as he was, must apprehend the importance of entering into the kingdom of heaven, when he heard, that in order to be admitted to it, a man must be born of the Spirit. And let me add once more,

5. That the excellency of the heavenly kingdom may further be argued, "from the eagerness with which the enemy of souls is endeavouring to prevent our entrance into it."

You know the devil is always represented as the inveterate enemy of our happiness. His rage is expressed by that of a roaring lion, that walks about seeking whom he may devour; and with unwearied diligence he is continually employed in forming and pursuing his temptations: and this is the grand design of all, that he may exclude us from the promised felicity. While sinners are in their unregenerate state, he endeavours to engage all their regards to the objects of time and sense, and for that purpose he continually presents them with a variety of entertainments and amusements suited to their respective tempers and circumstances. If they are awakened to any serious concern about their eternal salvation, he uses his utmost address to divert their minds from an attendance to it: and for this purpose he displays before them all the allurements of sin in its most engaging forms; and if they are not captivated with these, he often puts on a face of terror, and endeavours to affright them from religion by the most gloomy representations of it, or by horrible and distracting suggestions, "that it is now for ever too late to attain it." Or if divine grace surmount all this opposition, and the sinner resolutely chooses his portion in heaven, and puts his soul into the hands of Christ, to be conducted to it; the malice of Satan pursues him even to that sacred retreat, which he has sought in the arms of his Saviour: and if he cannot prevent the soul from entering into heaven, he will at least labour to bring it into such a state of negligence, and to seduce it into those delays and relapses which may divert its regards to that blessed world, which may cloud its evidences of it, and may at least, as much as possible, diminish the degree of its glory there.

Now permit me in this instance to turn the artillery of this cunning enemy against himself, and to argue the excellency of this kingdom, from the zeal and attachment with which he endeavours to obstruct your attaining it. Though Satan be now a very degenerate creature, he was once an angel of light, and still retains much of the knowledge, though he has lost the rectitude and integrity, of the angelic nature. And he particularly knows what heaven is, because he was once an inhabitant there; and while he is endeavouring to persuade the sinner to prefer earth before it, he does, by that very endeavour, incontestably prove, that he himself knows the contrary, and is fully apprised that there is nothing here to be compared with the felicity of the future state. And therefore, while he seeks the destruction of the soul, he can leave it in the enjoyment of all its worldly prosperity; nay, he will attempt to lead him into methods, by which this prosperity may be promoted and increased.

And thus, Sirs, I have endeavoured a little to represent to you what this kingdom of heaven is, from which we are assured that unconverted sinners shall for ever be excluded. I have argued its excellency,—from the representations which are made of it in the word of God,—from its being the preparation of divine love,—from its being the purchase of a Redeemer's blood,—and the end to which, on the one hand, the glorious operations of the blessed Spirit lead,—and of which, on the other hand, all the stratagems and assaults of the prince of darkness are intended to deprive us. If therefore there be truth in Scripture, if there be wisdom in heaven, or policy in hell, it must surely be infinitely important. And will any of you be such mean-spirited creatures, as, when this happiness is proposed to you, basely to relinquish the pursuit of it, and to sacrifice this blessed hope to any perishing trifle of mortal life? Surely it would be madness; though nothing more were to be apprehended than the loss of it; and though, when heaven were lost, all that earth can give should remain, if not to counterbalance the loss, yet at least to make you less sensible of it. But the weight of the argument will much more evidently appear, if you consider,

[2.] What will at last become of all those who are excluded from this heavenly kingdom.

And here I beseech you to ask your own consciences, whether they be not inwardly persuaded, —that those who are excluded from heaven will remain in a state of existence in which they will be ever sensible of their loss,—and will be delivered over by divine vengeance into that seat of torment which God has prepared for the punishment of his implacable and incorrigible enemies.—This many of you do undoubtedly believe of such persons in general: believe it therefore of yourselves, if you are, and continue, in an unregenerate state.

1. "You will still continue in a state of existence, in which you will be ever sensible of your loss."

It might afford some wretched kind of consolation to you, if, as soon as you died out of this world, your being or your apprehensive powers were immediately to cease. Then the loss of heaven would only be an affliction to you in your dying moments, when you saw the enjoyments of earth were come to an end, and that you must have no part in any future happiness. But alas, Sirs, you cannot but know that when your bodies are dead, and consumed in their graves, your thinking faculties will still be continued to you: and O that you would seriously reflect how they will then be employed! You will then be thinking what you have done in life, what you have chose for your happiness, and what has been the consequence of that choice. You will look round in vain for such accommodations and pleasures as you were once most fond of, but they will be no more; and when you perceive them vanished like the visionary amusements of a dream, you will lift up your astonished eyes towards the regions of glory. And you indeed will have a lively view of them; but to what purpose will that view serve? Only through the righteous vengeance of God, to aggravate your misery and despair. "Alas," will you think, "there are millions of creatures yonder in heaven, who are rejoicing in the sight and favour of God, and are as full of happiness as their natures can contain, and shall be so for ever; while I am cut off from all share in the divine bounty. Rivers of pleasure are flowing in upon them, while not one drop is sent down to me: nor could I obtain it, though I were to ask the favour from the least of Christ's servants there. I am cast out as an accursed wretch, with whom God and his holy and blessed creatures will have no further intercourse or communion: and why am I thus cast out? and why am I thus cut off from God's favour, and driven from his presence, while so many that dwelt with me on earth are admitted to it? My nature was originally as capable of happiness as theirs; and though it was sadly degenerate, it might like theirs have been renewed. God was once offering me that grace, by which my disordered soul might have been transformed, and I might have been fitted for the regions of glory: but I despised all these offers, and gave the preference to those fading vanities, which, alas! have for ever forsaken me. And now they that were ready are gone in to the delightful banquet, and the door is shut; the everlasting gates are shut for ever, and barred against me. And here I must lie at this miserable distance, envying and raging at their happiness, of which, whatever sight or knowledge I may have of it, I must never, never, never, partake."

Such reflections as these, Sirs, will cut deep into your souls; and accordingly our Lord declares to impenitent sinners in his own days, There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when you see others sitting down in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out. And if you would reflect, you might easily apprehend this. How would you be enraged at yourselves, if by your folly you had neglected securing a plentiful estate, when it was offered to you on the most easy terms; and you actually saw others, once your equals, and perhaps your inferiors, in the possession of it, in consequence of having taken those methods which you stupidly neglected! The reflection, I doubt not, would very much impair the pleasure you might find in other comfortable and agreeable circumstances. How much more insupportable then will the loss of heaven appear to you, when you come to see, and know, what it is you have lost, and have nothing to relieve or support you, under the painful recollection?

It is to no purpose to object, that upon the principles of my last discourse, there will be no room to lament your exclusion from those entertainments, which you would be incapable of relishing if you were admitted to them; for you will then see and lament that incapacity as a very great misery. And if a man, who was naturally fond of feasting and mirth, should see a great many regaling themselves, and revelling about him, while he was languishing under some painful distemper, which made him incapable of joining in the entertainment; he would yet grieve that he had no part in it, and it would be the increase, rather than the alleviation, of his uneasiness, that it was his sickness which unfitted him for it; especially if, as in your case, it was a sickness which he had brought upon himself by his own folly, and for which he had been offered an easy, pleasant, and infallible remedy, which he had refused to use till the malady was grown utterly incurable. One would imagine, this thought would be enough to impress you, but if it do not, let me entreat, and even charge, you to consider,

2. That if you are excluded from the kingdom of heaven, "you will be consigned over to those regions of darkness, despair, and misery, which God has prepared for those unhappy criminals, who are the objects of his final displeasure, and whom he will render everlasting monuments of his wrath."

There is something in human nature, that starts back at the thought of annihilation with strong reluctance; and yet how many thousands are there in this miserable world, who would with all their souls fly to it as a refuge? They shall seek death, as an inspired writer strongly expresses it, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them. I will not attempt to enter into a detail of the horrors, attending the place and state, into which all who are excluded from the glories of the heavenly world shall be cast, and in which they shall be fixed. Let that one awful Scripture suffice for a specimen of many more; in which we are told, that every one whose name was not found written in the book of life, (or who was not registered in the number of those, who were to inhabit the New Jerusalem, or the kingdom of heaven,) was cast into the lake of fire, or, as it is afterwards expressed, into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. Think of this, and ask your own hearts, you that are so impatient of the little evils of mortal life, whether you can endure to take up your abode for ever in devouring fire, or whether you can dwell with everlasting burnings? Yet these are the images by which the word of God represents it; to be plunged as in a sea of liquid fire, whose flames are exasperated and heightened, by being fed with brimstone; nay, as the prophet speaks, by a copious stream of brimstone, so expressly appointed by God himself, that this, as well as the river of the water of life, is represented as proceeding immediately from him: "he has made Tophet deep and large; the pile thereof is fire and much wood, and the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, does kindle it."

It is painful to a tender mind to think of this, as what its fellow-creatures are obnoxious to: it is grievous to speak of it in these dreadful terms. But who are we, that we should be more merciful than God? Or rather, how can we imagine it is mercy to avoid speaking of the appointment of infinite wisdom, for the punishment of impenitent sinners? What mercy were that, Sirs, to avoid to mention these terrors to you, and to neglect to warn you of them, because they are great? which is indeed the very reason why the Scripture thus pathetically describes them.

Away therefore with this foolish, this treacherous, compassion, which chooses rather to leave men to be consumed, than to disturb their slumbers! Think, Sirs, of that wretched glutton, whom Christ describes as lifting up his eyes in hell, being in torments, seeing the regions of the blessed at an unapproachable distance, and begging in vain that one drop of water might be sent to cool his tongue, amidst all the raging thirst with which he was tormented in this flame. Regard it attentively; for as God lives, and as your soul lives, if you continue in an unregenerate state, you see in that wretch the very image and representation of yourselves. Yes, sinners, I testify it to you this day, that intolerable as it seems, it will, on that supposition, be your own certain fate, or to speak much more properly, your righteous, but inevitable, doom. Heaven and earth will desert you in that dreadful hour; or, if the inhabitants of both were to join to intercede for you, it would be in vain. Sentence will be passed, and execution done; hell will open its mouth to receive you, and shut it again for ever to enclose you, with thousands, and ten thousands more, among whom you will not find one to comfort you, but every one ready to afflict you. Then shall you know the value which God sets upon his heavenly kingdom, by the judgments he inflicts upon you for neglecting and despising it; and then shall you know the importance of being born again, that only means by which hell can be avoided, and heaven secured.

And let me further add, that conviction will quickly come in this terrible way, if you are not now prevailed upon to consider these things; things, which if you have the least regard to the word of God, you cannot but notionally believe. Do not then go about to annihilate (as it were) these prospects to your mind, by placing them at a long distance. The distance is not so great as to deserve a mention. The patience of God will not wait upon you for thousands, or even hundreds, of years: you have a few mortal days, in which to consider of the matter; or rather, you have the present moment to consider of it. And if you improve the opportunity, it is well; but if not, the just and uniform methods of the divine administration shall proceed, though it should be to your ruin. God has vindicated the honours of his violated law, and despised gospel, upon millions, who with the rebel angels, by whom they have been seduced, are even now reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day; and he will as surely vindicate them upon you. If you do not repent, if you are not regenerate, you "shall all likewise perish," and not one of you shall escape.

And thus I close this copious and important argument; this argument in which life and death, salvation and damnation, are concerned. View it, my friends, in all its connexion, and see in what part of it the chain can be broken. Will you say, that without regeneration you can secure an interest in the kingdom of heaven, though the constitution of heaven oppose it, and all the declarations of God's word stand directly against it; and though nature itself reclaim, and conscience testify your incapacity to enjoy it? Or will you say, that being excluded from it, you shall suffer no considerable damage, though you lose so glorious a state, the noblest preparation of divine love, the purchase of redeeming blood, and the end of the Spirit's operation on the soul; though you ever remain sensible of your loss, and be consigned over to dwell in that flaming prison, which God has prepared for the devil and his angels, and where all the terrors of his righteous judgments are made known?

But if you are indeed inwardly convinced of the truth and importance of these things, and will go away, and act as before, without any regard to them, I can say no more. The reason of man, and the word of God, can point out no stronger arguments, than an infinite good on the one hand, and an infinite evil on the other.

Hear, therefore, O heavens, and give ear, O earth! and let angels and devils join their astonishment; that creatures who would strenuously contend, and warmly exert themselves, I will not say merely for an earthly kingdom, but in an affair where only a few pounds, or perhaps a few shillings or pence, were concerned, are indifferent here, where, by their own confession, a happy or miserable eternity is in question. For indifferent, I fear, some of you are and will continue. I have represented these things in the integrity of my heart, as in the sight of God, not in artful forms of speech, but in the genuine language, which the strong emotions of my own soul, in the views of them, most naturally dictated. Yet I think it not at all improbable, that some of you, and some perhaps who do not now imagine it, will, as soon as you return home, divert your thoughts and discourses to other objects; and may perhaps, as heretofore, lie down upon your beds without spending one quarter of an hour, or even one serious minute, in lamenting your miserable state before God, and seeking that help and deliverance which his grace alone can give. But if you thus lie down, make, if you can, a covenant with death, that it may not break in upon your slumbers; and an agreement with hell, that before the return of the morning, it may not flash in upon your careless souls another kind of conviction, than they will now receive from the voice of reason and the word of God.

SERMON XXVIII

OF THE NECESSITY OF DIVINE INFLUENCES TO PRODUCE REGENERATION IN THE SOUL

TITUS iii. 5, 6.

Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

If my business were to explain and illustrate this scripture at large, it would yield an ample field for accurate criticism and useful discourse, and more especially would lead us into a variety of practical remarks, on which it would be pleasant to dilate in our meditation. It evidently implies, "that those who are the saved of the Lord, are brought to the practice of good works;" without which faith is dead, and all pretences to a saving change are not only vain, but insolent. Yet it plainly testifies to us, "that our salvation, and acceptance with God, is not to be ascribed to these, but to the divine mercy; which mercy operates by sanctifying our hearts, through the renewing influence of the Holy Spirit: and, that there is an abundant effusion of this Spirit under the gospel," which is therefore, with great propriety, called the ministration of the Spirit, and the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

But I must necessarily, in pursuance of my general scheme, wave several of these remarks, that I may leave myself room to insist on the grand topic I intend from the words.

I have already shown you, who may be said to be in an unregenerated state: I have also described the change which regeneration makes in the soul: and have largely shown you, in the three last discourses, the absolute necessity and importance of it. And now I proceed, Fourthly, To show the necessity there is of the agency of the divine power, in order to produce this great and important change.

This is strongly implied in the words of the text: in which the apostle, speaking of the method God has been pleased to take for the display of his goodness in the salvation and happiness of fallen men, gives us this affecting view of it, that it is not by works of righteousness which we, or any of us Christians, have done, but according to his free grace and mercy that he has saved us, by the washing, or (as it might be rendered) the laver, of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.

I shall be ready to acknowledge, with the generality of ancient and modern interpreters, that baptism may probably here be called the laver of regeneration; God having appointed, that as newborn children are washed, so they, who by the influences of his grace on their hearts are born again, should, in token of their repentance for the sins of their past life, be washed with baptismal water, supposing (which was here apparently the case in this early age of Christianity) they had not received that ordinance in their infancy. Nevertheless, lest any should imagine, that an external ceremony was sufficient, or that it was the chief thing intended, the apostle takes the matter higher. And as the apostle Peter tells us, that the baptism which saves us is not merely the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God; so the apostle Paul here adds, that we are saved by the renewing of the Holy Ghost: by which I can by no means understand something entirely distinct from, and subsequent to, his regenerating influences; for, according to the view of regeneration, stated in our former discourses, none can be regenerated who are not renewed: but it seems to explain the former clause, and to refer to the more positive effect produced by divine grace on the soul, whereby Christians are not only purified from sin, but disposed to, and quickened in, a course of holy obedience. And then further tells us, that this Spirit is the gift of God, and is plentifully communicated to us in the name, and through the hands, of the blessed Redeemer, being shed on us abundantly by God, through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Agreeably therefore to the general design and purport of these words, I shall go on to demonstrate the absolute necessity of a divine agency and operation in this great work of our regeneration; which I shall do from a variety of topics. And here I shall studiously wave many controversies, with which the Christian world has been afflicted, and the soundest part of it disturbed, with relation to the kind and manner of this influence. I will not so much as mention them, and much less discuss them; lest Satan should take an advantage of us, to divert our minds from what is essential in this doctrine, to what is merely circumstantial. Only let it be observed in general, that I speak of "such an agency of God on our minds, as offers no violence to the rational and active nature which God has given us, nor does by any means supersede our obligations to those duties which his word requires; but on the contrary, cures and perfects our nature, and disposes the soul to a regard to such incumbent duties, and strengthens it in the discharge of them." With this only preliminary, which appears to me highly important, I proceed to show the reasonableness of ascribing this change to a divine agency, rather than to any thing else, which may be supposed to have any share in producing it. And we infer this,

[1.] "From the general and necessary dependence of the whole created world upon God."

There was a philosophical, as well as divine, truth, in that observation of the apostle Paul at Athens, which was well worthy of the most learned assembly; In him, i. e. in God, we live, and move, and have our being. Such is the innate weakness of created nature, that it continually depends on a divine support. The very idea of its being created supposes, that it had no cause of its existence, but the divine will, in the first moment of it: and if it could not then subsist without that will, in the first moment of its existence, it neither could subsist without it in the second, or in any future moment of it: since to have been dependent for a while, can never be supposed to render any thing for the future independent. The continued existence then of all the creatures, no less of angels, than of worms, or trees, or stones, does properly depend upon the divine energy which bears them up, and holds those of them in life which live, and those of them in being which are inanimate, or without life.

And if their being be dependent, then surely it will follow, that all their perceptive and active powers, whatsoever they are, must continually depend upon God: for to exist with such powers is evidently more than simply to exist; and if a divine agency be necessary for the latter, much more must we allow it to be necessary for the former.

The human mind therefore, with all its capacities and improvements, must acknowledge itself perpetually indebted to God, who is the fountain of truth and wisdom, as well as of being: accordingly we are told, it is he that teacheth man knowledge. All the skill of the husbandman, in one passage of Scripture, and all the wisdom of the artificer, in another, is ascribed to his influence: and if the improvement of the sciences, and any other discovery, which renders human life in any degree more commodious and agreeable, is to be ascribed to the divine illumination and influence, then surely it is from hence this art of living wisely and well must also be derived. All the views upon which good resolutions are formed, all the strong impressions upon the mind arising from these views, and all the steadiness and determination of spirit, which does not only form such purposes, but carries them into execution, are plainly the effect of the divine agency on the mind; without which no secular affairs could be clearly understood, strenuously pursued, or successfully accomplished. And how peculiarly reasonable it is, to apply this remark to the point now in view, will appear by attending,

[2.] To "the greatness and excellency of this change," which speaks it aloud to be the divine work.

I must, upon this occasion, desire you to recollect what I laid before you in several of the former discourses. Think of the new light that breaks in upon the understanding,—of the new affections that are enkindled in the heart—of the new resolutions, by which the will is sweetly and powerfully, though most freely, influenced;—and think of the degree of vigour attending these resolutions, and introducing a series of new labours and pursuits;—and surely you must confess, that it is the finger of God; especially when you consider—how beautiful and excellent, as well as how great, the work is.

Do we acknowledge, that it was the voice of God that first commanded the light to shine out of darkness, and that it was worthy of a divine agency to produce so beautiful a creature as the sun, to gild the whole face of our world, and to dress the different objects around us in such a various and vivid assemblage of colours? And shall we not allow it to be much more worthy of him, to lighten up a benighted soul, and to reduce its chaos into harmony and order?—Was it worthy of God to form the first principles even of the vegetative life, in the lowest plant or herb, and to visit, with the refreshing influences of the rain and sun, the earth wherein these seeds are sown? And is it not much more worthy of him to implant the seed of the divine life, and to nourish it from time to time by the influence of his Spirit?—Did it suit the divine wisdom and mercy to provide for sustaining our mortal lives, for healing our wounds, and recovering us from our diseases? And shall it not much more suit him, to act as the great physician of souls, in restoring them to ease, to health, and vigour?

They must be dead indeed to all sense of spiritual excellency, who do not see how much more illustriously God appears, when considered as the author of grace, than merely as the author of nature. For indeed all the works of nature, and all the instances of divine interposition to maintain its order and harmony, will chiefly appear valuable and important, when considered in subserviency to the gracious design of recovering apostate man from the ruin of that degenerate state, without which it had been far better for him never to have known being, and never to have inhabited a world so liberally furnished with a variety of good. And, therefore, I would appeal to every Christian, whether he does not find a much more ardent gratitude glowing in his heart, when he considers God as the author of the religious and divine, than merely of the animal or the rational, life.

And permit me here to remark, that, agreeably to these reasonings, some of the pagan philosophers have said very serious and remarkable things concerning the reality and the need of divine influences on the mind, for the production of virtue and piety there. Thus Seneca, when he is speaking of a resemblance to the Deity in character, ascribes it to the influence of God upon the mind. "Are you surprised," says he, "that man should approach to the gods? It is God that comes to men; nay, which is yet more, he enters into them; for no mind becomes virtuous but by his assistance."* Simplicius also was so sensible of the necessity of such an influence, that he "prays to God, as the father and guide of reason, so to cooperate with us, as to purge us from all carnal and brutish affections, that we may be enabled to act according to the dictates of reason, and to attain to the true knowledge of himself."† And Maximus Tyrius argues, agreeably to what was said above, that "if skill in the professions and sciences is insinuated into men's minds by a divine influence, we can much less imagine, that a thing so much more excellent, as virtue is, can be the work of any mortal art; for strange must be the notion that we have of God, to think that he is liberal and free in matters of less moment, and sparing in the greatest."‡ And in the same discourse he tells us, "that even the best disposed minds, as they are seated in the midst, between the highest virtue and extreme wickedness, need the assistance and the help of God, to incline and lead them to the better side."§—I am sensible that all these philosophers, with many more who speak to the same purpose, living after Christ's time, may be said to have learned such language from Christians; and if they did so, I wish all who have since worn the name had been equally teachable: but some who appeared much earlier, speak much in the same manner,‖ as I might easily show you, if it were not already more than time to observe,

‖ It is here remarkable, that Xenophon represents Cyrus, with his dying breath, "as humbly ascribing it to a divine influence, (as his word, God he had been taught to acknowledge the cause of Prosperity, and to bear his prosperity with a becoming moderation." Xen. Cyropæd. lib. viii. cap. 7. § 1. And Socrates is introduced by Plato, as declaring, "that whosoever is the cause, of consequently he is not of a divine disposition." Plat. Men. tom. ii. p. 128. And to the same purpose Plutarchus observed "that virtue is not to be taught but by divine assistance." Upotom. pag. 1081. And Aristotle confesses "that if any man escape the temptations of life, and behave unjust, (as becomes a worthy member of society, as the laws of it are framed) without which, by the way, is something very far short of religion), he has reason to own, that it is God that saves him." De Repub. lib. vi. pag. 677. edit. Francof. 1602.

[3.] That we may further argue the divine agency in this blessed work, "from the violent opposition over which it prevails in its rise and progress."

The awakened soul, when labouring towards God, and aspiring after further communications of his grace to form it for his service, may justly say, with David, "Lord, how are they increased that trouble me! How many are they that rise up against me!" With how many threatening dangers are we continually surrounded! and what a numerous host of enemies are ready to oppose us! The law of sin that wars in our members, and concerning whose forces it may well be said, Their name is Legion, for they are many; the evil influence of a degenerate world, whose corrupt examples press like a torrent, and require the most vigorous efforts to bear up against them; and in confederacy with these, and at the head of all, the prince of darkness, whose counsels and efforts, with relation to this world of ours, do, as it were, centre in this one thing, to prevent men's regeneration; because it is by means of this, that those are recovered out of the snare of the devil, who were before led captive by him at his will.

I persuade myself, that when I am speaking on this head, though some may imagine it to be mere empty harangue, and a common-place of declamation, the experienced soul will attest the truth of what I say. It may be some of you, who, by what of these sermons you have already heard, have come under some serious convictions, and been awakened in good earnest to be thoughtful about being born again, have felt such a struggle in your own minds, that you may say, you never knew before what the flesh, the world, and the devil were, nor could have imagined that their opposition to this work was so forcible and violent as you now find it. To reform the irregularities of the life is comparatively easy; but to root sin out of the soul, to consecrate the whole heart to God, and demolish those idols that have been set up, as it were, in the secret chambers of imagery, is difficult indeed: all the corruptions of the heart, in such a case, are ready to exert themselves, and it is natural for the lusts of the flesh to unite against that which is set upon destroying them all; nor did you ever know before, that there was such a world of sin within you. With violence also does the strong man armed exert himself, when his goods are about to be taken from him by one stronger than himself; as our Lord, with an unerring propriety and wisdom, represents it: and indeed it seems as if, through the violence of his malignity, and the righteous judgment of God, who, whenever he pleases, can take the wise in his own craftiness, that Satan sometimes overshoots his mark, and raises so sensible an opposition against the cause of God in the soul, that an argument might be drawn, even from that very opposition, to prove the truth and excellency of what he sets himself so directly against. And you have now perhaps experienced too, more than you ever did before, the inveterate opposition of the seed of the serpent to that of the woman: you have found, that since you began to think of religion in good earnest, some have derided you, others, it may be, have reviled you, and enemies have sprung up out of your own house; though the impressions you have felt tend to make you more amiable, more kind, and more useful, and therefore one would think should conciliate their friendship: but this is a memorable instance in which self-love seems to make, as it were, a sacrifice of itself to the hatred of God.—Now, therefore, to accomplish such a mighty change in the midst of such opposition, must evidently speak a divine interposition. And surely the Christian, when thus recovered and restored, has reason to declare, as Israel did, If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, when these confederate enemies rose up against us, then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us; then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul; then the proud waters had gone over our soul, and would have quenched and buried every spark that looked like divine life, and have borne away every purpose of reformation and holiness. The remark will be further illustrated, if we consider,

[4.] "By what feeble means this change is accomplished."

The apostle observes, that in his day they had the treasure of the gospel lodged in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power, which rendered it successful, might appear to be of God, and not of man. And it is still in a great measure apparent, that the same method is made use of, from the same principle. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal; and if, at any time, they are mighty and effectual, it must be only through God. It is not by secular might or power, that this great work is accomplished: no, nor by the refinements of learning, or the charms of eloquence. These things indeed have their use; the understanding may sometimes be convinced by the one, and the affections moved by the other: yet where both these have been done, the work often drops short, and it may be the plainest addresses from a weak and almost trembling tongue, shall perform that which the far superior talents of many have not been able to effect. A multitude of such instances have been found, and perhaps seldom in these latter ages more observable than in the compass of our own observation.

Now whenever this work is accomplished by the preaching of the gospel in a Christian country, there is generally some circumstance that shows it is a divine, and not a human, work. It is not the novelty of the doctrine which strikes; for all the main truths, on which the conviction and impression turns, have been known even from early infancy. No miracles awaken the attention, no new discoveries astonish the mind: but what has a thousand times been heard, and as often neglected, breaks in upon the mind with an almost irresistible energy, and strikes it as if it never had been heard of before. They seem, as it were, when the Lord turneth again their captivity, to awaken out of a dream, and wonder at the accident that has awakened them. The ministry of the word may seem but feeble, when compared to such an event: and yet sometimes even less solemn methods than that shall be effectual. One single text of Scripture accidentally occurring to the sight or thought, one serious hint dropped in conversation, shall strike the mind, and pierce it through with an energy that plainly shows, that from whatever feeble hand it might seem to come, it was shot out of the quiver of God, and intended by him that made the heart to reach it: since there is almost as much disproportion between the cause and the effect, as between Moses lifting up his rod, and the dividing of the water of the sea before Israel. In many instances, remarkable providences, which one would have thought should have struck the soul as it were to the centre, have produced no effect; and yet a word, or a thought, has accomplished it: and after the whirlwind, the earthquake, and the fire have made their successive efforts in vain, it has appeared that the Lord has been in the still small voice. On the whole, a variety of circumstances may illustrate the matter in different degrees; but, taking it in a general view, the remark appears to be well-founded, "that the weakness of the means by which the saving change is wrought, argues plainly that the hand of God is in it;" as when anointing the eyes with spittle gave sight to the blind, it was evidently the exertion of a miraculous power.—But now, agreeably to what has been advanced under these several heads, I shall proceed to show at large,

[5.] "That the Scripture teaches us to ascribe this great change on the mind to a divine agency and operation."

And here you will see, that it does not merely drop here and there an expression which is capable of such an interpretation, but that the whole tenor of the word of God leads to such a conclusion; and surely, if we own the word to be divine, we need no more convincing argument of the truth of this remark. The only difficulty I shall here find, will be like that which occurred under the former head, and proceeds from the variety and multiplicity of texts which offer themselves to me while reflecting on this subject: however, I will endeavour to rank them in the plainest and best order I can, under the following particulars.—We find God sometimes promises to produce such a change in men's minds;—and at other times he speaks of it as his own work, when it has been already produced:—the Scripture represents even the increase of piety in a regenerate heart, as the effect of a divine power; and how much more must the first implanting of it be so?—nay, it goes yet further than this, and expresses the necessity, as well as the reality, of a divine influence on the mind to make it truly religious, and resolves the want of true religion into this, that God withholds his influence.—If, therefore, any one, and much more if all these particulars, can be made out, I think it must force a conviction on your judgments at least, that what we are endeavouring to confirm in this discourse is the doctrine of Scripture.

1. There are various places in Scripture wherein "God promises to produce such a change in men's minds as we have before described;" which plainly shows that it is to be acknowledged as his work.

Thus Moses says to Israel, without all doubt by the divine direction, The Lord thy God will circumcise thy heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live. And this circumcision of the heart must surely be the removal of some insensibility and pollution adhering to it, and bringing it to a more orderly, regular, obedient state; which, as it is sometimes made matter of exhortation, and thus indeed proves that there is a view in which it may be considered as a duty incumbent upon us; as when Moses said, Circumcise the fore-skin of your heart; and Jeremiah, in imitation of him, Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the fore-skin of your heart; so here it is put in the form of a promise, to signify that, wherever it was done, it was in consequence of God's preventing and assisting grace. On the same principle, the Father promises to Christ, Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power; and if any pretend that these words may possibly admit of another version, though I know none more just than this, there are many other parallel places which are not attended with any ambiguity at all.—Such, in particular, is that gracious promise, (which, though it was immediately made to the house of Israel, is nevertheless quoted by the apostles as expressive of God's gospel covenant with all believers,) After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people; or, as it is elsewhere expressed by the same prophet, Jeremiah, I will give them one heart and one way, that they may fear me for ever; and I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me.—And Ezekiel echoes back the same language by the same Spirit; I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh; that they may walk in my statutes, and keep my ordinances, and do them: which is afterwards repeated again almost in the same words: A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh; and I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them. Now, such a transformation of the heart and spirit as may be represented by a thorough renovation, or by changing stone into flesh, speaks the doctrine I am asserting in as plain terms as we could contrive or express, and beautifully points out at once the greatness and excellency of the change, and the almighty power by which it is effected; for we may assure ourselves God would never promise such influences, if he did not really mean to impart them. But again,

2. Agreeably to the tenor of these promises, the "Scripture also ascribes this work to a divine agency, when it is effected."

Thus the apostle John, when he is speaking of those who, on receiving Christ, become the sons of God, declares concerning them, that they were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God; plainly intimating that it was to him, and not only or chiefly to themselves or others, that this happy change was to be ascribed; which is well explained by those words of St. James, in which he says, Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. Accordingly our Lord, as you have heard at large, insists upon it as absolutely necessary to a man's entering into the kingdom of God, not only that he should be born again, but more particularly that he should be born of the Spirit, i. e. by the sanctifying influence of the Spirit of God operating upon his soul, to purify and cleanse it. And as this great work of regeneration chiefly consists in being brought to faith and repentance, you may observe, that each of these are spoken of as a divine production in the mind, or as the gift of God to it. Thus the believing Jews, with one consent, expressed their conviction when they heard the story of Cornelius, and declare, Then has God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life. And so the apostle Paul expresses it, when speaking of the possibility that some might be recovered out of the snare of the devil, he says, If God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. That very attention to the gospel, which is the first step towards the production of faith in the soul, is resolved into this, when it is said, that the Lord opened Lydia's heart, that she attended to the things which were spoken by Paul. And with regard to the progress of it, it is not only said in general, You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins; but faith expressly declared to be the gift of God; and the apostle says to the Philippians, that it was given to them to believe; nay, it is represented as a most glorious and illustrious effort of divine power, and ascribed to the exceeding greatness of his power towards them that believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead. And in this view it is, that this change is called a new creation; plainly implying, as a celebrated writer well expresses it, "that something must here be done in us, and for us, which cannot be done by us." Wherefore, it is said, that the new man is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him; and we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works: not to insist upon the great variety of parallel passages in which the same thoughts are expressed almost in the very same words. But he indeed who would reckon up all the scriptures, both in the Old and New Testament, which directly or indirectly refer to this, must transcribe a larger part of both than would be convenient to read at one time in a worshipping assembly. But we may further, by a very strong consequence, infer the doctrine I am now maintaining from those various passages of the sacred writers, in which,

3. "The increase of piety in a heart already regenerated, is spoken of as the work of God."

Thus David, even when he felt himself disposed to the most vigorous prosecution of religion, solemnly declares his dependence upon continued divine influences, to enable him to execute the holy purpose he was then most affectionately forming: I will run the way of thy commandments, says he, when thou shalt enlarge my heart, or when thou shalt influence it with a steady principle of zeal, and with those devout passions which make every branch of my duty easy and delightful. And the apostle Paul declares his persuasion, that God would continue those gracious influences which he had already imparted: He that has begun a good work in you, will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ. And when he speaks of the ardent desire with which Christians were aspiring towards a better world, he adds, He that hath wrought us for the self same thing, is God. Thus also he ascribes his continued fidelity in the ministry to the grace of God that was with him, as being one that had obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful: And by the grace of God, says he, I am what I am; and if I have laboured more abundantly than others, it is not I, but the grace of God which was with me. On the same principle he acknowledges, that the success of Apollos in watering, as well as his own in planting, was to be referred to this, that God gave the increase in the one case as well as the other. And he concludes his epistle to the Hebrews with this remarkable prayer: The God of peace make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ. But, indeed, as every prayer that the apostles offer for any of their Christian brethren and friends, that they may grow in grace, might be urged for the illustration of this head, I choose rather to refer the rest to your own observation on this general hint, than to enter into a more particular enumeration. I shall only add, to complete the argument,

4. That the Scripture often declares "the necessity as well as the reality of such influences, and refers the ruin of man to this circumstance, that God in his righteous judgment had withheld or withdrawn them."

When Moses would upbraid the obstinacy of the Israelites, that all the profusion of wonders wrought for them in Egypt, and in the wilderness, had not produced any suitable impressions; so much was he accustomed to think of every thing good, in the moral, as well as in the natural, world, as the gift of God, that he uses this remarkable expression: Yet the Lord hath not given you a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day.—And our Lord, the propriety of whose expressions surely none can arraign, speaks to the same purpose, when adoring the divine conduct with respect to the dispensation of saving light and gospel blessings, he says, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. If some of the plainest and lowest of the people, who were in comparison to others but as little children, understood and received the gospel, while the learned men and politicians of the age despised it, God revealed it to the former, while he suffered the veil of prejudice to remain on the mind of the latter, though his almighty hand could easily have removed it.—Those other words of our Lord must not be omitted here, in which he says, No man can come unto me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and what this drawing of the Father means, he himself has explained by saying, No man can come unto me, except it be given him of my Father; and elsewhere he expresses it, by learning of the Father; all which must undoubtedly signify a divine agency and influence on the mind.—Nay, a more forcible expression than this is made use of by the evangelist, where he takes notice of the unbelief of those that saw the miracles of Christ, Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said, He has blinded their eyes, and hardened their hearts: which is agreeable to that expression of the apostle Paul, He has mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth: a thought which the apostle pursues at large through the following verses.

These, to be sure, are very emphatical scriptures: and though it is necessary to understand them in such a qualified sense as to make them consistent with other scriptures which charge men's destruction, not on any necessitating decree of God, but upon themselves, and the abuse of their own faculties; yet still these expressions must stand for something: and in the most moderate sense that can be put upon them, they directly confirm what I have here brought them to prove. So that on the whole, the matter must come to this, "That the cause of men's final and everlasting ruin may be referred, in one view of it, to God's withholding those gracious influences, which, if they had been imparted, would indeed have subdued the greatest perverseness: but his withholding these influences is not merely an arbitrary act, but the just punishment of men's wickedness, and of their obstinate folly in trifling with the means of his grace, and grieving his Spirit till it was provoked to withdraw." This thought, which I might largely prove to you to be a compendium of the Scripture scheme reconciles all; and any consequences drawn from one part of that scheme to the denial of the other, how plausible soever, must certainly be false.

I hope what I have here said may be sufficient to fix a conviction in your judgments and consciences, "that regeneration is ultimately to be referred to a divine influence upon the soul;" or as the apostle expresses it in the text, that God saves us of his mercy, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

I shall conclude with two or three reflections, which though so exceeding obvious, I shall touch upon, in regard to their great importance, without offering, as I might, to dilate on each of them at large.

[1.] Let those who have experienced this divine change in their souls give God the glory of it.

Perhaps there are many of you who may see peculiar reason to do it; perhaps you may be conscious to yourselves, that the arm of the Lord was remarkably revealed in conquering every sensible opposition, and getting itself the victory, even when you seemed as if you had been resolutely bent upon your own destruction, to struggle to the utmost against the operation of his grace on your soul. Others may perhaps have perceived the strength of the divine agency in the slightness of the occasion, or in the weakness of the means by which he wrought; which indeed is often matter of astonishment to those that seriously reflect upon it. But whatever your inclinations may have appeared, and whatever means or instruments were used, give God the glory of all.

If you have found yourselves, from your early years, inclined to attend to divine things, and susceptible of tender impressions from them, that attention and those impressions were to be resolved into this, that God prevented you with the blessings of his goodness. If you have enjoyed the most excellent public ordinances, even with all the concurrent advantages that the most pressing exhortations, and the most edifying example of parents, ministers, and companions could give, it was divine providence that furnished you with those advantages, and divine grace that added efficacy to them, else they had only served to display their own weakness, even where they might have appeared most powerful, and to illustrate that insensibility or obstinacy of heart which would have rendered you proof against all. You do well indeed to honour those whom God has blessed as the means of your spiritual edification: but if they think aright, it would grieve them to the very heart to have those applauses given, and those acknowledgments made, to them, which are due to God alone. All they have done is so little, that it deserves not the mention; and the greater attainments they have made in religion, the more cordially will they join with the holy apostle in saying, "Neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase."
